

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

FACTORIES AND WORKSHOPS BILL.

(The Lord Steward.)

(NO. 57.) THIRD READING. BILL PASSED.

Bill read 3<sup>a</sup> (according to Order) with the Amendments.

On Question that the Bill do pass,

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY, who had presented Petitions from the Walsall

VOL. COXL. [THIRD SERIES.]

Trades' Council, from the United Chain-makers' Association, and others praying that the Bill might be amended by the insertion of a clause providing that no girl under 16 years of age might be engaged in that work, said, that the observations he was about to offer were, by no means, by way of obstruction to the Bill—on the contrary, he was most anxious that the Bill should pass; but he must say there was a serious omission from it, inasmuch as the nail and chain-makers were not included among the trades subject to its provisions. They were a large body, especially in the neighbourhood of Walsall, and much of their work was done by women and girls; yet for girls under 16 engaged in nail and chain-making there was no protection in the Bill. On a former occasion, he had expressed his opinion that the provisions of the Bill were very valuable, and that for such legislation Mr. Cross deserved great credit; but, before the passing of the Bill, he thought it right to say that on a future occasion the nail and chain-makers would make application to Parliament to be included within the protective clauses of the Act. He should be glad to learn the reason—if there was any—for this omission. The noble Earl then proceeded to say: Now, my Lords, with the permission of the House, I will make a passing observation upon the melancholy and awful state of things now prevailing in certain districts of the County of Lancashire. I do not presume to give an opinion—if, indeed, I have one—on the respective position of the two parties—the employer and the employed. I believe, however, that each side is fully and conscientiously convinced that it is in the right. I wish to say a word or two in respect of the operative class—that operative class with which I have so long associated, and which I have so long known—and my main object is to express a decided opinion—and here, at least, I may be allowed to have one—that the sad disorder and outrages which have disgraced those localities were the work of the idle, the vagabond, and the worthless, of which there is everywhere so large a supply—especially in our large towns and cities. I verily believe the vast bulk of the operatives whom I have so long known and valued are most anxious to obtain their ends by just and peaceful means; but, at the same time, I feel bound to say of them, as their old friend and associate, that it is the duty of the mass of operatives, who are peacefully disposed to render every assistance to the constituted authorities, and to come forward at once and declare that they have not had, and that they will not have, any measure in the line of conduct which can only bring on universal disgrace and ruin.

LORD WINMARLEIGH said, he fully concurred in the observations of the noble Earl, who had had for so many years the interest of the working classes at heart, and felt sure that the words he had uttered that evening would have the happiest effect in putting an end to the disturbances that were now occurring; indeed, he was firmly convinced that had the operatives of Lancashire listened to the observations of their intelligent leaders, the disgraceful proceedings which had taken place at Blackburn, and elsewhere in Lancashire, would never have occurred.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEY said, that as a Member of the Commission which had sat to inquire into the operation of the Factory Acts, he should like to say a word or two on the first part of the noble Earl's speech. He knew very well the high authority which the opinion of the noble Earl carried with it; but he ventured to think that the Commissioners were justified by the evidence in making the recommendations they had, and that Her Majesty's Government were perfectly right in having drawn the Bill in the shape in which it was put before them. In regard to the nail and chain-makers, the Commission had a considerable conflict of evidence before them as to the effect of the trade of nail and chain-making on health. They sat in various towns in the Black Country, and took a great deal of evidence upon the question; and the general effect of it seemed to be that the occupation in question was not, on the whole, detrimental to the health of those engaged in it, and it was not carried on in large factories. But it was to be remarked that the great mass of the evidence they received in favour of extending the restrictions to those young women engaged in those trades came from men. The men felt that the women were competing with them, and they openly admitted it was a wages' question. The Commission considered, also, whether they could draw any distinction between the various kinds of nails made, and they considered the question whether they could get any line of distinction between the heavier and lighter kinds of chains and nails. After a lengthened investigation, they came to the conclusion that they could not prohibit altogether the employment of women and young persons in those trades, provided the hours were not excessive. He did not think the noble Earl was correct when he said they had no protection. The Bill they were now about to pass extended the provisions of the Act under which they were now working, by which young persons must be employed between 6 in the morning and 8 in the evening. By the Bill, their work must now begin at 6 or 7 in the morning, and end at the same hours in the evening, and they were to be allowed during the day an hour and a-half for meals. The Committee came to the conclusion that the hours were not excessive. He thought the Bill would meet the requirements of the case, and would give great satisfaction.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

ARMY RESERVE — ALLOWANCES TO FAMILIES OF RESERVE MEN.

ADDRESS FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

EARL DE LA WARR rose to move for recent Correspondence between the War Office and Boards of Guardians with reference to the allowances to the wives and children of the Army Reserve men who have been called into active service. In the few remarks which he wished to make on this subject, it was not his intention to ask Her Majesty's Government to anticipate what they might propose to communicate to Parliament at a future time; but it was, he thought, desirable that Parliament should know on what grounds the allowances proposed to be given had been fixed; and he thought, also, it would assist in giving this information, if the Correspondence to which he referred in his Notice of Motion were laid upon the Table of that House. The case, as their Lordships were aware, was a new one. It could not have occurred before in its present form, as this was the first occasion on which the Act of Parliament, under which the Army Reserve was called out, had been put in force. There arose, therefore, a new question—What was to be done to provide for the families of those men? It might be argued that they should be treated in the same way as the families of other men in the Army were treated. But it must be remembered that those men, in many instances were, when they were called out, in a different position from what they were when they first entered the Army. Since they had retired into the Reserve, not a few had become settled in comfortable homes, and were engaged in employments where they were in the receipt of good wages. Many, for instance, were servants of railway companies, and were filling places of trust. But, by the summons which they had received, and which had been so readily responded to, much had of necessity been given up, and their families had become dependent upon other means of subsistence. It had been communicated officially by the Secretary of State for War that a fixed allowance would be given to the wives and children of those Reserve men, and that the sum so fixed was 6*d.* a-day to the wife and 2*d.* a-day to each child. Now, it seemed to him that those sums could hardly be considered adequate as a means of support, and he did not believe it would satisfy the country as sufficient. In consequence, applications had been made to Boards of Guardians for further assistance, and a question had arisen whether out-door relief from the poor rates should or should not be given, and whether what was called the workhouse test should be applied? Now, he must say he was one of those who thought that this question ought not to have arisen. He could hardly conceive anything more detrimental to the well-working of the system of the Army Reserve than this—that the family of a man, who had readily and cheerfully obeyed the summons to serve his country, should be compelled to resort to parish relief, and even, perhaps, to the workhouse, to mingle with the idle and, it might be, with the worst class of the population. Not only, moreover, would it be a burden which ought not to be thrown upon the ratepayers, but he did not believe that the country would look with any degree of satisfaction upon such a result. But it must come to this if the allowance were not increased. He would ask—Was it possible that a woman could live on 6*d.* a-day and a child upon 2*d.* a-day in decent respectability to provide everything? and if there were small children to be taken care of, nothing more could be earned. Even if the husband should be able to save something out of his pay, it could not be more than would suffice for the house rent. It seemed to him that the case should be regarded as exceptional, and might be dealt with in an exceptional manner, without establishing any inconvenient precedent. It was considered so by the Act of Parliament, which treated it as a case of emergency. The country desired that adequate provision should be made for the families of those men, to enable their families to remain in comfortable circumstances until they could return to the position they had formerly occupied.

it right to say that on a future occasion the nail and chain-makers would make application to Parliament to be included within the protective clauses of the Act. He should be glad to learn the reason—if there was any—for this omission. The noble Earl then proceeded to say: Now, my Lords, with the permission of the House, I will make a passing observation upon the melancholy and awful state of things now prevailing in certain districts of the County of Lancashire. I do not presume to give an opinion—if, indeed, I have one—on the respective position of the two parties—the employer and the employed. I believe, however, that each side is fully and conscientiously convinced that it is in the right. I wish to say a word or two in respect of the operative class—that operative class with which I have so long associated, and which I have so long known—and my main object is to express a decided opinion—and here, at least, I may be allowed to have one—that the sad disorder and outrages which have disgraced those localities were the work of the idle, the vagabond, and the worthless, of which there is everywhere so large a supply—especially in our large towns and cities. I verily believe the vast bulk of the operatives whom I have so long known and valued are most anxious to obtain their ends by just and peaceful means; but, at the same time, I feel bound to say of them, as their old friend and associate, that it is the duty of the mass of operatives, who are peacefully disposed to render every assistance to the constituted authorities, and to come forward at once and declare that they have not had, and that they will not have, any measure in the line of conduct which can only bring on universal disgrace and ruin.

LORD WINMARLEIGH said, he fully concurred in the observations of the noble Earl, who had had for so many years the interest of the working classes at heart, and felt sure that the words he had uttered that evening would have the happiest effect in putting an end to the disturbances that were now occurring; indeed, he was firmly convinced that had the operatives of Lancashire listened to the observations of their intelligent leaders, the disgraceful proceedings which had taken place at Blackburn, and elsewhere in Lancashire, would never have occurred.

The Earl of Shaftesbury

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEY said, that as a Member of the Commission which had sat to inquire into the operation of the Factory Acts, he should like to say a word or two on the first part of the noble Earl's speech. He knew very well the high authority which the opinion of the noble Earl carried with it; but he ventured to think that the Commissioners were justified by the evidence in making the recommendations they had, and that Her Majesty's Government were perfectly right in having drawn the Bill in the shape in which it was put before them. In regard to the nail and chain-makers, the Commission had a considerable conflict of evidence before them as to the effect of the trade of nail and chain-making on health. They sat in various towns in the Black Country, and took a great deal of evidence upon the question; and the general effect of it seemed to be that the occupation in question was not, on the whole, detrimental to the health of those engaged in it, and it was not carried on in large factories. But it was to be remarked that the great mass of the evidence they received in favour of extending the restrictions to those young women engaged in those trades came from men. The men felt that the women were competing with them, and they openly admitted it was a wages' question. The Commission considered, also, whether they could draw any distinction between the various kinds of nails made, and they considered the question whether they could get any line of distinction between the heavier and lighter kinds of chains and nails. Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for recent Correspondence between the War Office and Boards of Guardians or members of Boards of Guardians relative to allowances to wives and children of the Army Reserve men who have been called into active service.—(The Earl De La Warr.)

LORD RIBBLESDALE said, he knew, from his own observations, in the case of some men of the Reserve who were now under his command, a good deal of distress was felt by their families in the interval between the time the men left home—namely, the 19th of April, and the issue of the War Office Instructions of May 3rd for the payment of the separation allowance monthly in advance to their wives and children. He did not think that the wives and children of any of the Reserve men should be thrown on the parish by reason of the men having obeyed the call made on them; but it must be borne in mind that the wives of those men were in the same position—or, rather, were not in as bad a position—as would be the wives of men who were now serving with the colours if the latter were sent into the field. The men of the Reserve had, as the noble Earl had stated, been in good employment, and had had an opportunity of making some provision for their wives, which it was hardly possible, even with the greatest self-denial, for the married soldier to do when serving with the colours. The question was a rather difficult one, and their Lordships should not come to a hasty decision with regard to it. It seemed to him, if anything extraordinary was to be done for the wives of the men of the Reserve, it ought to be out of Imperial, and not out of parish funds. The question was, however, one which ought to be considered carefully. Any off-hand opinions on it would be valueless.

VISCOUNT BURY said, that if, after the explanation he was about to give, his noble Friend still pressed for the Papers, his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War would have no objection to their production; but he thought that his noble Friend, knowing what he was going to say to the House, ought to have framed his Motion rather differently. Only seven or eight Papers of the description of those referred to by his noble Friend had reached the War Office from Boards of Guardians, and not one of them touched the point which was the mainspring of his noble Friend's speech. If the noble Earl thought that in obtaining those Papers he would get some support for the proposition that the allowances granted to the wives and children of men of the Reserve was not sufficient, he might tell him that no such allegations were made in any one of the communications from Boards of Guardians. He would not follow the noble Earl in the questions he had raised. As had been well remarked by the noble Earl, the question of the sufficiency or insufficiency of the provision made for the wives and children of those men was one which ought not to be decided off-hand, and on a side issue of a very different kind. If the noble Earl thought right to proceed with his Motion, he (Viscount Bury) should propose to omit the words "or number of Boards of Guardians," as some of these gentlemen might object to the production of what they might have written in their individual capacity.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, he was glad that his noble Friend (Earl De La Warr) had called attention to this matter. It was a very important matter, and a large number of persons were interested in it who had no one to represent them either in that or the other House of Parliament. No doubt, cases of great hardship were not uncommon. Only that day a letter was placed in his hands representing the condition of a very respectable family in a small town of his diocese. The wife had lived in comparative comfort and affluence with her husband while he was at home; he had now obeyed the call made on the Reserves, and the wife was left in a state of absolute destitution, and with her young child was obliged either to starve or beg—the only other alternative was to apply to the parish. He hoped this was an exceptional case; but there could be very little doubt that, when the matter was fully stated, the Government and the country would be fully alive to the importance of the matter. Everything which threw light on the question was most important. What could be more detrimental to the public service than that the idea should spread among the labouring class that when they were willing to serve their country—as it must be admitted they were—the country was indifferent to the sufferings of those near and dear to them? He did not believe that either the Government or the country was really indifferent to them; but the labouring classes had no knowledge of what was being done in the matter, and everything which threw light on the circumstances would do good as tending to dissipate an impression which certainly, to some extent, and not unnaturally prevailed, and which was calculated to do a great injury to the public service.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE wished to express his opinion that this question was a most important one—no doubt, it was a difficult question also. He, for one, thought that when men came forward, through a sense of duty, and in response to the call of their Sovereign, their families ought to be supported. He had never been more distressed than on hearing that some of the wives and children of the Reserve men would be obliged to seek parochial relief; and it had even been suggested that the wives of men of the Reserves, who could not support themselves and their children, should have the workhouse test applied to them. He objected altogether to such treatment. What was needful should be done direct by the Government, and he could not for a moment suppose that objections to that course would be raised on either side of the House of Commons. He could not doubt the feeling of the House and the country; but the question was a difficult, delicate, and intricate one, and would require very careful consideration. The cases were very different. The circumstances of the families of some of those men were good; those of others of them were comparatively bad. No hasty decision in the matter ought to be come to; but he hoped that, whatever was decided to be done, it would be done by a grant from Parliament, to be carried out by Government officers, and not by the parochial authorities.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL said, he had heard the tone of this conversation with great pleasure. It was impossible to suppose that the Government and the country could have any ungenerous feelings in the matter; but he fully agreed in the remark that it would be imprudent of Parliament or the Government to express itself hastily on the subject. It was quite clear that this question must come under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. It was as yet in its infancy, and a reasonable time must be allowed for due consideration how the emergency could best be met. He sincerely trusted that what the illustrious Duke had said would be borne in mind, and that no man's wife or children would be so dealt with that they or he should be regarded as paupers by reason of the fulfilment on his part of this honourable obligation to the Crown. At the same time, it must be remembered, also, that when they established the Reserve they made an important change. Under the former state of things, the theory was that the Army was a celibate Army. The permissions to soldiers serving in the ranks to marry were very few, and their position was exceptional; but when they invited 60,000 or 80,000 men to go into the Reserve, while giving the Government power to call on them to return to the standards in case of need, they virtually invited them to enter civil life, to marry, and to maintain themselves. A great many difficult questions naturally followed. At first, the number entering the Reserve were few—they were now increasing in considerable numbers year by year, and the question, therefore, was becoming of more and more importance. He was willing to believe that the Government would deal with the matter in a just, fair, and generous spirit; but he hoped that nothing would be done hastily. He thought the premature publication of isolated and, as yet, unconsidered cases of hardship might be mischievous, and could do no possible good. What the country would want to know was not what complaints had arisen, but how these complaints had been dealt with and redressed. He was willing to repose confidence in the Government, believing that its proposals would be generous, and such as to meet the necessities of the case.

THE EARL OF LIMERICK said, that although, in his opinion, the allowances were sufficient in the majority of cases, no doubt, there had been cases of hardship. The question was a difficult one, and careful inquiries should be made to test the statements of women representing themselves to be wives of men of the Reserve.

LORD WAVENEY was understood to suggest that a voluntary effort to assist the wives and families of the Reserve men ought to be encouraged.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD hoped that his noble Friend would withdraw his Motion for the production of the Papers. The subject was one of a very interesting character. It had already engaged the attention of the Government, and, indeed, of the country. One change had already been made. The wives and children of the men of the Reserve were now receiving money in advance instead of in arrear—which, of course, was an advantage, and which showed that the matter was one to which the Government were not indifferent. The production of the Papers asked for by his noble Friend would lead to a false impression, and, therefore, he hoped his noble Friend would not press for them.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

House adjourned at Six o'clock,
till To-morrow, half past
Ten o'clock.

DUBLIN, WICKLOW, AND WEXFORD RAILWAY BILL.—[Lords.]—(by Order.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

The Earl of Beaconsfield

Mr. M. BROOKS said, he felt it an imperative, but disagreeable and painful, duty to move that the second reading of the Bill be postponed until that day six months. He was induced to take this course from peculiar circumstances. Most English Members of Parliament had been in Ireland, and the majority of them travelled by way of Holyhead and Kingstown, passing in their way over a short section of railway, about six miles in length, from Kingstown to Dublin. Most of them, therefore, had an opportunity of judging whether that line was well or badly managed. He was of opinion—and he was fortified in that opinion by the declaration of the great majority of the citizens of Dublin—that the line had been mismanaged in a manner that reflected great discredit upon the Directors—most of them respectable, intelligent, and wealthy persons—and so mismanaged that it had materially injured the trade and property of the inhabitants of the district. Such being his opinion, he had felt it his duty, early in the Session, to call the attention of the Board of Trade to the subject, and to request them to institute an inquiry. The Board of Trade, accordingly, sent down Major-General Hutchinson, one of the Railway Inspectors of the Board, to the City of Dublin. That gentleman had made an inquiry, and had presented a Report, a copy of which he (Mr. Brooks) held in his hand, and which he would read in part. It was better, he thought, that he should take the observations of Major-General Hutchinson, rather than offer his own view of the facts. He had, however, found it impossible to devise any means for rectifying the abuses under which the citizens of Dublin suffered, except by an appeal to Parliament, fortified by a Report from the Board of Trade; because no Committee sitting upstairs upon the present Bill could deal with the question, as no one would have any locus standi before it. The Board of Trade had no power to deal with anything affecting simply the comfort of the passengers, and had no power to revise the fares, however excessive they might be. Neither the Board of Trade, nor any other public authority, had any power to compel the Railway Company to improve the railway carriages, no matter how discreditable they were. The Board of Trade had, however, placed in his hands a copy of the Report of Major-General Hutchinson as to the condition of things on the line between Dublin and Kingstown. Major-General Hutchinson held his inquiry on the 30th of March, and he reported that the stations between Dublin and Kingstown—namely, Lansdowne Road, Sidney Parade, Booterstown, and Blackrock—were one and all deficient in that accommodation as regarded waiting-rooms, water-closets, and platform-shelters, which might reasonably be expected upon a railway having a large suburban traffic. Major-General Hutchinson pointed out that at Lansdowne Road the shelter on the down platform consisted of an open shed; at Booterstown there was no ladies' waiting-room, although it was the most important station between Dublin and Kingstown. Not only was there no ladies' waiting-room, but there were no water-closets or urinal, and the platform at all of the stations, with the exception of Lansdowne Road, varied from 19 inches to 22 inches above the rail levels. Most of the carriages had only one step, so that infirm persons experienced considerable difficulty in stepping in and out of the carriages. It was hardly necessary to remind the House that within the last few days one of the oldest and most respected Members of the House came to an untimely death on account of the defective arrangements at one of the London stations. Yet this was one of those defects which was capable of very easy remedy. In addition, there were no bridges or subways for communicating from one platform to the other, and, according to the Report of Major-General Hutchinson, this formed a constant source of danger, particularly at Booterstown, where the up and down trains stopped simultaneously, and very frequently. The complaint he had made to the Board of Trade was under various heads. One related to the accommodation at the different stations, and another to the excessive amount of the fares. Major-General Hutchinson stated that, whilst upon the Dublin and Kingstown Railway—a line six miles in length—the second-class subscription ticket was £12, the subscription for a similar distance on the London and North-Western Railway was only £7; on the London, Brighton, and South Coast, £6 10s., or 45 per cent less; on the Great Eastern, £7 10s.; the Great Northern, £7; the London, Chatham, and Dover, £7 10s.; and upon a line at Belfast, of a somewhat similar suburban character, while the second-class subscription ticket between Dublin and Kingstown was £12, between Belfast and Bangor, for the same distance, it was only £8. The Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Company were established in the year 1848, and in 1856 they obtained a lease of the Dublin and Kingstown line. They obtained it on terms stated in the Preamble of their Bill—that if they obtained the lease, they would work the line more beneficially for the public. They obtained the lease on this understanding, and they immediately raised the fares, one and all, instead of reducing them; and the result was, that whereas the old Dublin and Kingstown Company were able to pay a dividend of 10 per cent upon the low and moderate and reasonable fares which they exacted, while happily for the citizens of Dublin they had the management of the line, the Company promoting the present Bill were able, by raising the fares, to extract from the unfortunate persons who lived on the line such further sums as enabled the two Companies to divide upon their capital the enormous dividend of 17½ per cent. Under the old system there was a return ticket of 6d. issued in the morning to workmen. The new management abolished this return ticket, and increased the second-class return ticket from 1s. to 1s. 2d. Major-General Hutchinson concluded his Report by stating that whereas, under the Act of 1856, by which the present Company leased the Dublin and Kingstown line, they were to make more advantageous arrangements for the public service, they had, in fact, exacted fares which, especially for season tickets, were unreasonably high. Major-General Hutchinson further stated that the complaints with regard to the want of reasonable accommodation of small-sized stations and the height of the platforms were well-founded; and, seeing that the Company were in a prosperous condition, the public had a right to expect accommodation of a superior class and character. The Company were now seeking to extend their powers; and he (Mr. Brooks) asked that Parliament should refer the complaint of Major-General Hutchinson and of the citizens of Dublin either to the Board of Trade, or to some independent authority, which should decide that, in acceding to the present project, there should be some assurance on the part of the Company that they would mitigate the grievances of which Major-General Hutchinson complained. He begged to move that the Bill be read a second time on that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Maurice Brooks.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

SIR GEORGE BOWYER, as Member for the County of Wexford, thought it was necessary that he should explain the reasons which induced him to oppose the Motion. The objections which had been urged by the hon. Member for Dublin did not touch the principle of the Bill, and were such as could be best dealt with when the Bill came before a Committee upstairs. The hon. Member had not said a word against the second reading of the Bill; and he therefore hoped the House would pursue the course which was usually taken in these cases, and read the Bill a second time, leaving its provisions to be considered by a Select Committee.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA could not concur in the views of the hon. Member for Dublin, who had moved the rejection of the Bill, and quite agreed with the hon. Baronet opposite, that most of the questions which had been referred to by his hon. Friend were questions for the consideration of a Committee upstairs rather than for the House. He was sorry to add, however, that it would not be within the province of a Committee upstairs to consider all these questions. While he hoped the Bill would be read a second time, he had no desire that it should be read under the impression that the matters complained of which affected the Dublin and Wicklow traffic could be remedied by a Committee upstairs. The object of the Bill was to enable the Company promoting it to make a continuation of their line from New Ross to Waterford; and he thought it would be altogether a mistake to prevent the only Company which was able to do this from carrying out that work because another complaint, upon an entirely different matter, had been made against them.

Mr. M. Brooks

For his own part, he did not think they ought to stop a public work that would be, on the whole, beneficial to the country, because the Company who were promoting the Bill had been in other respects negligent, and had not considered the interests of the City of Dublin. Although he generally acted with his hon. Friend the Member for Dublin, he could not agree with him on this occasion, but would support the second reading of the Bill.

MAJOR O'GORMAN expressed a hope that his hon. Friend the Member for Dublin would withdraw his opposition to the Bill. He had never in his life heard a weaker argument than the one which his hon. Friend had brought forward. The Bill was promoted by the Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway Company. It was originated in the House of Lords, and it had gone through every stage required by the Standing Orders of both Houses of Parliament. It had been twice referred to the Examiners of Private Bills, and had been passed by them, notwithstanding opposition and the complaint that the Standing Orders had not been complied with. It had been referred by the House of Lords to a Select Committee, by whom it had been carefully considered before it was passed and reported. His hon. Friend appeared to have completely lost sight of the main object of the Bill, which was to construct a new line. His hon. Friend, he hoped unintentionally, had endeavoured to throw dust in the eyes of the House. The object of the Bill was to construct a line, which was urgently required in the public interests, extending from the town of New Ross to the Waterford and Dungarvan Railway terminus in the City of Waterford. If the opposition to the measure were successful, no railway could be made between these two important towns. And, in regard to that opposition, so far as the inconveniences now sustained in connection with the Dublin and Kingstown line were concerned, he was authorized to say that a contract had already been entered into for the building of a new station at Westland Row, which would cost £75,000. He was free to confess that the present station at Westland Row was disgraceful; but after the £75,000 had been spent upon it, it would not be so. The Company were also about to enter into contracts for taking land, which would enable them to improve the condition of all the stations on the line. Under these circumstances, the objections urged by his hon. Friend fell to the ground at once. He hoped the House would not assent to the Amendment, which, if carried, would prevent an important railway communication being made between the town of New Ross and the City of Waterford.

MR. SULLIVAN suggested, as an Amendment to the Motion of the hon. Member for Dublin, that in place of postponing the second reading of the Bill for six months, it should be postponed for three or four weeks. The object of his hon. Friend would be fully attained by taking that course, and time would be given to enable the Report of Major-General Hutchinson to be circulated and made known among the Members of the House. Although differing from the hon. Member for Dublin to a certain extent, he wished to remind the House that if Westland Row station was going to be improved in any way it would be because of the action taken on the floor of that House by his hon. Friend. The improvement of that station was certainly necessary in order to wipe out a great scandal from the railway management of Ireland. The only reason why the present Bill was opposed was that it was promoted by a Company who had the management of the Dublin and Kingstown line. That had been execrably mismanaged. It was the filthiest line in the whole Empire, and Irishmen felt keenly that it would be a bad line even for the wilds of Connemara. Unfortunately for the character of the country, it was the line which English tourists first encountered when they crossed the Channel from Holyhead, and they naturally turned up their noses at what they considered a very dirty way of doing business. As to the grand Westland Row terminus that was to be built, he could only say that one of the humorous traditions of Dublin, in reference to the management of the Dublin and Kingstown line, was that the most remarkable event in the history of the line occurred within the last 10 years when, on the occasion of a member of the Royal Family going over, a porter was actually seen brushing out the railway carriages with a broom.

MR. RAIKES hoped the hon. Member for Dublin (Mr. M. Brooks) would not put the House to the trouble of dividing on the second reading of the Bill. The hon. and learned Member who had just spoken had expressed himself in terms certainly very strong; but he dare say not at all stronger than were deserved, of the management of the railway between Dublin and Kingstown; but, at the same time, he thought the suggestion made by the hon. and learned Member for Louth was one that would hardly recommend itself to the House on further consideration. The hon. and learned Member suggested that the Bill should be delayed for three weeks or a month, in order that the Report of Major-General Hutchinson should be studied by the House. He did not question that that Report might be studied with advantage; but he did not see what contribution its consideration would bring to the final conclusion to be arrived at with regard to this particular spur of the Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway. The object of the Bill was to make a small extension of the main system of the Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway—namely, from the town of New Ross to Waterford, and it did not apply to the Dublin and Kingstown line at all. He believed that the proposition embodied in the measure met with the approval of the landowners in the locality. It was supported by one of the Members for the City of Waterford (Major O'Gorman), and also by the hon. Members for Wexford and Youghal (Sir George Bowyer and Sir Joseph M'Kenna), who were supposed to represent the views of that part of the country. Under these circumstances, he did not think the City of Waterford and the town of New Ross ought to be deprived of the substantial benefit which they would derive from the construction of this railway. He agreed with the hon. Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna), that the objections to the Bill were not in the nature of objections which could be raised before a Committee on the measure, because the hon. Member for Dublin would have no locus standi before a Committee, and the Corporation of Dublin, who had been allowed a locus standi with regard to certain matters, had not raised the objections urged by the hon. Member. He (Mr. Raikes) thought that, upon the whole, it would be a pity to punish the people of Waterford on account of the defects of a railway between Dublin and Kingstown; and it might be taken for granted, that now the attention of the Board of Trade had been called to the condition of the latter line, matters would not be allowed to rest where they did, but that something would be done with a view of insuring improvement. On this occasion he supported the second reading of the Bill, and he saw no reason why the House should refuse to send it to a Select Committee.

MR. H. HERBERT concurred in the remarks which had been made in regard to the disgraceful state of the Dublin and Kingstown Railway. It had been spoken of repeatedly, and he hoped there was at length some chance of obtaining some improvement of the line. The Report of Major-General Hutchinson concerned not only the Members of that House, but the whole of the public. The condition of the Dublin and Kingstown line was disgraceful, not only to the people of Ireland, but to the public at large. In journeying between London and Dublin the traveller, on his arrival at Kingstown, had to get ashore as he best could. Not unfrequently he was obliged to wait for half or three-quarters of an hour until the mails were got on shore. All the Company cared about was the mails, and they did not care a straw about the comfort or convenience of the passengers or men of business. He thought it would be disgraceful to allow this state of things to be continued.

SIR ARTHUR GUINNESS said, he had been authorized, by the Railway Company who were promoting the present Bill, to state that the Report of Major-General Hutchinson would receive its fullest and most liberal consideration, and that many of the suggestions contained in the Report were in the course of being carried out. He had no doubt that the present condition of the Dublin and Kingstown Railway was, in many respects, very unsatisfactory; but he believed there was every desire to effect an improvement, and he trusted the hon. Member for Dublin, under the circumstances, would withdraw the Motion he had made.

MR. BIGGAR agreed with the hon. Member for Dublin that all the arrangements affecting the Dublin and Kingstown Railway were of a most disgraceful character, and that it was perfectly legitimate to place pressure upon the Company, in order to compel it to reform its system of management, even by postponing the consideration of a Bill for another and independent line until some sort of security was obtained that the necessary reforms would be carried out. The general assurance given on the part of the Railway Company by the hon. Baronet the Member for Dublin (Sir Arthur Guinness) was by no means satisfactory or sufficient. All the Company promised was that they would take the Report of Major-General Hutchinson into favourable consideration. They knew perfectly well in that House what "favourable consideration" meant. It meant, in most cases, that there would be no more consideration on the subject, but that it would be quietly shelved. If the Bill were postponed for three or four weeks, the Company would probably be induced, in the meantime, to give a bond fide undertaking, in the form of a clause to be introduced into the Bill in its passage through Committee, binding themselves to carry out the reforms which were necessary, and which were asked for. One very strong argument for the adoption of this course had been supplied by the hon. Member for Chester (Mr. Raikes), when he stated that the hon. Member for Dublin (Mr. Brooks) had no locus standi to appear before the Committee in opposition to the Bill, and, further, that the Corporation of Dublin, as a Corporation, had no power to appear for the purpose of obtaining the improvement of any railway station beyond the scope of the present Bill. He thought the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) ought to be agreed to. At the same time, the arguments of the hon. and gallant Member for Waterford (Major O'Gorman) were entitled to great weight; but, unfortunately, the promoters of the Bill, if they obtained their Act, could snap their fingers at the passengers, and the result might be that the reforms that were asked for would never be carried out. For these reasons, he hoped that the further consideration of the project would be postponed, and that an opportunity would be afforded to the House of forming an opinion as to the value of the reforms which were required by the public, and the promises made by the Company to carry them out.

Mr. Raikes

MR. M. BROOKS said, he felt that there was considerable force in the observations which had been made by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Waterford—that the residents in one district ought not to be punished, by retarding the construction of a line, in consequence of the mismanagement of the Directors in regard to another part of their system. Therefore, with the leave of the House, he would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

CHESTER TRAMWAYS BILL.

Ordered, That the Chairman of the Select Committee on Standing Orders be appointed Chairman of the Committee on the Chester Tramways Bill.—(The Chairman of Ways and Means.)

QUESTIONS.

STREET TRAFFIC—MILITARY BANDSMEN.—QUESTION.

MR. BIGGAR asked Mr. Attorney General, If it is a criminal offence, punishable by summary conviction, for Volunteer and other regimental bandsmen to play tunes while marching through the streets of London or other English cities and towns; if Military have any greater privileges than civilian bandsmen as to playing tunes through the streets of English or Irish cities and towns, and, if so, under what statute; and, if, where there is no local Act or Corporation bye-law to extend the ordinary common and statute law, it is lawful for magistrates in Ireland summarily to convict and fine or imprison Military or civilian bandsmen for playing tunes while marching through the streets of Irish cities and towns as English bandsmen were constantly doing everywhere through England?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD): Sir, in the absence of my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, who is unable to be here, I beg to answer the hon. Member's Question. In the terms in which he has put it, it is not a criminal offence in itself for Volunteer and other regimental bandsmen to play tunes while marching through the streets of large towns. The 27 & 28 Vict. c. 65 enables street musicians to be given into custody for playing in the street near a house after being required by the householder to depart. Neither military nor civil bands have any peculiar privileges; but, in fact, it would hardly be contended that military bandsmen, in the performance of their duty, were street musicians within the meaning of the Act. I have said it is not an offence in the language of the hon. Member's Question; but it must be remembered that neither street musicians, nor bandsmen, nor anybody else are entitled to obstruct the Queen's Highway; and, treated as an obstruction, which it sometimes is, a band may be made a subject of punishment on summary proceedings both in England and in Ireland.

PARLIAMENT—LIABILITIES OF EMPLOYERS AND WORKMEN—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. PULESTON asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether he will be prepared to introduce a Bill to regulate the Liabilities of Employers and Workmen this Session; and, if so, whether he can state the time?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD), in reply, said, that a Bill dealing with the subject of the hon. Gentleman's Question was in course of preparation, and would shortly be introduced.

PARLIAMENT—CORRUPT PRACTICES BILL—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the Corrupt Practices Bill will be introduced?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD), in reply, said, that in the present state of Public Business it was impossible to give an absolutely definite answer to the Question, but that the Government hoped shortly to bring in a Bill.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE ACT, 1873.—QUESTION.

MR. WADDY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been directed to the 75th section of "The Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873," which provides that a council of the Judges of the Supreme Court shall assemble at least once in every year, at a time fixed by the Lord Chancellor, to consider the operation of the Act, of the rules of Court, and other matters, and shall report annually to one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State what, if any, amendments or alterations it would in their judgment be expedient to make in the Act, or otherwise relating to the administration of justice; whether the Lord Chancellor has ever fixed a time for the holding of such annual council; whether such annual council has in fact ever been held; and, whether such reports have been duly made at any time since the passing of the Act; and, if so, whether he will lay them upon the Table of the House?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, in reply, said, that he had been informed that since the passing of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act rules of Court had been passed from time to time, all of which rules had been laid before both Houses of Parliament, in conformity with the requirements of the Act. Councils of the Judges of the Supreme Court under Section 75 of the Act of 1873 were held on November 20, 1876, and again on December 15, 1877; and at these councils it was determined that sufficient time had not been given for the working of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act to render it expedient to make any alteration or amendment which could not be carried into effect without the authority of Parliament.

ARMY MEDICAL OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

MR. MELDON asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is a fact that the garrison of Woolwich has been so denuded of medical officers that the Government has been obliged to sanction the employment of private practitioners to assist in taking medical charge of the soldiers and their families; whether many other garrisons have not been left short of Army medical men; and, whether it is true that more than £5,000 is required to pay private medical practitioners in attending the troops in the field at the Cape?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, I am informed that the garrison at Woolwich has its full complement of medical officers, and no private medical practitioners are employed. Other garrisons, however, are short of medical officers. This is in some measure due to a number having been withdrawn temporarily for the purpose of undergoing special field training with the Army Hospital Corps at Aldershot. The increase of £5,000 referred to was taken for the employment of civil surgeons at the Cape, as it was found a more economical and desirable arrangement than an augmentation to the staff, as the services of these gentlemen will be dispensed with when no longer required.

MADRAS HARBOUR—QUESTION.

MR. SMOLLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether Sir Andrew Clarke has inspected the harbour works at Madras, and has officially reported upon the present position of that undertaking; and, if so, if there will be any objection to lay Sir Andrew Clarke's Report upon the Table of the House?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, it appears from the Indian newspapers that Sir Andrew Clarke has recently visited Madras to inspect the harbour works, but no official Report respecting his visit has yet reached this country.

THE MILITARY FORCES OF THE CROWN—THE INDIAN CONTINGENT. QUESTION.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Articles of War made by the Indian Government for the government of Her Majesty's Native Indian Forces, and those portions of the Indian Penal Code which are adopted as forming a part of those Articles of War, have any force within the Island of Malta?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Yes, Sir. They will apply to the Indian troops at Malta.

SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM—THE NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY.

QUESTION.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, If he can state when the Educational Collection of South Kensington Museum will be removed from the apartments under the National Portrait Gallery, so as to enable that gallery to occupy the space?

Mr. Waddy

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, we are now in communication with the Treasury upon this subject; and as soon as arrangements can be made by which the Educational Collection can be transferred to another place, we shall be ready to vacate the apartments now occupied by it.

TURKEY—MURDER OF MR. OGLE.
QUESTION.

MR. H. SAMUELSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Mr. Consul General Fawcett's report of his investigation into the murder of Mr. Ogle by Turkish soldiers has arrived; and, if so, when it will be presented to the House; and, whether all documents relating to Mr. Ogle's murder at present in the Foreign Office will be laid upon the Table without delay?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I understand that the Report has not yet been received at the Foreign Office, but that it is expected shortly. When it arrives, the Government will lose as little time as possible in laying the Papers upon the Table.

POST OFFICE—MAIL CONTRACTS.
QUESTION.

MR. HOPWOOD asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is the intention of the Government to invite tenders for a Contract or Contracts to carry the Mails on the termination of that now existing with the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Shipping Company; if so, when it is probable that advertisements will be issued for the purpose?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, tenders would be invited on the termination, on January 1, 1880, of the existing contract. A Correspondence was now going on between the Home and Indian Governments as to the terms on which those tenders should be invited, and as soon as that Correspondence was completed the terms would be made known.

SCOTCH BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.
QUESTION.

DR. CAMERON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, To state in what order he proposes to proceed with the various Scotch Bills at present before the House; and, whether it is intended to take up any of them before Whitsuntide?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, it was a matter of some difficulty to arrange when the Bills relating to Scotland could be brought forward; but his right hon. Friend (Mr. Assheton Cross) had sent him a note to the effect that he thought that the Roads and Bridges Bill might be taken at a Morning Sitting. The Government, however, could not make any positive promise on the subject. Due Notice would be given when the day was fixed. The Government would do their best to have the Bill brought on on Thursday. The Education Bill and the Endowed Schools Bill, having passed the House of Lords, were not so pressing. The Bills as to an Under Secretary of State for Scotland and the Lord Clerk Register, his right hon. Friend thought, might be taken on any convenient day that could be arranged.

ARMY—REGIMENTAL LIEUTENANT COLONELS.—QUESTION.

GENERAL SHUTE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he can take steps to stop the supersession of regimental lieutenant-colonels now taking place by the action of paragraph (f), Article 22, Clause 124, of the Royal Warrant of September, 1877, whereby their positions have suddenly and considerably been altered for the worse; whether, if (as sanctioned by this late Warrant) appointments which a captain would be competent to hold are to qualify for the rank of full colonel, it will not tend largely to increase the list of colonels, which it is an object to reduce; and, whether, instead of thus lowering the standard of practical military experience required for the higher ranks of the Army by allowing an increased number of small appointments to be considered as qualifying for full colonel, he will consider the advantage to the public service of reducing the number to those higher appointments only, in the fulfilment of which, a real qualification for high command is likely to be acquired?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, he was afraid that he could only answer very generally the Question of his hon.

and gallant Friend. A small Committee had been appointed to consider this subject. The Committee had presented their Report; but he thought that it would be necessary to refer it back to them with reference to certain particular points.

ECCLESIASTICAL SALARIES (INDIA).

QUESTION.

MR. BAXTER asked the Under Secretary of State for India, When the Return regarding Ecclesiastical Salaries in India, for which an Address was moved last Session, will be laid upon the Table of the House?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, the Financial Department in India has been directed by the Government of India to prepare this Return, but it must necessarily take a considerable time, and I cannot at present say when it will be received.

TEACHERS AND SCHOOL RETURNS.

QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether the following extract from a letter lately sent to the Wigan School Attendance Committee by Mr. Cumin is to be understood as showing a change of intention since the favourable answer given in this House by Viscount Sandon on the 21st March in respect to the claim of teachers to be paid for making out the returns required to be furnished:—

“I am directed to refer you to paragraph 26 of the Minute which, in their Lordships' opinion, precludes the teachers of schools from demanding any fee for making the returns required under paragraph 8.”

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, that the letter referred to by the hon. Member, written by Mr. Cumin, was dated the 16th of March. That was five days before the answer given by his noble Friend (Viscount Sandon); and, therefore, his answer would not be affected by that letter.

THE PARIS EXHIBITION, 1878—ASSISTANCE TO ENGLISH ARTIZANS.

QUESTION.

MR. MELDON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, having regard to the fact that the Royal Commissioners for the Paris Exhibition, 1878, have (out of the moneys granted to them by Parliament) voted the sum of £100 to assist English artizans to visit the Exhibition, the Government are prepared to recommend that a sum be granted out of the same funds for a similar purpose in aid of the subscription now being made in Ireland to assist the workmen of that Country to visit the Paris Exhibition?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the arrangement that has been made with respect to the grant for the Paris Exhibition is that it shall be entirely at the disposal of the Commissioners, subject to the control of the Treasury, and the necessity of providing proper vouchers. It would not be consistent with the arrangement that has been made that the Government should interfere in any way with the appropriation of that money, and such a suggestion as that contained in the hon. and learned Member's Question should be addressed to the Royal Commissioners themselves.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR, as Chairman of the Finance Committee of the Exhibition, answering a further Question by the hon. and learned Member, said, that he would remind the House that in 1867 Parliament granted for the expense of the British section £130,000, and on this occasion had only granted £50,000. Therefore, great economy was required. The utmost the Commission could grant for the benefit of artizans visiting the Exhibition was £100, and this would be applied through the Society of Arts, who were gathering subscriptions in order, if possible, to send artizans from all parts of the United Kingdom.

COAL MINES—THE BLANTYRE COLLIERY EXPLOSION.—QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the Report of Inspector Moore as to the explosion which took place on the 20th August 1877, in the No. 2 Pit, Blantyre, in which he states—

“That a fall of the roof took place in the waste close to them, which brought down some fire-damp. It ignited at their naked lights, and burned them both;”

whether Inspector Moore visited the survivor, Francis McMulty, to get any information as to the cause of the explosion to frame the Report, as the survivor alone could give a true account of the explosion; and, whether it be true that an order was given for the fireman Black to be prosecuted for a breach of the special rules; and, if so, why the prosecution was abandoned some time before the explosion on the 22nd October, by which he lost his life?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: Sir, I would remind the hon. Member that he has been long familiar with the terms of Mr. Moore's Report, and that Report correctly ascribes the death of one man and the injury of another to an explosion of fire-damp on the 20th of August, 1877. Inspector Moore did not visit the boy who was injured, because while in the pit he received information from a number of men who professed to have been present, and to have witnessed the accident. No order was ever issued, and therefore no order was cancelled for a prosecution against the fireman Black. It was the duty of the Procurator Fiscal to make an investigation, with a view to prosecute anyone concerned who might be legally liable for the result. The Procurator Fiscal had not completed his investigation at the time the second explosion took place, when Black lost his life.

MR. MACDONALD: The right hon. and learned Gentleman fails to notice whether Inspector Moore examined the boy or not.

THE LORD ADVOCATE: Sir, I was under the apprehension—misapprehension, it seems—that I had stated that Inspector Moore did not examine the boy because he had received in the pit information from persons who had seen the accident.

ARMY—THE RESERVE FORCES.

QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN M'ARTHUR asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is a fact that the wives of the men of the Reserve Forces who have been called out are required to produce certificates of their marriage and the birth of their children, involving a cost of about three shillings and seven pence for each certificate, before the allowance granted by Government is paid them; and, if so, what steps the Government will adopt to save these poor people from such expense?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, the regulations require no such certificates as those mentioned; but only a declaration to be made by the Reserve man when he first comes up for service with the Colours, in which he gives the particulars of his family.

COUNTY GOVERNMENT BILL—MANAGEMENT OF RIVERS.—QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR PEEL asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, pending the passing of the County Government Bill, he will take any steps to carry out the recommendation of the Lords' Committee on Floods; and, whether he will introduce or facilitate any measure for placing the control and management of Rivers in the hands either of new Conservancy Boards or of existing Local Authorities?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, the clause referred to was inserted in the County Government Bill, not with the view of giving complete effect to the recommendations of the Lords' Committee on Floods, but with the object of taking a useful step in the direction indicated by that Report. The subject had not been lost sight of by the Government, and he hoped there would be more complete legislation with respect to it before long. He could not, however, give any assurance that he would lay on the Table any further measure dealing with it during the present Session.

MERCHANT SHIPPING—CARDIFF PILOTS.—QUESTION.

MR. PULESTON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been given to the circumstances under which two Cardiff pilots were and are still suspended; whether the explanations which have been offered by the Cardiff Pilotage Board, in reply to a Memorial to the Board of Trade by the general body of Cardiff pilots against this suspension, are deemed to be satisfactory; if it be a fact that since these pilots were suspended several serious casualties have occurred to vessels while leaving the port of Cardiff; and, whether he is informed of the circumstances under which pilots were induced to take these vessels out?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, my attention has been called to the circumstances to which my hon. Friend refers. The explanations which have been offered by the Cardiff Pilotage Board are not complete, and I have asked for further information from them. There is no record whatever in the Department of any serious casualties, other than collisions to vessels entering or leaving Cardiff, since the first pilot was suspended. The Receiver of Wreck for the district reports that "there have been some groundings where the damage has not been material," and none of these groundings have been of such a character as to necessitate their being reported as "casualties." Neither the Board of Trade nor their officer on the spot know anything of the circumstances in which pilots have been induced to take the vessels out.

DIPLOMATIC APPOINTMENTS — HON. COLONEL WELLESLEY, MILITARY ATTACHE.—QUESTION.

MR. BENETT-STANFORD asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the appointment of Military Attaché has ever been considered as a diplomatic appointment; whether any persons holding that position have ever been promoted into diplomacy in consequence; and whether on the contrary it has not always been held as a Military Staff appointment?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I am informed that the appointment of a military attaché is made in the same way as that of all other attachés. When Colonel Wellesley's appointment was notified to our Ambassador at St. Petersburg, in 1871, his Excellency was told—

"To consider Colonel Wellesley as part of his diplomatic establishment, and to employ him in the business of the Embassy in whatever way he might deem most beneficial to Her Majesty's service."

The expenses of military attachés were, until 1859, always charged on the Diplomatic Estimates, and military men have on several occasions been employed in the higher posts of the Diplomatic Service, without having passed through the rank of ordinary attaché. Colonel Rose, afterwards Lord Strathnairn, Colonel Staunton, and Colonel Mansfield are cases in point.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAY (IRELAND) BILL.

QUESTIONS.

THE O'CONOR DON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, under all the circumstances connected with the Irish Sunday Closing Bill and the interest evinced in it, he will give any facilities for proceeding with the Bill at an earlier hour in the evening than would otherwise be possible?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I have always been most anxious, on the part of the Government, to fulfil the engagement which we entered into—that in the event of certain Amendments being adopted we should give facilities for the progress of the Bill. I understand that an agreement has been come to between the promoters and the leading opponents of the Bill that, if a fair opportunity is given for discussion, the discussion should take place on the merits of the clauses, and should not be merely of a dilatory character. In view of that arrangement, I have caused the Order for the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Ireland) Bill to be placed as the second Order after Supply, and I propose to adjourn the Committee of Supply at a reasonable hour—say between 11 and 12—in order that there may be a discussion on the Bill.

MR. ONSLOW asked the hon. Member for Roscommon, Whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed with the Bill to-night; and, also, whether it is intended to put down the Bill for every Government night in the course of the Session?

THE O'CONOR DON, in reply, said, that the answer given by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House was a sufficient reply to the first part of the Question; and of course, as the Government promised facilities for the Bill, it was his intention to proceed with it that night. With regard to the further progress of the Bill, he should certainly take every means in his power of pressing it on at any hour which the majority of the House thought a reasonable one for proceeding with it.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA asked, Whether the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer is aware that the agreement entered into upon the last occasion applied only to the 1st clause?

THE O'CONOR DON said, by way of reply to the Question, he might at once say that it was not his intention to press the Bill farther than the 1st clause that night.

THE COTTON MANUFACTORIES—THE WAGES DISPUTE—RIOTS IN LANCASHIRE.—QUESTIONS.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department a Question of which he had given private Notice—namely, Whether the right hon. Gentleman was in a position to state to the House any particulars as to the riots which had occurred at Blackburn and Accrington, especially with regard to the outrages which had been committed on the houses of Colonel Jackson and Mr. Hornby, what steps had been taken to suppress those outrages, and whether those steps had been successful?

MR. DODDS said, the Question of the hon. and gallant Member had anticipated one on the same subject which he intended to put; but he begged further to ask, If the Secretary of State for the Home Department would be good enough to inform the House what steps had been taken for the protection of life and property in the disturbed districts?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, yesterday morning was the first time that I heard of these outrages, and of the burning down of Mr. Jackson's house. I immediately telegraphed to all towns where disturbances took place for full information as to the state of affairs, and asked what steps had been taken to preserve order. I found that the military had been called out before that time, and, in fact, before I received information of any rioting, though I am happy to say that no collision has taken place between the military and the persons inhabiting those districts. No one more deeply regrets than I do that the people should have committed outrages in any part of the country, and especially in my own county. The authorities are now, I believe, alive to the steps that they ought to take. I telegraphed again this morning that it was absolutely necessary that order should be preserved, and, at the same time, that I relied upon the greatest discretion being used on the part of the authorities in all those places where it was necessary to have the presence of a military force. I have received, within the last few minutes, the following telegrams, and, with the leave of the House, I will read them, as they give all the information I possess:—

“From the Chief Constable of Lancaster county.—Rioting has been commenced at Burnley, where there are one hundred police, who have been reinforced by two troops of cavalry and the infantry stationed there. No disturbances in the country districts elsewhere have commenced at present; but I am apprehensive about Darwen. Three men shot and wounded near Accrington by private individuals (not by soldiers); particulars not yet to hand. No effort is being spared to restore order and to avert the actual employment of the military. The area now affected is very extensive, and the police have been for some days largely reinforced from other parts of the country. Since telegram was sent this morning military force has been withdrawn from Darwen, by order of the magistrates, and the Chief Constable fears that serious results may ensue.”

That telegram was only received a few minutes ago, and I have not had time to reply to it. I have received the following telegram from the Mayor of Blackburn:—

“Peace since noon yesterday. Night passed very quietly. Shall keep present military force until strike is ended. No further excitement.”

The Mayor of Burnley telegraphs—

“Thanks for your telegram. Town is still disturbed; but we have a good force, civil and military. Letter by this post.”

The Mayor of Preston telegraphs—

“There have not been any disturbances at present, but an uneasy feeling prevails among the operatives. All possible precautions have been taken. The excitement appears to be subsiding. Will write report by next post.”

A telegram from Burnley, dated 2.40 to-day, says—“Quiet prevails. Military are patrolling the streets.” I have received also a message from the Chairman of Quarter Sessions, saying that the magistrates are alive to the situation, and are taking every possible precaution.

MAJOR O'GORMAN gave Notice of his intention to-morrow to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether any effort on the part of Her Majesty's Government has been made, or is about to be made, to reconcile the unfortunate differences existing in Lancashire between the millowners and workers; whether it is true that in certain districts of Lancashire the operatives, having assented to the wages and conditions imposed by the masters, have notwithstanding been driven from their work by those very masters who have thus openly violated their own solemn engagements; and, whether, should the Government refrain from bringing about amicable relations between the mill-owners and the operatives, it is the intention of the Cabinet to proclaim the various towns where disturbances have occurred, as would long since have been done under similar circumstances in Ireland?

MR. SPEAKER: I have to acquaint the hon. and gallant Gentleman that the Question he has now offered to the House involves matters of argument, and it cannot be put in the form proposed to the Home Secretary.

H.M.S. "BEAGLE" — EXECUTION OF A NATIVE OF TANNA — JUDICIAL POWERS OF NAVAL COMMANDERS.

QUESTIONS.

In reply to Mr. GORST,

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that a Report had been received from Commodore Hoskyns in reference to the execution of a native of Tanna on board Her Majesty's ship Beagle. That Paper was being considered by the Admiralty, and would be laid on the Table in a few days.

In reply to Mr. CHILDERS,

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that the decision of the Admiralty with reference to the case would also be laid upon the Table at the same time.

REGISTRATION OF DEEDS (IRELAND) —REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN,

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) said, the Commission had been for some time engaged in collecting information and making due arrangements for the proper prosecution of the important inquiries intrusted to them. Their next meeting would, he believed, be held on the 24th of May, and after that he understood they would meet weekly. The time limited for the presentation of the Report was 12 months from the 22nd of January last; and there was no probability of their being able to present their Report before the close of the Session.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE BETHNAL GREEN MUSEUM.

RESOLUTION.

MR. RITCHIE, in rising to call attention to the arrangements for admission to the Bethnal Green Museum, and to move—

"That it is desirable to give greater facilities for admission by extending the arrangements now existing on the three free days to five days in the week," said, the present arrangements were the same as those in existence at the South Kensington Museum; but arrangements which were suitable for the West End were by no means adapted to the East End of the town. For three days the Museum was open free from 10 A.M. to 10 P.M., and for three days it was open, on a payment of 6d. each person entering, from 10 to 6. That so many pay days, which had been instituted for the sake of students, were not wanted he would be able to show by figures. In the month of March the attendances on pay days only averaged 27 each day, whilst on free days the average was 3,346. On the pay days, therefore, the Museum was practically closed to the public; and he trusted the Government would see the advisability of agreeing practically with his proposal. He quite agreed there ought to be one pay day; because there were many persons, other than students, who wished to examine the works of Art when there were not such crowds present as on the free days. There was, no doubt, some question of expense with respect to gas; but he did not think the question of fees, considering how small they were, was worth considering.

Major O'Gorman

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is desirable to give greater facilities for admission to the Bethnal Green Museum, by extending the arrangements now existing on the three free days to five days in the week,"—(Mr. Ritchie,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, the Bethnal Green Museum had, since its opening, more than realized the most sanguine expectations which had been entertained with respect to it. As it was a local institution, and there were many similar institutions, the Education Department undertook to lay down its rules, and those rules were the same as were in force at South Kensington. At the latter place large numbers of persons made use of the Museum on pay days; but in Bethnal Green, the population being of a different character, the number of persons attending on pay days was comparatively small. The Government felt that as there had been a large expenditure on the Bethnal Green Museum, it should be utilized as much as possible. At the same time, it was necessary that any arrangement which might be made with that object should not afford a precedent for placing on the Treasury an undue expenditure for objects of a local character. Before making any considerable change it had been necessary to inquire into various points. The increase in the number of free days would cause a loss of a considerable portion of the fees, and, in addition, a large sum—something like £1,200 a year—would have to be spent in gas. That was an expenditure he did not think the Treasury ought to undertake. Considering, however, the case which his hon. Friend had presented to the House, he did not think it would be unreasonable to increase the number of free days to five, on the understanding that on the two extra days the gas should not be lighted, but that the Museum should be closed at six.

MR. RITCHIE said, he gladly accepted the proposal of the noble Lord, and hoped that he should obtain from him next year a still further concession.

Question put, and agreed to.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM rose to call attention to the inconvenience arising from holding the Assizes for the Northern Counties at Manchester. The effect of the arrangements which previously existed was, he said, that many men committed for trial were detained in gaol for a number of months; and it was to obviate this that additional Assizes were instituted. The result was that prisoners, who would otherwise have been tried at Newcastle, Carlisle, and Lancaster, were now sent to Manchester, and the arrangement occasioned great inconvenience. Owing to the distance from their homes prisoners, on their discharge from prison, and those who were found not guilty, had great difficulty in getting back, and were, consequently, especially in the case of those who were youthful, exposed to great temptation. Then there was another and inevitable evil connected with the system. A man who was being tried near home could get witnesses on his behalf who would spare half-a-day or a day to give testimony in his favour; but it was difficult, if not impossible, to get men, especially of the working class, to travel from Carlisle to Manchester for that purpose. An additional Assize in each of the Northern county towns would meet the difficulty, and enable justice to be carried out with much greater certainty. Another point for consideration in connection with this matter was, that if a man were tried for a murder committed in a county where murder was a rare crime, or happened only once in three or four years, it was not likely that he would receive the same consideration from the jury if he was tried in a county, in every Assize calendar of which there were four or five murders put down for trial, as he would have if tried in the county where murders were rare. On that ground, it was undesirable to take men long distances from the scene of their offences to take their trial. He hoped the Government would see their way to adopting his suggestion.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the House had decided that prisoners should not practically be kept longer in custody before their trial than three months, and it had therefore been found necessary to hold the Assizes four times in the year. It was thought necessary, under the new arrangements, to try the experiment as to how far the grouping of counties could be carried out. He was quite willing to admit that this grouping had been carried out, in some instances, too extensively. He did not think it fair that prisoners from Carlisle should be taken all the way to Manchester for trial. And, as far as that was concerned, his hon. Friend might rest assured that it should not happen again. The question of grouping counties, and the making of the best arrangements for the holding of criminal Assizes, was at present under the serious consideration of himself, the Lord Chancellor, and many of the Judges; and, as they had not yet arrived at a definite conclusion, he hoped the House would excuse him if he did not go further into the consideration of the question.

MR. PAGET contended that the convenience of localities should be fully considered in any fresh arrangements that might be made, and that too much consideration should not be given to the convenience of Judges in any re-arrangement of the Circuits.

MR. FLETCHER was glad that attention had been drawn to so important a subject. He could corroborate all that the hon. Member for Cumberland (Mr. Percy Wyndham) had said; and he hoped the Government would be able to deal with the question in a satisfactory manner.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD thought the whole plan of holding Assizes for the trial of criminal cases only should be revised. He saw no reason why the trial of civil causes should not be combined with the trial of criminal cases at all the Assizes. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would seriously consider the point, and that before long there would be one uniform system applicable to the trial of all cases alike.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, that in common with those who took an interest in Legal Procedure, he felt great satisfaction at having heard the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, that the re-organization of the Circuits, for the despatch of the criminal business of the country, was under the serious consideration of the Government. He was sure that that statement would be received with no less satisfaction outside the House. He (Sir Eardley Wilmot) had last Session brought forward the subject of the inadequacy of existing arrangements for the despatch of civil business in the Provincial districts, especially at Manchester and Liverpool, at both of which places he knew that much dissatisfaction was felt. He hoped, therefore, that while providing greater facilities for the trial of prisoners throughout the country, Her Majesty's Government would also see the necessity of improving the administration of civil business, and meeting the obvious requirements of the public in that respect. He had submitted to the House, on the occasion to which he had alluded, a Memorial from the inhabitants of Manchester, by which it appeared that, in consequence of the limited number of days allotted to the trial of causes at Manchester, and owing to the Commission day at Liverpool coming immediately after that of that town, the civil business at Manchester was frequently hurried over, and important actions either withdrawn or referred at the last moment, to the great detriment and expense of the suitors, who complained that their matters were very imperfectly transacted. Whether the remedy for this should be more time given to the Assizes, or more Judicial strength, it was not for him to say. He had not had the good fortune to hear the able and eloquent speech of the hon. and learned Attorney General on a former evening, when introducing his measure for the amendment of the Criminal Law; but, from the report he had read in the papers, he was sure that the Bill about to be introduced by the Government would give general satisfaction, and he could not help saying that no more important measure had been proposed during the present Session. His right hon. Friend the Home Secretary could not do better than accompany the Bill establishing a Criminal Code by an improvement and re-construction of the existing very imperfect arrangements for the trial of causes, both criminal and civil.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS.

(1.) Question [May 13] again proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £376,545, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1879, for Stationery, Printing, Binding, and Printed Books for the several Departments of Government in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and some Dependencies, and for Stationery, Binding, and Printing Paper for the two Houses of Parliament, including the Salaries and Expenses of the Stationery Office."

MR. O'DONNELL said, he objected, in this Vote, to the sum of £289 for stationery for the purposes of the Queen's Colleges in Ireland.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must point out to the hon. Member that there was no item of £289 for the Queen's Colleges in Ireland.

MR. O'DONNELL said, they had been informed by the Government that a portion of this Vote was intended for the purposes of the Queen's University in Ireland, and they calculated that the amount that would be so applied would be about £289. In order to justify themselves in making that calculation, they quoted the figure given in the Estimates of a year or two ago, and it was for that reason he should move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £289, unless the Government would give them an assurance that, under no circumstances, would any portion of the Vote be spent in the present year for the support of the Queen's University in Ireland. He maintained that this Institution did not deserve to receive any grant of public money. Of course, neither he nor any Irish Member would rise in his place on the present occasion to oppose a Vote of this kind without having good reasons for so doing. If the money which they were asked to vote for the service of the Queen's University were really intended to be devoted to promoting the usefulness of that Institution, they would not think of persevering in their opposition. But if they could show that such would not be the effect of the application of this money, he thought they had a right to ask the Committee to diminish the Vote by that amount.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must point out to the hon. Member that, while he would be in Order in objecting to the money being applied to a purpose which he deprecated, he would not be in Order in entering into any discussion of the merits of the Queen's University on this Vote.

MR. O'DONNELL was afraid he had misunderstood the ruling, because he failed to perceive how he could ask the Committee on his ipse dixit to reject the Vote. He apprehended that it was not sufficient for a Member of the Committee to say that he objected to this or that Vote, without stating the grounds of his objection. If he objected to public money being voted for the use of the Queen's University, he did so for a certain reason; but he could not presume to ask hon. Members to follow him blindly into the Lobby, without giving any reasons for the request he made to them.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member seemed not to have observed that the proper time would come when that question would be discussed on a Vote for the purpose of the Queen's University; but the present Vote was one for the Stationery Office, and upon that it was desirable to keep the arguments addressed to the Committee within the scope of the matters relating to the Stationery Office.

MR. PARNELL remarked, that if the present Vote should receive the sanction of the Committee, a certain sum of money, amounting to £451,745, would be provided for the purposes of the Stationery Office. In looking at the purposes to which it was proposed to apply this money, he observed that a sum of £289 was to be applied to purposes—"No, no!"—he observed that stationery to the amount of £289 was to be issued—"No, no!"

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: I beg to rise to Order.

MR. PARNELL: I am speaking to a point of Order.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that the hon. Member for Meath was in possession.

MR. PARNELL said, he observed that it was intimated to them that £289 was applied for the purposes of stationery and printing in the Queen's University in Ireland during the years 1876 and 1877. From that he inferred that, out of the sum which they were now asked to vote, a somewhat similar sum would be applied during the coming or present financial year for the same purposes—that was, for the purposes of the Queen's Colleges and University in Ireland. He objected to the Department applying any money for stationery or printing for the purposes of these Institutions; and he desired to have the opportunity of stating to the Committee the reasons why he thought that the application of that portion of this large sum which they were now asked to vote would be a waste of public money. Therefore, he wished to reduce the Vote by the sum of £289, which the Government had informed them they applied in 1876 and 1877 for the purpose of stationery and printing in the Queen's University in Ireland. The Chairman had said, just now, that they could discuss that question when they came to the main Vote. But there was no portion of the main Vote set aside for the purpose of stationery and printing for the Queen's Colleges; and if they discussed that question on the main Vote, they would do so without having any opportunity of fixing upon a particular item in the Vote. The item in reference to this point was now before them; or, if it was not, the Government had at least intimated very plainly to them that they would apply a certain portion of this Vote for these purposes to the Queen's Colleges and University in Ireland. Therefore, he submitted, with great deference, that he should be in Order in stating the reasons why he objected to having any portion of this money devoted to that purpose, and also in moving to reduce the amount of the Vote by the sum of £289 or £300, which the Government had intimated to them would be so applied.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member would be in Order in moving to reduce the Vote before the Committee by the sum of £300 or £289, or whatever other sum he thought proper; and he might also justify that Motion by stating that he believed that some such sum was likely to be applied to purposes which he deprecated; but there was no item in the present Vote which raised the question of the Queen's Colleges or University; and therefore, in the event of the hon. Member inducing the Committee to adopt his view, it would not have the effect of depriving these Institutions of any portion of the money that might be required for them. It would, therefore, be plain to the Committee—and, he trusted, it might be clear to the hon. Member—that any discussion of the constitution or merits of the Queen's University would be wholly beside the question now before the Committee.

MAJOR NOLAN wished to refer to what took place the other night. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis) then assured the Committee that, from his point of view, the proposed reduction of this Vote would be most disastrous to his Party in Ireland. He (Major Nolan) would not say it would be disastrous; but if they were to believe what the hon. Member for the City of Londonderry had said, the effect would be, at any rate, of very great importance. Consequently, he did not think it could be a waste of time on their part to discuss this Vote; and he thought his hon. Friends around him would be quite right in adhering to their intention to reduce it by £289, because that was the only sum in the Vote which was connected with anything that was objectionable from their point of view. They found the connection between the sum of £289 and the Queen's University established, because the Government had declared that in a past year that sum had been expended on that Institution. Now, the proposition which he made the other night he would venture to repeat to the Committee, and it was, that the sum of £289 should be omitted from the Vote, the Government taking that money later on, when the Committee were asked to pass the Vote for the Queen's University. It was, after all, a mere question of detail, whether they should vote the money for stationery for each Department separately, or lump the various sums together under the one head of Stationery Office. He did not say that it might not be better, and more convenient, under ordinary circumstances, to adopt the latter course; but he thought that it would be far better, in regard to a disputed item, that it should be taken in connection with the main sum of money voted for an Institution to which objection was taken. It might be thought that voting stationery and paper for the Queen's University was a small question; and although that might be so considered in one aspect of the case, yet it had really become a very large question for the Irish Members to consider whether they should pass any Vote connected with this particular Institution. If they had the great moral advantage of having the great majority of the Irish Representatives on their side, he thought it was obviously their policy on every occasion to oppose the voting of any money for the Queen's Colleges. It was only by taking that course that they would show the Irish people that their Representatives continued to do their duty, but that a majority of English and Scotch Members had determined to overrule them on this question. He would not enter into the great question of education, as another opportunity would be afforded for discussing that subject. But they had been taunted with coming there and begging for money from the Imperial Exchequer. Well, the Irish Members were willing now to show that they did not want public money. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer would adopt the suggestion that he had made, it would afford an easy means of cutting the Gordian Knot on the present occasion; but, otherwise, he hoped that the omission of the £289 would be pressed to a division, in order to show that the majority of Irish Members were anxious, on every occasion, to prevent money, or anything else, being given to the Queen's Colleges, until all denominations in Ireland had equally advantageous educational establishments.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he understood that at the present moment the Committee were rather engaged upon a question of Order, raised by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) and others, and that the point of Order was this—The Vote about to be taken was for a gross sum to be expended through the Stationery Office on all the Public Services in which stationery was required. Hon. Members found that a certain portion of that sum would, in accordance with the usual practice, be expended upon the Queen's Colleges. They desired to challenge the application of any public money to the Queen's Colleges, and they, therefore, proposed to omit a certain sum from the Vote, being about the sum which they presumed might fairly be taken as representing what would be spent upon stationery for the Queen's Colleges. Then they said that, in order to justify themselves in making that proposal, it was necessary that they should show why with them these Colleges were an objectionable Institution, and why no public money should be given to them. Well, it might seem to them that it was unreasonable that they should propose to strike out that portion of the Vote unless they showed that, and they might say that they could not show it unless they were allowed to go into the whole subject of the Queen's Colleges. But, on the other hand, he apprehended there could be no doubt that the Rule which the Chairman had laid down was the one which must guide the Committee. It was that, in the discussion of this Vote, it was impossible for any Member, in a regular and orderly way, to go into the whole question of the merits of the Queen's Colleges; and the inference which he thought they must draw from that ruling was, that the present was not the proper occasion for the raising of that discussion. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway (Major Nolan) had said that the Government might alter the form of the Vote so as to get the Committee out of the difficulty which it was in by withdrawing the small sum that was proposed to be applied to the Queen's Colleges, and voting it hereafter when they came to the Vote for these Institutions. That would be an inconvenient way of proceeding, and really it would make no difference, because the withdrawal of £300 or £3,000 from the Vote would not in any way impede the expenditure of so much of the money as was voted for the Stationery Office being applied to the Queen's Colleges so long as they were, and continued to be, recognized as an Institution which was entitled to Government support. But what he would undertake on behalf of the Government—he believed that it had already been promised—was this—If when they came to the Vote for the Queen's Colleges that Vote should be negatived, he would undertake that no portion whatever of the sum voted for the Stationery Office should be applied to them. That would obviate the difficulty which had been suggested by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), who had said that they

in Ireland during the years 1876 and 1877. From that he inferred that, out of the sum which they were now asked to vote, a somewhat similar sum would be applied during the coming or present financial year for the same purposes—that was, for the purposes of the Queen's Colleges and University in Ireland. He objected to the Department applying any money for stationery or printing for the purposes of these Institutions; and he desired to have the opportunity of stating to the Committee the reasons why he thought that the application of that portion of this large sum which they were now asked to vote would be a waste of public money. Therefore, he wished to reduce the Vote by the sum of £289, which the Government had informed them they applied in 1876 and 1877 for the purpose of stationery and printing in the Queen's University in Ireland. The Chairman had said, just now, that they could discuss that question when they came to the main Vote. But there was no portion of the main Vote set aside for the purpose of stationery and printing for the Queen's Colleges; and if they discussed that question on the main Vote, they would do so without having any opportunity of fixing upon a particular item in the Vote. The item in reference to this point was now before them; or, if it was not, the Government had at least intimated very plainly to them that they would apply a certain portion of this Vote for these purposes to the Queen's Colleges and University in Ireland. Therefore, he submitted, with great deference, that he should be in Order in stating the reasons why he objected to having any portion of this money devoted to that purpose, and also in moving to reduce the amount of the Vote by the sum of £289 or £300, which the Government had intimated to them would be so applied.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. the hon. Member inducing the Committee to adopt his view, it would not have the effect of depriving these Institutions of any portion of the money that might be required for them. It would, therefore, be plain to the Committee—and, he trusted, it might be clear to the hon. Member—that any discussion of the constitution or merits of the Queen's University would be wholly beside the question now before the Committee.

MAJOR NOLAN wished to refer to what took place the other night. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis) then assured the Committee that, from his point of view, the proposed reduction of this Vote would be most disastrous to his Party in Ireland. He (Major Nolan) would not say it would be disastrous; but if they were to believe what the hon. Member for the City of Londonderry had said, the effect would be, at any rate, of very great importance. Consequently, he did not think it could be a waste of time on their part to discuss this Vote; and he thought his hon. Friends around him would be quite right in adhering to their intention to reduce it by £289, because that was the only sum in the Vote which was connected with anything that was objectionable from their point of view. They found the connection between the sum of £289 and the Queen's University established, because the Government had declared that in a past year that sum had been expended on that Institution. Now, the proposition which he made the other night he would venture to repeat to the Committee, and it was, that the sum of £289 should be omitted from the Vote, the Government taking that money later on, when the Committee were asked to pass the Vote for the Queen's University. It was, after all, a mere question of detail, whether they should vote the money for stationery for each Department separately, or lump the various sums together under the one head of Stationery Office. He did not say that it might not be better, and more convenient, under ordinary circumstances, to adopt the latter course; but he thought that it would be far better, in regard to a disputed item, that it should be taken in connection with the main sum of money voted for an Institution to which objection was taken. It might be thought that voting stationery and paper for the

that the Committee be divided against the whole Vote. Why did not hon. Gentlemen opposite at once challenge the whole Vote of £480,000, because £289 in stationery was supplied last year on account of the Queen's Colleges, if they really meant to take that course? Whenever they threw out a challenge to go to a division, it was accepted on that side of the House; but when it was thrown to them, they always delayed from it.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the Question before the Committee was the Vote for the Stationery Office, and upon that the hon. Member for Dungarvan had intimated his intention to move an Amendment that it be reduced by the sum of £289. He had pointed out to him that it was quite competent for him to bring on that Amendment; but, at the same time, he thought it his duty to state that the Amendment was not yet before the Committee. He must, therefore, ask the hon. Member for Dungarvan, whether he intended to move that Amendment?

MR. O'DONNELL expressed his willingness to withdraw his Amendment, and to raise his objection to the supply of stationery to the Queen's University by challenging the entire Vote. He agreed with the hon. Member for Meath, that the Government provoked that course by the way in which they had framed the Estimates. He therefore moved the reduction of the whole Vote.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY would like to know whether the Vote of £450,000 was not to be applied for stationery in the different Departments? If that were so, he would wish to be informed in what way this sum of £289 was to be expended? No doubt it was to be applied, amongst other things, in providing three or four Institutions in Ireland with a certain amount of stationery; but he did not think that they were likely to get rapidly through the Estimates, when such arguments were addressed to the Committee as that they had just heard from the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis). He had told them that when the Government applied to Parliament for a Vote of £450,000, the House ought to thank the Government for giving it any information as to the manner in which that large sum was to be expended. They did not, however, thank the Government for giving them information, for it was the duty of the Government to furnish it, and it was the duty of the Committee to see that it was given. For his own part, he deprecated the enunciation of such a doctrine. Another point he wished to raise was this—It might be that when Parliament struck out a sum of £289 from the Estimates, as not applicable to a particular purpose, it would be within the power of the Government to take other means to perform the service which the House of Commons had said should not be performed. To that he entirely demurred, and he thought the Committee was interested in knowing whether or not it was correct; for, if so, Parliament had no control over the Estimates?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON observed, that he would first reply on the question of the information given with regard to the particular distribution of the Vote of £450,000, now asked for on behalf of the Stationery Office. What was done in the composing of the Estimates of the year was for the sums to be inserted on account of the stationery which each Department had demanded from the Stationery Office in the preceding year. At the end of the year, when the proper accounts were made up, the whole was put together, and it became possible then to draw up such a table as appeared in the Estimates, showing how the sum of money granted to the Stationery Office had been distributed. In that way a table, 1876-7, showed how the money granted at the beginning of that year was distributed. On the Estimates so prepared the Government asked the House of Commons to grant £450,000 for the Stationery Office. Supposing that the House subsequently agreed to the Vote for the Queen's Colleges, the sum allowed to the Stationery Office, even if minus the £289, would enable it to supply the demands of the Queen's Colleges. On the other hand, if Parliament refused to make the grant to the Queen's University, the Stationery Office, although they might possibly have been prepared to meet the demands of the Queen's Colleges, would not be justified in supplying them, and would pay the money back through the Exchequer. If this particular sum of £289 were now struck out, and the House subsequently agreed that the Queen's Colleges should might, perhaps, negative the Vote for the Queen's Colleges, but that as they had granted the stationery it would still be supplied to them. He really hoped that they would not be called upon to discuss any further the point of Order; but that hon. Gentlemen, if they thought it desirable to try the question, and put in what was in the nature of a protest on their part on the present occasion, would move a reduction of the Vote and go to a division, remembering that the question of the Queen's Colleges themselves would be a matter for subsequent discussion. As he had already said, more than once, the Government would take care that ample opportunity was given for the discussion of that important subject on its merits.

MR. BIGGAR said, he had never before heard a statement made by the Government to the effect that it made no difference whether a sum of money were struck out from the Votes or not, for that stationery would be supplied all the same to the Queen's University. He thought that was a most immoral doctrine, and one which struck at the root of the system of voting public money. He also thought that it was thoroughly unreasonable to ask Parliament to vote first, and then to hear arguments on the policy of the Vote. In his opinion, the only sensible plan was to allow the discussion to go on then.

MR. PARNELL wished to make a suggestion to the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), in consequence of the allegation of the Government that the reduction of the Vote by £289 would not affect the supply of stationery to the Queen's University. He should suggest, if that were so, that the hon. Member for Dungarvan should withdraw his Amendment, and should move to strike out the entire Vote. He was very serious in his opposition to the Queen's University in Ireland; and he could not but think that the power that the Government assumed of applying money, voted for this purpose to any Department, was a very faulty way of applying the Estimates. It was very strange that sums of money should be accounted for in the Public Services by items, when they were not intended to be applied to the Services for which they were voted. It placed the opponents of any particular Service in a dilemma; and the only way in which they could protest against any sum of money being spent on the Queen's Colleges would be by objecting to the whole Vote. For that reason, he should advise the hon. Member for Dungarvan to object to the whole Vote; and, in the meantime, the Committee would have an opportunity of discussing the other items included in the Vote. He was determined not to vote any sum of money to the Queen's Colleges without entering his protest against it; and if they could not object to the particular application of any sum of money by the Government, they must divide against the whole Vote. The fault lay with the Government in framing the Estimate in this manner. In future, he should consider that it would be desirable for the Government to arrange these matters in a different way, so that hon. Members who objected to any particular sum would be able to do so, without being under the necessity of opposing the whole Vote.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS observed, that it seemed to him that the Committee, to a certain extent, had suffered, in point of time and convenience, from the fairness and ingenuousness of the Government in dealing with this particular Vote. Had the Government moved, without specific details, for a supply for stationery for the Public Service, no one could have objected to the Estimate; but just because the Government had been fair and explicit in giving a larger amount of information as to the portions in which the stationery and printing was supplied to the different Departments, the Committee had been wearied by the various discussions on the matter. The objections raised, it was said, were conscientious ones; but when anybody said proudly that he did anything for conscience sake, he could not but suspect. He liked to hear a business argument and business reasons given when a Vote in Supply was opposed; but when he heard an item of £289 was objected to from conscientious motives, he could not but wonder that this should prove a dead fly in the ointment. This little matter it was which disturbed the digestion of hon. Members opposite, and which incited them to discuss, over and over again, the merits of the Vote for the Stationery Department. The hon. Member for Meath, who had last spoken, had recommended that the Committee be divided against the whole Vote. Why did not hon. Gentlemen opposite at once challenge the whole Vote of £480,000, because £289 in stationery was supplied last year on account of the Queen's Colleges, if they really meant to take that course? Whenever they threw out a challenge to go to a division, it was accepted on that side of the House; but when it was thrown to them, they always delayed from it.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the Question before the Committee was the Vote for the Stationery Office, and upon that the hon. Member for Dungarvan had intimated his intention to move an Amendment that it be reduced by the sum of £289. He had pointed out to him that it was quite competent for him to bring on that Amendment; but, at the same time, he thought it his duty to state that the Amendment was not yet before the Committee. He must, therefore, ask the hon. Member for Dungarvan, whether he intended to move that Amendment?

MR. O'DONNELL expressed his willingness to withdraw his Amendment, and to raise his objection to the supply of stationery to the Queen's University by challenging the entire Vote. He agreed with the hon. Member for Meath, that the Government provoked that course by the way in which they had framed the Estimates. He therefore moved the reduction of the whole Vote.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY would like to know whether the Vote of £450,000 was not to be applied for stationery in the different Departments? If that were so, he would wish to be informed in what way this sum of £289 was to be expended? No doubt it was to be applied, amongst other things, in providing three or four Institutions in Ireland with a certain amount of stationery; but he did not think that they were likely to get rapidly through the Estimates, when such arguments were addressed to the Committee as that they had just heard from the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis). He had told them that when the Government applied to Parliament for a Vote of £450,000, the House ought to thank the Government for giving it any information as to the manner in which that large sum was to be expended. They did not, however, thank the Government for giving them information, for it was the duty of the Government to furnish it, and it was the duty of the Committee to see that it was given. For his own part, he deprecated the enunciation of such a doctrine. Another point he wished to raise was this—It might be that when Parliament struck out a sum of £289 from the Estimates, as not applicable to a particular purpose, it would be within the power of the Government to take other means to perform the service which the House of Commons had said should not be performed. To that he entirely demurred, and he thought the Committee was interested in knowing whether or not it was correct; for, if so, Parliament had no control over the Estimates?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON observed, that he would first reply on the question of the information given with regard to the particular distribution of the Vote of £450,000, now asked for on behalf of the Stationery Office. What was done in the composing of the Estimates of the year was for the sums to be inserted on account of the stationery which each Department had demanded from the Stationery Office in the preceding year. At the end of the year, when the proper accounts were made up, the whole was put together, and it became possible then to draw up such a table as appeared in the Estimates, showing how the sum of money granted to the Stationery Office had been distributed. In that way a table, 1876-7, showed how the money granted at the beginning of that year was distributed. On the Estimates so prepared the Government asked the House of Commons to grant £450,000 for the Stationery Office. Supposing that the House subsequently agreed to the Vote for the Queen's Colleges, the sum allowed to the Stationery Office, even if minus the £289, would enable it to supply the demands of the Queen's Colleges. On the other hand, if Parliament refused to make the grant to the Queen's University, the Stationery Office, although they might possibly have been prepared to meet the demands of the Queen's Colleges, would not be justified in supplying them, and would pay the money back through the Exchequer. If this particular sum of £289 were now struck out, and the House subsequently agreed that the Queen's Colleges should be continued, the Stationery Office would have no money to pay for the printing required by the Queen's University and sanctioned by the House. That would necessitate a Supplementary Estimate. A similar table to that in the present Estimates would be given for 1879-80 in a future year, showing how this sum of £450,000 had been used; and if the Queen's Colleges were left out of the Vote by the House, no sum would then appear in the next table to the credit of the Queen's Colleges.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, that the explanation given of this £289 was to the effect that the sum would probably be required for the purpose of supplying the Queen's University with stationery. It was said that the stationery might not be required, and that, if not required, the money would be returned to the Treasury. He would like the Chancellor of the Exchequer to look at the matter in this way—Here was a large Vote of £450,000, and a little matter of £289 was sticking in the throats of his hon. Friends. Was it worth while to fight about so small a matter? Would it not be better to withdraw the sum of £289 from the present Vote, and add it to the Vote for the Queen's Colleges? The sum should be withdrawn from the present Estimate, on the distinct understanding that it would be brought on when the whole of the question of the Queen's Colleges was discussed.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY could not understand the attempt to diminish the value of the control of that House over the public expenditure. This money was to be spent in the year on particular things. Suppose, for one moment, that the items given were omitted, did anyone think that the large sum in the Estimates would be voted by the Committee without previous inquiry as to the objects for which it would be applied? And that consideration showed the necessity for the enumeration of the items in the Estimates, and that in placing them there the Government had performed no perfunctory duty. He could not, therefore, follow the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis) in what he had stated with regard to the ingenuousness of the Government in giving correct details of the different items. He understood that it had been suggested by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) that the question of the Queen's Colleges was to be shelved until somebody moved to reduce the entire amount of the Vote. He wished to call attention to another "fly in the ointment." He used the expression of the hon. Member for Londonderry, and he hoped it would not interfere with his digestion; although it was very remarkable that the hon. Member should use so contradictory a simile—as if anyone ever took ointment internally.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS observed, that he had never made the statement in the connection imputed to him.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, that it was unimportant, and he would not pursue the subject. What he wished to mention was, that under the head of Stationery a certain amount was included for the supply of the Education Department. The Education Department in Ireland spent on stationery and printing, during the last year, £2,174. In Ireland they had a different system of National Education to that which existed in Scotland. In the latter country, the sum expended in the same year by the Education Department for stationery was only £124. He wanted to call the attention of the Committee to the extraordinarily large amount spent by the Irish Education Department for printing and stationery, and to suggest that this very large amount could be cut down. He thought he was in Order in mentioning this matter. The Education Department in Ireland arrogated to itself the right of printing, publishing, and supplying copybooks to the schools. It also supplied the schools under its control with all the literature they required, to the exclusion of all other publications, publishers, and printers. One result of that system he should not discuss, because it would be without the ruling of the Chair to go into the subject of the disadvantage under which Irish publishers laboured, in not being permitted to supply the schools. But there was another objection to the system by which the schools in Ireland were allowed none but books published by the Stationery Department; for, were the market open, it was probable a very different class of books would be introduced, and a much larger number of people would patronize the schools. Apart from the injury inflicted on the trade, the result of this monopoly was very detrimental in other ways; because, if the contracts were open to public competition, it would, undoubtedly, be found that private enterprise could supply these books at a much lower rate than was now charged by the Printing and Publishing Department. Without pressing for a vote, he would recommend the subject to the notice of the Educational Department. It was not alone in this branch that the Government confined to itself the monopoly of printing and publishing. His attention had been directed to other Departments; and he found there was scarcely any work of a similar description to be executed in Ireland that was not kept out of the hands of the trades, and under complete Government control, to the great loss of the public, and in a manner perfectly unknown in this country or in Scotland.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he would move, as an Amendment, that no part of this Vote be applied to the providing of stationery for the Queen's Colleges or University in Ireland.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that such a Motion is out of Order, and that he can only move a reduction of the Vote.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he did not propose to question the ruling of the Chairman, but would call his attention to the fact that some years ago, when the Dover Mail Contract, concluded with Mr. Churchward, was under discussion, a similar Motion was made and agreed to. The course he now proposed to pursue was, therefore, in strict accordance with Parliamentary precedent.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. Member that in the case to which he refers the Proviso was moved by the Government, who were responsible for the Vote.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY asked, whether the Government had any privileges in connection with the Estimates which were not shared by the Representatives of the people?

THE CHAIRMAN: The Government necessarily bring forward the Estimates on their own responsibility and discretion, and place them before the House in the form and manner most convenient for discussion. It is the function of the Committee to criticize, reduce, or reject the Votes; but the responsibility of framing them rests with the Government.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY replied, that it appeared by the Estimates that a sum of money was required for certain purposes. His proposition was, that the money be so granted to the Government, but with a Proviso that no portion of the Vote should be applied to a particular purpose. He failed to see what were the functions of hon. Members, if it was not competent to them to object in this manner. He asked, whether he was precluded from moving the Amendment?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member will understand that he cannot proceed with the Motion indicated.

MR. PARNELL said, the Government had framed this Vote in such a way as to render impossible the rejection of any particular item, and he was, therefore, unable to move the reduction of the Vote by any specific amount. There were, however, several items in the Estimates by the reduction of which it would be ensured that no money would go this year to the Queen's Colleges and University in Ireland for the purposes of stationery and printing. The Vote was divided into items, none of which referred explicitly to the printing and stationery for the Queen's Colleges and University. Hon. Members were told by the Government that the sum of £289 was applied to that purpose in 1876-7; and he inferred that the Government, in framing the Estimates, had allowed for a similar amount in the present Vote. He wished to point out to the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) that there were four other items, by moving the omission of which he would attain his object. Under the sub-headings E, F, G, H, there was the sum of £271,000 for printing, paper, parchment, and vellum. He thought that, as any expenditure for stationery and printing for the Queen's Colleges and University in Ireland would come from this amount, in the event of the Committee being induced to omit the items under these sub-headings, it would result that no money for these purposes would go to the Colleges this year.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY remarked, that in the case of the Dover Contract with Mr. Churchward, the Government retained the item in the Estimates for a period of two years. The Government then accepted a Motion precisely analogous to that which he now made, and which he held it was competent to them to entertain.

MR. PARNELL said, he must direct the attention of the Secretary to the Treasury to a matter that was attracting considerable notice in Dublin. He saw, under the sub-head A, that the Examiner received a salary of £138 a-year. He did not know whether that gentleman was responsible for the matter he was about to complain of; but, if so, he would move the reduction of the total amount under this sub-head by the amount of his salary. His complaint was, that in consequence of a Memorial presented by the printers in Dublin to the employers in the trade, seeking for an increase of wages to the extent of 2s. weekly for time-work, and of from 6 to 7½ per cent for piece-work, the head of the Department and a considerable number of the employers having met to consider this very moderate proposal, it resulted that a fortnight's notice was given to every member of the Typographical Society in Dublin, including those printers who were employed for the Government Offices. During the interval, many of the employers and some newspaper proprietors, among whom he would mention The Freeman's Journal, agreed to the advance of wages, and continued to employ the men. A few employers, however, had not followed this very proper example. The Queen's Printing Office, where from 60 to 70 hands were previously engaged, was now closed—Mr. Thom, the manager of the office, having failed to get workmen from England to supply the places of those who were on strike. Some English printers did go to Dublin, and went to work in the Queen's Printing Office; but after finding out the position of things, and how very unfairly the manager of the office had acted towards his old hands, they refused to work any longer in the establishment, and returned to England. Ten weeks had elapsed since this rupture took place, and during that time Mr. Thom and his agents had searched all the large centres of industry and large Provincial towns in the United Kingdom for men; but, up to the present, their efforts had not been successful, as although in numerous instances workmen were engaged, when they found out the actual state of affairs they returned to the localities whence they came. But Mr. Thom, having discovered that it was impossible for him to get enough men from England to fill the places of the printers who were dismissed, had sent all the Irish printing to be done in England; and, consequently, the journeymen, who asked for an advance of 2s. a-week, had been thrown out of employment permanently; and there was really no hope of their getting work again in Dublin, unless the hon. Baronet who had charge of the Estimates told the Committee that he thought the Irish printing ought to be done in Ireland. Very few of the large Dublin employers had refused to grant these reasonable demands of the men, and the course which Mr. Thom had taken appeared to him (Mr. Parnell) to be altogether unjustifiable. That being so, he should be glad to hear from the hon. Baronet where Mr. Thom's salary appeared in the Vote, and whether he was the gentleman described as the "Assistant Examiner of Printing and Binding" in Dublin?

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member move to reduce the Vote?

MR. PARNELL said, he had not moved the reduction of the Vote. He had only asked for information.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, Mr. Thom's salary was paid him for taking charge of The Dublin Gazette, and the Assistant Examiner of Printing and Binding was a kind of foreman in the office, who had to see certain work carried out. As to the rupture between Mr. Thom and his men, he knew nothing of it. Mr. Thom was bound to perform certain work; and, therefore, he was justified in seeking for labour during the time of the differences between him and his men.

MR. PARNELL asked the Secretary to the Treasury, which was the item in the Vote providing for Mr. Thom's salary? Unless he had that information, he should be obliged to move the reduction of the Vote by the amount paid to the Controller of the Department. He desired to reduce the Vote; but he did not know what item he could select in order to deal with Mr. Thom's stipend. The Vote was framed in such an extraordinary manner, and so few details were given, that it was utterly impossible for a private Member to find out what he wanted to know.

MR. O'DONNELL said, the complaint in this matter was, that a Government Department in Dublin, in order to defeat Dublin workmen, first tried to import labour from England and Scotland, and, failing that, had exported the Dublin work of the Government to England and Scotland. The Dublin printing of the Government was now being done in Edinburgh, and that course had been adopted for the purpose of saving the Dublin Department the necessity of yielding to the just demands of the printers. Of course, to a certain extent, it was quite right that an employer should go to a far distance for labour in order to counteract what he considered to be an unfair combination; but in this case the question arose as to what was, and what was not, an unfair combination? The charge against the Government Printing Office in Dublin was this—that whereas the printers, who had only asked for an advance of wages once before in the course of half-a-century, and who, upon this occasion, had only asked for an increase of 2s. a-week on the establishment wages and 6 or 7 per cent upon piece-work, the Government Department, backed by the influence of the Stationery Office, first tried to defeat that very moderate demand by the importation of workmen, and, failing that, they had the work “jobbed out” at Edinburgh. He was informed that one of the reasons why the work could be done cheaply at Edinburgh, and thus the opposition of the Dublin printers easily defied, was that in Edinburgh the duty was being performed by females. Female printers were doing this work at a cheap rate, and the regular printers of Dublin were thrust out of employment in this unfair manner. Undoubtedly, labour had its duties, but so, also, had capital; and there ought to be some strong reasons shown before the Irish Government printing was taken out of the hands of the Irish workmen, and handed over to females in England and Scotland. He thought this a very serious question, and he was sorry to see the Government did not appear to be previously aware of what had been taking place.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, Mr. Thom had a very lucrative contract for the publication of Government papers in Ireland, and he must say he did his work admirably. There was recently a strike in Dublin, on the refusal of an application for an advance of wages to the printers. There were other printing offices besides that of the Government in the city, and he believed the proprietors of most of these—and especially the newspaper proprietors—conceded the demands of their men; and it was only right to say that even now, with this increase, the wages of printers in Dublin were less than those given to similar workmen in England and Scotland. The point before the Committee was this—Mr. Thom had a monopoly given him by the Government of this extensive printing; and while he ought to be protected against unfair competition, on the other hand the Secretary to the Treasury ought to take care that the monopoly which was given to that gentleman was not used to oppress the people whom he employed. If the Secretary to the Treasury would say he would look into the matter and take it up in a right spirit—which he (Mr. Mitchell Henry) was sure he would do if he took it up at all—something might be done. It certainly was not right that printing, which the Government contracted to have done in Dublin, should be taken by the contractor to be executed in Edinburgh, unless there be some very strong reason for such a course being pursued. It was clear that the attention of the Government had not yet been called to the matter, and he hoped they would now look into it. Mr. Thom's labours in the cause of everything that was good in Ireland were so great, and the extraordinary volumes of statistics which he produced entirely by his own exertions were so valuable, that he (Mr. Mitchell Henry) was most unwilling to say anything, or to take any course, which should injure him. But, at the same time, he thought the Secretary to the Treasury ought to look into the matter, and see that the printing should really be done in Dublin, when it could be executed there on fair terms. He would not say a word against Mr. Thom, who richly deserved the support of that House for all he had done in the way of facilitating legislation by the admirable statistics he had compiled; but, at the same time, he must not be allowed to over-ride poor people by the great weight given him in consequence of his having this monopoly from the Government.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he agreed with the hon. Gentleman who had last spoken as to the admirable work which Mr. Thom performed. As to the direct salary which he received, it appeared in the Estimates—namely, £100—and that was paid for the assistance he rendered in editing The Dublin Gazette. That sum, he believed, represented the whole of the Government salary which was paid to Mr. Thom; and, considering his services, he did not regard that as an extravagant sum. With reference to the question of printing, it was not his wish in any way to injure the trade; but the Government required certain work to be speedily done, and, owing to the strike, Mr. Thom seemed to consider the best plan to adopt was to have it executed in other places. However, at the request of one or two hon. Gentlemen, he would consent to look into the matter.

MR. PARNELL said, the Secretary to the Treasury was mistaken if he supposed his attention had not been directed to this subject before, because his hon. Friend the Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) alluded to it on Monday night. True, he did not do so at any length, and probably he did not make any impression upon the hon. Baronet; but as the hon. Baronet had been kind enough to say that he would look into the question, he (Mr. Parnell) would not persevere in his opposition to the Vote on that ground. With regard to the question itself, it was quite competent for the Committee to say, if contracts for printing to be performed in Dublin were entered into, that the work should not be sent by the contractor to be executed in Edinburgh or Glasgow, or elsewhere, and especially on so small a reason that the men had asked for an advance to the extent of 4s. a-week. There was no such emergency in getting out the work as the hon. Baronet seemed to think. The printing had only been put out because Mr. Thom said—"I will put down this strike; I will use the power and authority which the very lucrative Government contract I hold will enable me to use; I will enter upon this contest, and I will put down this demand from the men." He (Mr. Parnell) hoped the hon. Baronet would carefully look into the whole question.

Mr. Mitchell Henry

MR. T. CAVE said, he must protest against the new doctrine sought to be laid down by the hon. Member for Meath. If a contractor obtained a contract from that House to execute printing at a price, he was entitled—always supposing he was fair and reasonable—to get his work done as cheaply and as well as he could. He was sorry that the printers of Dublin had quarrelled with their master; but, at the same time, that was no reason in the world for laying down the doctrine—which would work most mischievously—that a contractor in that country or this had not a perfect right to get his work done as cheaply as he could.

MR. PARNELL said, the House had laid down an entirely different principle. The House had decided that the printing referring to Scotland should be done in Edinburgh; that that referring to Ireland should be done in Dublin; and that that referring to England should be done in London. He boldly asserted that, because he saw in the Vote separate and distinct items for printing in Ireland, Scotland, and England. If he had not recognized that principle, he should not have adopted the course he had; or, inasmuch as if they went upon the general principle of getting work done in the cheapest way, they would put all the printing together and have a contract for the lot. Then they would have the work executed in the cheapest place they could. If a Glasgow printer could do the printing cheaper than anyone else, by all means let the House of Commons, if it desired, give him the work. But, in this instance, the House of Commons had not chosen to do that, the Vote being presented in an entirely different way; and as long as they appeared in that shape, and a Dublin contractor sent his work to Scotland, he (Mr. Parnell) would protest against it.

MR. SULLIVAN said, both the hon. Gentlemen who had last spoken were in the wrong. There was no contract, in the ordinary sense of the word, in this case, and that was precisely the error into which the two last speakers had fallen. While being called a contractor, Mr. Thom was not put into competition with anyone. The facts of the matter before the Committee were these:—The Dublin printers thought fit to require the masters in that City to raise their wages. Of course, they had a perfect right so to act; and he must remind the Committee that while some did not submit to this compulsion others did. Mr. Thom who, on a previous occasion, had thoroughly kept himself clear from all connection with the Printers' Association, and who opposed that Society successfully, would not agree to the terms of the men as to an increase of wages. That being so, he (Mr. Sullivan) regretted that the matter had been brought before the Committee that night. He considered it would be a deadly blow given to the printers of Ireland if hon. Members propounded on the floor of that House that the work could be done in Edinburgh cheaper than in Dublin; because it would put the printers of Dublin in the odious position of having driven the trade from the City. That was why he deplored such a discussion being raised. He hoped the present difficulty would be adjusted, and he believed it might be by the display of a little kindness on each side.

Mr. MITCHELL HENRY said, it was a fact within his own knowledge that there had been very great delay in printing documents which ought to be produced in Dublin in consequence of the copy having to be sent to Scotland. One reason why the Government had printers in London, Dublin, and Edinburgh, was that there were documents peculiar to each country which required to be got on with at short notice. The Government printing in Ireland was done in Dublin for that reason; and if the Government printer for Ireland, as a rule, had his work done out of the Irish capital, of course there would be great inconvenience and delay. For his part, he was quite content with the answer of the Secretary to the Treasury—that he would inquire into the matter. At present, it was provided that the Irish printing should be done in Dublin, for the sake of convenience and expedition; and unless it was done in that city, Parliament must alter the system under which the work was given to the contractor. He (Mr. Mitchell Henry) made every allowance for Mr. Thom; and he regretted the delay occasioned in the execution of work in consequence of his not seeing his way to do what the other masters had done.

Mr. O'DONNELL, in answer to the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), who objected to the fact of the Dublin work being sent to Scotland being stated on the floor of that House, said the matter had been fully ventilated before it was mentioned in debate. The Dublin printers had clearly stated the facts in a Memorial they had sent round to Members of Parliament, and in their trade organ, The Irish Artisan. They themselves said that work was being done in Edinburgh which ought to be done in Dublin; and, consequently, there was not the slightest ground for saying that harm had been done, or was likely to be done, to the interests of the Irish printers, by referring to the matter in that House. The statement of the hon. and learned Member for Louth, as to the previous collision between Mr. Thom and his men, had far from weakened the cause of the men. Mr. Thom had first come in contact with the men by refusing to have any belonging to a society in his office; and now, when they asked for a slight increase of wages, he made use of his immense resources, and "jobbed" the work out at Edinburgh.

Mr. BIGGAR said, it was quite clear that Mr. Thom, rather than submit to an advance of wages, as other masters had, would rather "job" his work out at Edinburgh. He—Mr. Thom—could afford to submit to a temporary loss, in order to force his employés to come to his terms. The argument of the hon. Member for Barnstaple (Mr. T. Cave), that the House should allow the work to be done in any place the parties chose, would, of course, be good if the work were open to competition, and if the papers ordered to be printed in Ireland were such as did not require to be produced in a certain time. In this case, Mr. Thom was not a contractor. He obtained whatever he charged on the understanding that the printing should be supplied and be in Members' hands in a definite time. He thought it only reasonable that Mr. Thom should be asked to give the same rate of wages as his neighbours, and nothing more was asked.

Mr. MACDONALD observed, that the salary of the editor of The London Gazette began with £600 a-year, with a maximum of £800; that the first-class clerks began on £300, and rose to £400 a-year; that the second-class clerks began with £200, and rose to £300 a-year; and that third-class clerks began with £100 a-year, and rose to £200. Then there were warehousemen in the same office who began at £120, and rose to £130 a-year. He desired to know whether this rule of raising salaries applied to the printers as well as the others engaged in preparing The Gazette; or whether it might be the salaries of the printers lessened as those of the other employés in the office increased? For his part, he saw no reason why those that really did little work should have ever-increasing salaries, while the men who did the work got less. This was not paying according to work done at all.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the hon. Member fell into a mistake in imagining that the clerks to whom he referred were of the same grade as the men employed in the printing office of The Gazette. Those clerks were civil servants, having increases to their salary in the same way as those employed in the Foreign or Home Offices, or other Departments. Their salaries rose by given increments each year, until the maximum was reached.

MR. MELLOR asked, if that increment occurred in all those Departments without reference to the qualifications of the official servant? because, if so, he considered such a principle one of the worst ever introduced.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the increment was supposed to represent the knowledge a clerk obtained in the time he had served. He came in as a probationary clerk at £90 a-year, after having passed the Civil Service examination, and he had increases of £10, or £15, or £20 a-year as time went on, and these advances represented the knowledge he was supposed to have acquired during the time he had been in the service.

MR. PARNELL said, he wished to make a suggestion to the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury with reference to the £3,000 to be voted for Hansard's Debates, as he was unable to do so on Monday night when the subject was under discussion. At present, Mr. Hansard sent round proofs to Members of the House, and they were entitled to make any corrections they pleased. They were entitled to disregard the proofs entirely, and give their own version of the speeches which they had made. This really meant that a Member could supply a brand new speech. ["No, no!" "Hear, hear!"] He understood that to be the case; and he knew that last Session speeches were reported in Hansard which were certainly not delivered in that House. He had listened to speeches in that House, and he had read entirely different versions of them afterwards in Hansard. It was the custom of Mr. Hansard to report all speeches in the third person, with the exception of those delivered by Ministers. Well, he had seen speeches in Hansard relating to Irish questions delivered by Gentlemen who were not Ministers, and yet they were in the first person singular. He could not believe that those speeches, produced in this most minute way, were those delivered when the subject was under discussion. Nor could he believe that Mr. Hansard supplied proofs of some speeches at all in the form in which they were published. He had no fault to find with the proofs which Mr. Hansard sent round. He (Mr. Parnell) rarely made any corrections in those sent to him. Last Session he only had to make two or three unimportant ones, and this Session only one or two. But what he had to suggest was, that any correction which a Member made in the proof of his speech, except it should be merely a grammatical error, should appear, not in the body of the speech, but as a foot-note appended to that speech. By that plan, they would be able to see what Mr. Hansard's ideas really were as to the speeches of Members, and they would read his report, and not the versions of their utterances as supplied by hon. Members themselves. He thought it exceedingly important, that whatever alterations or corrections Members desired to make in their speeches should be appended as foot-notes to those speeches, or, otherwise, no one would know what they were paying for. Practically, if the present system continued, they would be paying to enable Members to alter or do what they liked with their speeches.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, his hon. Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) could not expect to have all his speeches reported at length in Hansard, for if he did he would require a Hansard to himself. He thought his hon. Friend had not read Hansard very carefully, or he would have seen that the speeches which were supplied by Members in the first person were always distinguished by an asterisk, to show that they had been so supplied. All who had sat in that House for any length of time must remember the remonstrances which had been urged against the Vote for Hansard's Debates, on the ground that Mr. Hansard refused to alter speeches in any manner a Member desired. What he (Mr. Mitchell Henry) believed to be the general rule was this—such alterations in a report as were necessary, and within fair and reasonable bounds, were allowed; but Mr. Hansard felt himself under moral responsibility to the House of Commons not to permit those extensive alterations which his hon. Friend the Member for Meath had spoken of. Before he sat down, he wished to remark that Mr. Hansard had informed him that the most careful speakers—and those most careful of the honour of the House of Commons and of the time of the country—were precisely the gentlemen who took the most pains to correct their speeches. The Prime Minister (the Earl of Beaconsfield) corrected his speeches very carefully for Hansard; the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) had always done so; and he (Mr. Mitchell Henry) remembered the right hon. Gentleman speaking in the House of the hard task he found it to correct his speeches for the printer. He (Mr. Mitchell Henry) ventured, therefore, to suggest to his hon. Friend the Member for Meath that perhaps he might with advantage devote some portion of his own time to correcting those of his speeches which were reported. His doing so might possibly trench on the time which he now had for speaking in the House; but, at any rate, by his so acting posterity would have a better opportunity of judging of the quality of his utterances than would otherwise be afforded.

Mr. BIGGAR said, the great value of Hansard's Debates was to place on record the exact words uttered—especially by Ministers. He considered that Mr. Hansard ought to supply a first-rate report on being paid what was reasonable and fair for his labour. At present Mr. Hansard was paid too little for a good report, and too much for an incomplete one. He regarded the practice of supplying proofs for correction as most objectionable, and it certainly was a bad precedent for a Member to contribute his own speech. No alteration should be permitted unless it were inserted in italics, or in brackets, to indicate that it was an alteration. Unless that were done, what was the use of referring to Hansard in order to quote the exact words which were used? Of course, the exact words employed upon such a subject as the Eastern Question were of great importance, and in a permanent record of what occurred on other subjects the exact words used were equally essential. Unless the corrections or alterations of hon. Members were plainly distinguished from the report, the present system of reporting speeches would be of no advantage. What ought to be done was this—to say to Mr. Hansard—“Here is a certain sum to do the best you can with, but you are either to give a good report or none at all.” Either the work should be properly done, or the House should be in no way responsible for it. At present, he thought the reports carried no official weight with them.

Mr. J. COWEN had considered that this subject was disposed of on Monday. He thought the Gentlemen who passed this criticism upon Mr. Hansard had no practical grievance whatever. He would undertake to say—and he spoke with some knowledge of such duties—that it was impossible to conceive a man doing the work better or more fairly than Mr. Hansard did, considering the circumstances, considering the disadvantages, and considering the position in which he was placed. It was scarcely worth while prolonging a discussion on a subject which had already been under the consideration of the House; but he felt desirous, at least, of lodging his protest against the unjust condemnation of a gentleman to whom the House and the whole British nation were indebted, and who for over 40 years had conducted a very thankless and unprofitable work with great ability and much self-sacrifice.

Mr. PARNELL thought he had paid Mr. Hansard the highest compliment which he could possibly pay him. He did not say, as his hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had asserted, that he never took the trouble to correct the reports of his speeches. What he, in reality, said was, that Mr. Hansard's proofs of his observations in that House were so good, that he seldom or never found it necessary to correct them. This, surely, was a very different statement from that which had been put into his mouth by his hon. Friend the Member for Galway. He distinctly stated—and he had no doubt that Hansard would report him as having so stated—that he very seldom found it necessary to make corrections in the proofs which Mr. Hansard furnished to him. Indeed, he found it scarcely at all necessary, both this Session and last Session, except in unimportant details, to make any corrections in the reports of his observations. The recommendation he made was that any alterations which Members made in the proofs should be appended as foot-notes to those proofs, and should appear as foot-notes to Hansard's reports of the speeches afterwards. Otherwise, hon. Members would not know what they were paying for. They would not know whether they were paying for Hansard's reports, or for the reports of the Members themselves. For his own part, he had very much more confidence in Hansard's reports than in any report which a Member might make of his own speech, either before or after it had been delivered.

SIR ANDREW LUSK wanted to know where they were? It appeared to him that they were rambling over the whole Vote.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the Question before the Committee was the Vote for the Stationery Office.

MR. O'DONNELL desired to call attention again to the subject of the Queen's University and the Queen's Colleges. Before doing so, however, he would point out that there was a Vote here for stationery which would be supplied to the Civil Service Commission. He hoped the hon. Baronet would briefly give some information concerning this Vote. He understood that in the Civil Service examinations changes had lately been made which imposed denominational disabilities. Until the last year or two, he believed, candidates who passed the Civil Service examination for India became entitled to an allowance of from £150 to £200 per annum.

THE CHAIRMAN, interposing, said, the hon. Member was entirely out of Order in discussing the rules of the Civil Service Commission, which had nothing whatever to do with the Vote for Stationery.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he was going to ask a question on the subject. He was raising the point on the Vote generally, and not on any particular item. On the general Vote, he begged to move its reduction by the sum of £271,000—that being the amount required for printing, paper, parchment, vellum, and binding for the various Departments. He did this on the following ground:—The Government had informed the Committee that they were going to supply printing, paper, parchment, and vellum for the use of the Queen's Colleges; and, as they declined to bring forward these matters under special heads as items, his only resource was to object to the payment of any public money to the public Departments in respect of stationery. In this manner he should object to the grant of any money for the Queen's University in Ireland. He objected to the item relating to printing for public Departments, because it included printing for the Queen's University, and would enable that University to lay before the House of Commons documents representing the Institution as a success, whereas everybody in Ireland knew perfectly well that it was not a success. In like manner, he objected to furnishing paper to the public Departments, because that would allow a supply of paper for the examinations of the Queen's University and the Queen's Colleges; and he objected to being in any way a contributor towards facilitating those extraordinary examinations, as to the character of which many Professors of the Queen's University had themselves borne testimony. He objected to paper being supplied for the Greek matriculation examinations. Again, he objected to the parchment and vellum, because they were employed for the diplomas or degrees granted by the Queen's University. He should continue to object to this item until some provision was made to distinguish the good degrees from the bad degrees in the Queen's University. He did not know how far the Chairman could permit him to go on justifying his objections. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman might consider it hardly sufficient for him merely to state that books printed by the Stationery Department for the Queen's University contained Returns which were erroneous. It might be thought that the Committee was entitled to be informed how they were erroneous, and how the examination papers were used for purposes which were not real. At the same time, if the Chairman held that it was only in his power to state his own opinion that these items were misapplied, he could, of course, only bow to such a ruling. He now merely asked the Chairman whether, when he affirmed that the money asked for in this Vote would be expended on public Departments, and, consequently, on the Queen's University as well, he was entitled to show that it would be misapplied?

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, this point of Order occupied a good deal of time on the last occasion when this Vote was under consideration. He then ventured to appeal to the Chairman for a decision; and it was stated, during that discussion, that the item for stationery with reference to the Queen's Colleges represented the amount which had been expended in 1876-7. Now, these were either Estimates or accounts. Taking them to be accounts, they were also indications of the amounts of money which it was expected would be required for the same expenditure again. There was a marked distinction between an Estimate and an account. If he were told that this was an account, he must ask the Government—"What is your Estimate?"

MR. A. F. EGERTON said, that although the hon. Member had risen on a point of Order, he appeared to be going into the question as to what was an Estimate and what was an account.

MR. PARNELL expressed his belief that his hon. Friend was speaking on the point of Order.

THE CHAIRMAN thought the hon. Member's remarks were somewhat remote from the point of Order which had been raised. Hon. Members ought to confine their observations to a discussion of this particular Vote. It raised the question of the supply of stationery to the public Departments, and any hon. Member might object to its application to a particular Department; but he could not go into the constitution of that particular Department at length. That had better be done in the discussion on the Estimate for that Department.

MR. PARNELL said, the difficulty the Committee were placed in was this—The sum of £451,745 was asked for by the Government for the expenses of the stationery and printing Departments. The Government furnished the Committee with an account of monies paid to the different Departments in 1876-7, and in that account there occurred an item of £289 for printing and stationery for the Queen's Colleges in Ireland. Of course, this was an intimation by the Government that a somewhat similar sum would be required for the same purpose out of the present Vote. Consequently, in voting this £451,745, the Committee were voting a sum of £300, in round numbers, for the purpose of the Queen's University and the Queen's Colleges in Ireland. By his ruling the Chairman refused to give hon. Members an opportunity of stating their objections to applying that sum for such a purpose. Irish Members were, therefore, prohibited from stating why they could not conscientiously vote any money for any purpose in connection with the Queen's Colleges. As this was a matter of the gravest importance, and as there had been several discussions on the subject, he submitted that hon. Members were entitled to have the opinion of the Speaker of the House on this important question. Therefore, he begged to move to report Progress, in order that they might have the decision of the House of Commons and of the Speaker as to the correctness of the Chairman's ruling.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Mr. Parnell.)

THE CHAIRMAN said, he had not excluded any debate on any of the items which appeared in the account, although he had endeavoured to confine the remarks of hon. Members to the subject under discussion.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: I appeal to the House to protect its Chairman. We have here, Sir, an unexampled attempt to set your authority at naught; and, under these circumstances, I think it would be only becoming of us to express now that they have confidence in your ruling, and that it is not to be set aside by such an attempt as has been made on this occasion.

MR. DILLWYN hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Meath would not press his Motion to a division. If every single particular relating to every Department in the country were allowed to be discussed in the consideration of this Vote, the Committee would be landed in an illimitable debate.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, that when this question was originally brought forward, he expressed his opinion that it might be just and reasonable for the Irish Members to move a reduction of the Vote by the amount which, on the average, was spent on the Queen's Colleges, as expressive of their dissent from that particular item. He was perfectly aware at the time that this was not described in the general Estimate as a Vote for the Queen's Colleges. If the Irish Members divided now against the whole Vote for the Stationery Office they would place on record in another, but still in the most emphatic manner, their protest against the Queen's Colleges; and, after that, he hoped they would allow the other Votes to be taken. He trusted his hon. Friend the Member for Meath would not put the House in a false position by pressing to a division his Motion for reporting Progress.

MR. O'DONNELL denied that there was any disposition on that side of the House to treat the authority of the Chairman otherwise than with the greatest respect. But when a grave and delicate technical point, on which many senior Members appeared to differ, was before the Committee, it was quite competent for an hon. Member, with all respect for the Chairman, to ask for an appeal to a higher authority. The right of appeal was a protection to Members against possible errors on the part of the Chairman, and it was likewise a protection to the Chairman himself, who, in case of necessity, might be fortified by the supreme authority of the House. He did not think it was fair for the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury to address himself in such a manner as he had done to a Member who was seeking a solution of a delicate and difficult point.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, it appeared to him, when they were discussing this question the last time, that every Member of the Committee was most anxious to ascertain the decision of the Committee on the point raised. He thought that if the Chairman had given his decision on that occasion, it would have been acquiesced in by all. For his own part, he would state quite unreservedly that, in his opinion, the views put forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair) were perfectly reasonable. The Irish Members were quite justified in fighting against the item of £289 for the Queen's University. No one, he believed, had denied their right to exhaust all the Forms of the House in protesting against the item. But if their action in this respect necessitated resistance to items, in regard to which they entertained no conscientious objections, of course an injury was done to Public Business, and a certain obstruction was raised which did not appear to be of a Constitutional character. He must join his hon. Friend in regretting the course which the hon. Baronet had thought proper to adopt. Of course, it was a matter of taste and judgment; and if he considered there had been anything like a disposition to set up the opinion of a small minority of the Committee against the decision of the Chair, no doubt it was to be expected that the hon. Baronet would stand up for what might be called the dignity of the Chair. At the same time, he thought the hon. Baronet himself would not be prepared to deny that a Member of the Committee, even if he stood alone, would be acting in a manner that was not disrespectful to the Chair by taking his case, as it were, to a higher Court of Appeal. The hon. Baronet said he would ask the House to support the authority of the Chair. This, however, was not the House, but only a Committee of the House. What he would now submit to the consideration of his hon. Friend the Member for Meath was the argument put forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh. The Irish Members had stated more than once the nature of their objection to the payment of any money to the Queen's Colleges. An item relating to those Colleges came on for consideration now. Let them, therefore, lodge their protest against that item, and when the other items came forward, let them take them all in order, and protest against every one of them. That would be as complete and as thorough a protest as even the most patriotic Irishman could desire.

MR. BIGGAR did not think his hon. Friend the Member for Meath intended any disrespect to the Chairman or his ruling. Like his hon. Friend, he differed from that ruling; but all they asked was, that the decision of the highest authority—namely, the Speaker of the House—should be obtained on the question.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The doctrine laid down by the hon. Member for Cavan is exactly that which we cannot admit. He says that when any point arises on which your ruling, Mr. Chairman, seems doubtful to any Member of the Committee, that Member has a right to appeal from your ruling to the ruling of the Speaker in the Chair. Now, that I imagine to be a misconception on the part of the hon. Member. The Chairman of the Committee is absolute in the direction of the Business of the Committee, and there is no appeal from the Chairman of the Committee in the direction of the Committee to the Speaker—or anyone else. That doctrine being obviously necessary for the proper conduct of Business, we must support you, Sir, in your ruling, even if I were to differ from your individual opinions. Hon. Members may have differences of opinion; but we must, for the sake of Order, submit to the ruling of the Chairman.

MR. PARNELL said, that nothing in his manner, or in what he said, conveyed any disrespect to the Chairman. It was perfectly absurd for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that there was no appeal from the Chairman of this Committee. From this Committee an appeal lay to the House and to the Speaker with reference to any point of Order which might have been decided. It would be monstrous to confide to any Member of the House the right of deciding, beyond appeal, upon matters of Order and matters of form. There was an appeal on matters of Order from the Chairman of Committees to the highest functionary of the House—namely, the Speaker himself. From any decision of the Speaker they could appeal to the House. He repudiated strongly, and with indignation, the charge of the hon. Baronet—a charge which the hon. Baronet ought not to have made, and which he would not have made if he had really understood the position of affairs. His appeal on this occasion was not an attempt to over-ride the authority of the Chair. He submitted that this Committee was entitled to make a direction that the opinion of the Speaker and of the House should be taken upon the point of Order which the Chairman had decided. Were any other contention possible, it would be tantamount to placing the Chairman of Committees in a higher position than the Speaker of the House of Commons, and the House of Commons itself. The Standing Order of the House very properly provided the means by which the Committee could, if it pleased, at any time submit any ruling of the Chairman of Committees to the decision of the Speaker, and from the decision of the Speaker to the decision of the House itself. On one occasion, the Speaker of the House was actually held down in his Chair by hon. Members when he desired to go contrary to the opinions and feelings of the majority of the House, and to commit a breach of Privilege in the interest of the Sovereign. It was absurd to set up any person or authority above the authority of that House. He was entitled to ask the Committee, by moving to report Progress, to submit to the Speaker or to the House any question as to the ruling of the Chairman. He wished to point out that the items which the Irish Members objected to were not items in the account at all, but sub-heads in the Vote itself. Sub-head E was for printing, &c., for the public Departments, and the Irish Members contended that, as a portion of the money was to be spent for the purposes of the Queen's Colleges and the Queen's University in Ireland, they had a right to state their reasons for objecting to it. The conduct of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in seeking to prevent the right of the Speaker to control the conduct of the proceedings of the House, even though the offender was a functionary as high in rank as the Chairman of Committees, would be consistent in the case of an arbitrary Minister or an absolute Monarch; but it was altogether out of place in this country and in existing circumstances. To permit a proceeding of the kind was apt to lead to serious encroachments upon the rights of Parliament. The occupants of the Ministerial Bench were too much in the habit of supposing that they, in their own persons, constituted the House of Commons, instead of being simply Members of it, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as one of the Members, having been intrusted with certain functions. The right hon. Gentleman certainly had no power to decide a question of Order upon a point which had been raised by another Member of the House who wished to appeal to the Speaker; and, unless a satisfactory answer was forthcoming, he should certainly think it his duty to divide the Committee upon the question.

MR. T. CAVE said, the hon. Member for Meath might be correct in saying that he intended no disrespect to the Chairman; but, whether he did so intend or not, he was certainly disrespectful to himself and to other hon. Members who had come down to the House with the bond fide intention of discharging their duties to the country in Committee of Supply. He (Mr. Cave) had come to that House, in obedience to the will of his constituents, to vote with the Government when, in his opinion, they were right, and against them when he believed they were wrong. He trusted his conscience would acquit him of ever having given a vote which was not in accordance with this principle; but when the hon. Member for Meath and one or more other Members conspired, as it was well understood before going into Committee that they had done, in order to prevent progress on Supply—

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that the expression "conspired" was out of Order.

MAJOR NOLAN pointed out to the hon. Member for Barnstaple that, according to a recent ruling of the Chairman, the use of the word "confederates" would be quite in Order.

MR. T. CAVE said, he would at once substitute the word "confederated" for the word "conspired;" and, in any case, he had a right to object to the hon. Member coming down to that House, together with a few confederates, in order deliberately to obstruct the Business of Parliament.

MR. PARNELL asked the Chairman to rule that an hon. Member was not in Order, without clear proof, in charging him with deliberately interrupting the progress of Business.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that as the hon. Member for Meath had asked him for a distinct ruling upon this point, he was bound to say, from what had occurred in the course of the Committee, that he had not felt justified in stopping the hon. Member for Barnstaple in the statement which he was making.

MR. T. CAVE said, he should be sorry to over-step the ordinary rules of debate; but it was a deplorable humiliation, and was intended so to be, that the House should have to listen, over and over again, to the same arguments—if, indeed, they were worthy the name—and that the hon. Member for Meath should have the impertinence—

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that the use of the word "impertinence" was not Parliamentary.

MR. T. CAVE said, he would at once withdraw the expression; but, in doing so, he must remind the Committee that the hon. Member for Meath had demanded that the debate on the Hansard Vote should be resumed, although it had been thoroughly considered the previous night, because, forsooth, he had been absent from his place during that discussion; and he must express his regret that he could not use the strongest words in the language in reference to the conduct of the hon. Member, whose return to that House had been a curse to the United Kingdom.

MAJOR NOLAN protested against the violent language of the hon. Member for Barnstaple. The hon. Member for Meath had millions behind him—not millions of electors, of course, but millions of the population of the country—and the opinions which he expressed were, therefore, not to be despised. As for the hon. Member for Barnstaple, the constituency which he was supposed to represent did not number more than 11,000.

THE CHAIRMAN remarked, that the population of Barnstaple, or the number of electors in the borough, had nothing to do with the Question before the House, which was that he should report Progress.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he had only made the comparison between the relative positions of the hon. Members for Meath and Barnstaple, because the remarks of the last-named Gentleman, which he heard immediately on returning to the House after having dined, seemed to require that he should do so. It was well known that millions of people in the United States, in Australia, and in the Colonies, were of opinion that the Irish Members in that House were set at defiance.

MR. SULLIVAN pointed out that when the hon. and gallant Member for Galway incidentally mentioned the fact that he had been dining an hon. Member opposite said, audibly—"He looks like it." He tried not to hear offensive observations of this kind; but on the present occasion he could not help it, and everyone knew the imputation which was conveyed in the remark.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that whenever any observations of an offensive or personal character reached the Chair he always endeavoured to repress them; but, at the same time, he must point out to the hon. and learned Member for Louth that nothing had a stronger tendency to bring the proceedings of the House into contempt than for hon. Members to rise in their places and call attention to snatches of private and confidential conversations which they might happen to overhear.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he had tried not to observe the bad manners and rather vulgar conduct of some hon. Members of that House, but he could not succeed in doing so. He would not have called attention to the observation just made, had it not been sufficiently audible to be heard across the floor of the House.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER regretted that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not made his meaning more clear. An hon. Member had a right to appeal against a decision of the Chairman; but he must, in the first place, appeal to the Committee, and if the Committee could not agree upon the point, he was within his right in moving to report Progress, in order to call attention to the point which he had raised.

MR. SULLIVAN appealed to his hon. Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) to allow the matter of the Chairman's ruling to drop, and to take a division upon the Vote, whereby hon. Members could record their protest against it. There would be an opportunity hereafter of discussing the whole question of the Queen's Colleges. He (Mr. Sullivan) while ready, at any time, to participate in genuine discussion to the fullest extent, would not be a party to any dilatory resistance to the progress of Business.

MR. PARNELL said, there were several ways of appealing against the decision of the Chairman, and he was acting on a precedent set last Session. On that occasion, when he objected to a ruling from the Chair, he was told that his proper course was to move to report Progress, and that was all he had done on the present occasion. He denied the right of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to set up Standing Orders of his own in reference to the way in which the Business of the House ought to be conducted; and he contended that if any hon. Member thought a decision from the Chair was wrong, he had a right, without being bullied, to ask that the opinion of the highest authority in the House should be taken upon the question. He had no fear of any threats that might be made against him; and as for the hon. Member for Barnstaple (Mr. T. Cave), he would not have dared to say what he had said outside of the House, or anywhere beyond the jurisdiction and the protection of Parliament. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer desired to send him back to Ireland, he should be glad to quit his connection with that House.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the observations of the hon. Gentleman had nothing to do with the Question before the Committee.

MR. PARNELL said, the attacks which had been made upon him had tried his patience to the utmost. It was no pleasure to him to sit in that House from its sitting till its rising; and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer objected to his being there he could challenge his presence, which he wished the right hon. Gentleman would do forthwith.

MR. J. COWEN thought the discussion to which they had listened a most unfortunate one. He had great respect for the abilities of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), who discharged his duties according to his conscience; but he objected to the nagging sort of opposition which he offered to several questions, and which had, over and over again, defeated the object which he had in view. He hoped a division would be taken upon the question of the Vote, as suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Louth, which had been thoroughly ventilated by the Committee, and that they might get out of the atmosphere of irritation in which they had been for some time.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, the difficulty had arisen on the question as to whether the Committee had power to appeal against a decision of the Chairman? and, as that was a question of much importance, he thought a division ought to be taken upon the question of reporting Progress.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he was certain the Chancellor of the Exchequer could not have meant that the decisions of the Chairman were beyond appeal. The state of the case was, that unless the Committee required direction there was no appeal. He should like to have a decision on the question; but, under the circumstances, he thought his hon. Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) would gain nothing by dividing, the opinion of the Committee being evidently in favour of the ruling of the Chairman.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he agreed with the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) as to the undesirability of prolonging this discussion; but he wished to say one or two words, in order to avoid any misconception. He was not present when the question was raised, but he heard the speech of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar). He understood that hon. Gentleman to argue that there was a right, on the part of any Member of the Committee who might be dissatisfied with any ruling from the Chair, to appeal to the Speaker and the House. Against such a doctrine he wished to enter a protest. If the House were constituted as a full House, and a question of Order was raised, there could be no doubt that any hon. Member might rise and appeal to the Speaker to settle the point. When, on the other hand, the House was in Committee, any hon. Member might appeal to the Chairman to settle a point of Order, and in this case, also, the decision was final, unless an appeal was made to the House. Undoubtedly, there was an appeal to the House; but it must not be that of a single Member, but of a majority of the Committee. This was all he meant to say in answer to the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), who contended that every individual Member had the right to appeal to the Speaker from a decision of the Chairman. He hoped the hon. Member who had moved to report Progress would at once proceed to do so, if he intended to take the opinion of the Committee on the question.

MR. SULLIVAN said, that after what had been advanced, he saw no reason for dividing upon the Main Question at the present time.

MR. BIGGAR said, when he spoke he stated that he did not profess to know clearly what the rights of the Committee or the Chairman were. The right hon. Gentleman laid it down, however, that there was no appeal whatever from the ruling of the Chairman, though it now appeared that there was, in some roundabout way, a power to appeal. As regarded some remarks which had recently been made, he would say that he did not think they ever set the opinions of the Chairman at defiance. He and his hon. Friends had only urged their own views with as much force as possible, and on this occasion he had not heard a single argument against their contention. They had been denounced in strong terms; but no one had used an argument to show that they could not discuss the Queen's Colleges on this particular Vote.

MR. PARNELL said, it now appeared that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had stumbled into the position he (Mr. Parnell) took up, and that he had not previously examined his premises. The right hon. Gentleman announced, with all the importance belonging to the Leader of the House, that there was no appeal from the decision of the Chairman, and he (Mr. Parnell) had protested against such a doctrine, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer now admitted he was wrong. ["No, no!"] If hon. Members could not believe their own ears, he was sorry for them. He moved that Progress be reported, because he wished that the ruling of the Chairman should be submitted to the House. Of course, if the Committee decided not to report Progress, that was equal to saying they did not wish the ruling of the Chairman to be submitted to the House. All this matter would have been ended long ago had it not been for the intemperate interruption and language of the hon. Member for Barnstaple (Mr. T. Cave) and the Secretary to the Treasury (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), who ought to have had more sense than to take up the impractical position which he had done. Under all the circumstances, he would not put the Committee to the trouble of dividing on the Question of reporting Progress; but he would ask leave to withdraw. ["No, no!"]

MAJOR NOLAN hoped the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) would be allowed to withdraw the Motion, because, otherwise, several hon. Members would be placed in a very invidious position.

MR. BARING wished to know who was responsible for the awkward position in which they found themselves?

MR. DILLWYN said, he had listened with great attention and pain to what had taken place, and he thought great blame was to be attached to both sides. Considerable blame was due to the Secretary to the Treasury (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) for the tone he adopted at first, and strong objection must be taken to the very intemperate language which was subsequently used by the hon. Member for Barnstaple (Mr. T. Cave). No doubt the Committee was in an unpleasant position; but there were faults on both sides.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR feared they were getting into another personal altercation, just when they were on the point of obtaining a division. Hon. Members had seen the force of the appeal made to them that they should allow a division to be taken on the main issue, and not press the Motion to report Progress; and, therefore, it was very desirable there should be no opposition to the withdrawal of that Motion.

MR. STORER did not think it would be at all consistent with the dignity of the Committee to pursue the course just suggested. The credit of the Committee was impugned by the Motion to report Progress; and hon. Members, having placed themselves in a false position by that Motion, did not now wish to persevere with it. For his part, he did not think they ought to be allowed to withdraw; but that they should be forced into a division.

THE O'CONOR DON had been many years a Member of that House, and that was the first occasion that he had heard an hon. Member, who was in favour of making Progress, oppose the withdrawal of a Motion to report Progress.

MR. PARNELL said, as far as he was concerned, he certainly should not take a division.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. PARNELL moved the reduction of the Vote by £271,000, being the sums under sub-heads E, F, G, and H, out of which amounts might be paid to the Queen's Colleges in Ireland. By the ruling of the Chairman he was unable to state the reasons he had for objecting to any monies being paid to the Queen's Colleges; and, therefore, he would content himself with simply moving the reduction of the Vote.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That a sum, not exceeding £105,545, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1879, for Stationery, Printing, Binding, and Printed Books for the several Departments of Government in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and some Dependencies, and for Stationery, Binding, Printing, and Paper for the two Houses of Parliament, including the Salaries and Expenses of the Stationery Office."—(Mr. Parnell.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 20; Noes 123: Majority 103.—(Div. List, No. 134.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) £19,492, to complete the sum for the Woods, Forests, &c. Office.

MR. MACDONALD said, that there were one or two items of which he should like to have some explanation. The first was that for the Chief Mineral Inspector. He should like to know what the work performed by that official was, and what the office had to do with Woods and Forests? He saw that the gentleman was paid £800 per annum, and his emoluments were greatly increased by his giving lectures on Mining and Mineralogy at the Geological Museum. The next point was that of the two Commissioners, who received £1,200 per annum each. In addition to that, the First Commissioner received £1 6s. 8d. and £11 for such offices as Keeper of Westminster Hall, and for locking the Hall Door. He mentioned these small matters as a protest against the multiplicity of offices held by one man, and also as a protest against gentlemen getting a salary of £1,200 a-year holding such offices as these. Then he found, in addition to the salary of the Receiver General, an item of "allowances personal;" and there not being any explanation of it, he should like to know what was the cause or explanation for the "allowances personal?"

MR. MELLOR called attention to the arrears of rental, which had been increasing annually. He had asked a question upon that subject years ago, and he received a promise that the matter should be inquired into; but he found that little or no attention had been given to it since that time, and he saw that the irrecoverable arrears had increased by £1,000.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, in answer to the first question of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald), with regard to the Chief Mineral Inspector, the gentleman in question was a scientific man—Mr. Warrington Smyth. His duties consisted of inspection and supervision over the various mining properties belonging to the Crown. Those properties were of considerable extent, and he believed that the amount of gross receipts from those sources during the previous year had come to something like £53,000. The time of this gentleman not being fully occupied in Government work, he had been allowed to utilize his own time by giving lectures at the Geological Museum in Jermyn Street; and he would point out, that by following that course, the country generally benefited by the gentleman's knowledge and power, as well as the Department that paid him his salary. The large amount of property that was at stake necessitated the engagement of a person of the kind; and he believed, taking into consideration the powers and ability of the gentleman in question, that he was not overpaid by his salary. He was afraid he had forgotten the exact point with regard to which the reference to personal allowances was made; but he would point out to the hon. Member for Stafford, that when the item of personal allowances was recorded in the Estimates, it meant a remuneration for particular services performed by an official, and was so mentioned in order that the sum might not be supposed to attach ordinarily to the office. It was only on account either of length of service, or some extra or peculiar work, that an addition was made to anyone's salary, and it was to prevent its becoming a part of the salary that it was placed in the Estimates in the form of a personal allowance. With regard to the small sums paid to the First Commissioner of Woods and Forests for certain offices in connection with Westminster Hall, he believed those items were put down in accordance with an old custom which attached to that particular office. It might be rather antiquated in its form; but the emolument, such as it was, the First Commissioner continued to receive, though he believed there was no particular duty performed in respect of it. His attention had not been called before to the point raised by the hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Mellor), as to the arrears of rental; but he certainly would look into the matter, now that his attention had been called to it.

MR. GREGORY wished, if he were in Order, to call attention to a retiring allowance made to the late Solicitor to the Department, in assessing which he thought that sufficient consideration had not been given to the period of service of that gentleman.

MR. HERMON said, he would take that opportunity of recognising the readiness with which the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury, who had so recently taken charge of the Estimates, evinced in answering questions and offering explanations; and, in the case under notice, he was very glad to see that the Department was occupying the attention of the hon. Baronet; because, for many years, when he had had a seat on the other side of the House, and on several other occasions, he had pointed out that this was a Department which required special attention. He thought that when they looked at the estates that came under the management of the Commissioners, they would agree that those estates required to be managed more efficiently.

MR. PARNELL agreed with the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hermon) that the Department was scandalously managed; that the country was entitled to a much larger return from the Woods and Forests; and that the expenses of management ought to be very much diminished. He did not think the Committee really understood how the Department was situated. In fact, it was a most extraordinary state of affairs. They found, by the Report of the Royal Commissioners, issued in 1855, that the cost of management alone of these Woods and Forests amounted to 25 per cent of the gross revenue. Now, what were those estates? They were, practically, something like the estates of private gentlemen, and what landed gentleman would like to have it said that the cost of managing his private estate was 25 per cent of its gross revenue? In some of the estates the cost of management exceeded their gross revenue. There was Windsor Park; and he must say that Windsor Park ought not to appear under that head at all. It should appear under the head of Royal residences. The gross revenue of Windsor Park amounted to £5,509 18s. 6d., and he found, from the Report of the Royal Commission, that the management of Windsor Park was put down at £24,738 11s. 10d. He supposed that a great deal of the management meant the expense of keeping up the Royal Palace; but, if so, it ought to have been included under the proper head. If it did not, he thought it was a perfectly monstrous thing that the management of the Park, apart from the Palace, should be £24,000; while only about £5,000 was derived from all the magnificent grass land in Windsor Park. It appeared to him that many of the estates were unprofitable; and he would press upon the Secretary to the Treasury the advisability of getting rid of some of these unprofitable estates. He would refer him to the Alice Holt Wood, which returned a gross revenue of £1,725 5s. 1d., while the cost of management was £632 16s. 9d., or 36·59 per cent of the revenue. The Vere Woods showed a gross revenue of £1,746 16s. 8d., and the cost of management £743 4s. 11d.—the percentage in that case being 43½. In the Forest of Dean the gross revenue was £12,550 1s. 4d., and the cost of management £6,138 2s. 10d., or 48·89 per cent. There were three woods—the Delamere, the Hazelburgh, and the Salse Woods—of which the Returns were not given. In the High Meadow the gross revenue was £5,377 12s. 10d., and the expenditure £1,600, or 30·5 per cent. The gross revenue of the New Forest was £10,207 10s. 2d., and the cost £8,987 16s. 4d., or 88·4 per cent. Now, he could not imagine how the New Forest returned such a very small revenue, as, from the nature of the property, one would think it one of the most valuable, instead of the least productive. The Parkhurst revenue was £420, and the cost £272, or 64·70 per cent. The Woolmer estate was the only one which was at all economical, the revenue being £1,000, and the cost £101, being only a percentage of 9·19. Taking at random a variety of arrears of rental since 1853, he found that in that year the gross revenue was put down at £358,266, and the expenditure at £111,711; and out of the gross revenue there was paid into the Exchequer only £252,000, so that the expenditure in that year was nearly equal to half the revenue. In 1864 the gross revenue was £432,148, and the expenditure £129,414. The amount paid in was £300,000, or rather more than double the expenditure. In 1870 the gross revenue was £447,000, and the expenditure £87,000, the amount paid in being £375,000. Of course, things were going on a great deal better; and he found in 1877 the gross revenue was £488,000, the expenditure £83,902, and the amount paid in £410,000.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF hoped his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury would devote his attention to the Office of the Woods and Forests, which was now in the anomalous position of being practically exempt from Parliamentary jurisdiction. He had not a word to say against the present Commissioners, who were men of high character and great ability; but the Department, being unrepresented in that House by any officer over whom Parliament could have control, required entire re-organization to preserve it from abuses which were liable to spring up.

MR. DILLWYN remarked that the expense of the management of the Woods and Forests was altogether out of proportion to the revenue derived from them. What he wished particularly to call attention to, however, was the position of Windsor Park. That really was one of the Royal Parks, and ought to be regarded as such. It was absurd to treat it as a public Park, managed as property by the Woods and Forests, which was an accounting Department, when it cost £24,000 a-year, and only yielded £5,000 in return. No private person would manage property in that way. As a Royal Park its cost ought to rank as one of the charges paid to the Crown, and appear on the Estimates as such.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON maintained that the charge of mismanagement brought against the Department of the Woods and Forests by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) had not been proved. No doubt at one period the expenses very largely exceeded the receipts; but the difference had been steadily diminishing under the management of the last few years, the amount paid into the Exchequer for the year 1877-8 having been £410,000, as compared with £190,000 in the year 1838-9. However, he was quite prepared to give the Vote his particular attention. The Committee ought to remember that such property as Woods and Forests was necessarily unproductive for long periods. Young timber was not in a condition to be turned into profit, and considerable sums had to be spent for its maintenance. At present there was very little large timber standing; for the most part the trees had not attained such a growth as to be available for sale. Hence the disproportion between the expenses and returns, in part at least. Windsor Park, he submitted, was enjoyed as much by the public as by the Sovereign herself; and it ought never to be forgotten that of the £24,000 expended upon it, no less than £11,000 was for the maintenance of the lodges and roads, which enabled the public to enjoy its beauties. Under the original arrangement, however, it was distinctly understood that the Park should be maintained for the enjoyment of the Sovereign.

MR. MACDONALD reminded the Committee that an increase of revenue was not necessarily an indication of better management—they might be eating the most valuable portion of the property away, and leaving it valueless. Had not the mineral property under this Department been developed, until at least it was, to a large extent, exhausted?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that was hardly the case. The receipts from the mining property amounted to some £53,000 annually.

MR. DILLWYN explained that he did not object to the expenditure of £24,000 on Windsor Park, or doubt that a large part of that sum was applied to the use of the public, as well as of the Crown. All he contended was, that the money for its maintenance ought to be voted by that House—that it ought to be put into the shape of a Vote, and appear in the Estimates, like the cost of Richmond Park, for instance, and not made a matter dealt with as though managed for profit.

Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the present arrangement was effected by an Act of Parliament, and that it would require an Act of Parliament to reverse it.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked how the officers of the New Forest were paid, and to whom were people to go if they wanted a road to be made there?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that information on these matters might be obtained from the new Verderer.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF insisted that, the officers of Woods and Forests being Government officers, their salaries should be submitted to Parliament. It certainly appeared to him very extraordinary that there should be Government officers all over the country without the House knowing who was responsible for their salaries. He had asked for the information in vain, and he thought the public interest required that the condition of the Office of Woods and Forests should be entirely revised, and that it would be a good work for his hon. Friend to undertake it.

MR. MUNTZ held that all the receipts from the New Forest should go into, and that all payments in connection with it should go out of, the Exchequer. The reply of the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) was the one they had so often heard before—namely, that things were not so bad as they appeared, because, while a few years ago the expenses of management amounted to nearly 50 per cent, they had gradually come down to 25. Now, what would any hon. Member think of a steward who charged 25 per cent for the management of his estate? [An hon. MEMBER: 2s. 6d. per cent.] Well, he was glad to hear it was so low. He hoped his hon. Friend would continue, as he had hitherto done, to discourage extravagance, and that the Department would, by-and-by, double its revenue, and so abolish a national scandal. The expense of management might very properly be reduced to 5 or 7½ per cent.

MR. GREGORY, in corroboration of the hon. Baronet's (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson's) remarks, said, that in walking recently through a portion of the property in question he was struck by the large quantity of young and growing timber, which spoke very highly for the managers of it. At some future time there would be a good return; but at present the Woods and Forests were necessarily unproductive to a certain extent, owing to the large expenditure incurred by the planting and maintenance of young trees. Last year he was through the New Forest, and he had observed a similar state of things there.

MR. RAMSAY also urged the adoption of an Estimate, expressing a hope that the Vote would take that form before next year. With regard to the question of management, no one knew better than the hon. Baronet himself, when he stated that since 1839 the revenues had increased from £190,000 to £410,000, that during the last 40 years the annual income from all real estate had increased in nearly as great a proportion without any reference to its management. An increase in the revenue of the Department, therefore, ought not to be accepted as a proof of good management. Enough, he thought, had been said to satisfy the Committee that the management of this property was anything but what it ought to be. He trusted that before next year some definite proposal for better administration than at present existed would be devised.

MR. WHITWELL admitted that the management of the Woods and Forests entailed considerable expense, and expressed his satisfaction at the good accounts given of the growing timber. He found that the expenses of ordinary management—wages, salaries, and allowances—amounted to £16,000; but, turning over a leaf, he found that no less than £5,000 for legal expenses had to be added—a sum which appeared to him excessive.

MR. MUNTZ expressed himself satisfied, from an examination of the accounts, that the expenses of management were fully 25 per cent.

MR. O'DONNELL suggested that the Keeper of the Records should be placed upon salary instead of having to depend upon fees.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that by arrangement made with the Government, all the time of the Keeper of the Records was duly accounted for; but that official was permitted to occupy his spare time in doing work outside the office, in order that he might acquire a general knowledge of the investigations in which he was engaged. With regard to the legal expenses of the office, they were necessarily incurred for the custody of a large number of deeds and records of exchanges and sales which took place under the direction of the Department. The property was scattered all over the country; and, that being so, he did not think the staff could be considered as excessive. At the same time, there might be points in regard to which improvement could be effected.

MR. PARNELL said, the cost of managing the properties to which reference had been made amounted to 25 per cent of the net revenue. The expense connected with the management of 12 of the properties was £43,258, while the revenue only amounted to £38,000.

MR. BIGGAR observed, that in addition to fees the Keeper of the Records received £150 salary. He suggested that the fees should go into the Treasury.

MR. MACDONALD said, he had almost made up his mind to move a reduction of the Vote; but, remembering that the hon. Baronet had only recently entered upon his present Office, he would rest satisfied with expressing a hope that by next year the Secretary to the Treasury would be able to present a different record under this head.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £33,250, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1879, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Works and Public Buildings."

MR. DILLWYN directed attention to the item of £1,200, paid as salary to the Consulting Surveyor. The gentleman who occupied that position was also allowed private practice; and this, he thought, was to be deprecated. No man could properly serve two masters; and he hoped that the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) would direct his attention to this particular point. It seemed to him that the Consulting Surveyor received a sufficiently large salary to command his whole services. He should also like to know whether that officer was connected by partnership, or otherwise, with any of the other officers of the Department?

MR. GERARD NOEL said, the Consulting Surveyor was in no way connected with any of the other officers of the Department. It was most important that there should be a gentleman of the highest ability in that position; and such an officer the Department now possessed. His duties were of an onerous description; and he received only £1,200 a-year.

MR. MACDONALD said, there were several items in connection with the Vote to which he desired to direct attention. Commencing with the Private Secretary to the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works, he found that that official also drew a salary as senior clerk in the Financial Secretary's Department of the War Office. In fact, two offices might almost be said to be the order of the day in these Departments. Again, he found that there was a Superintendent of Furniture at £400 a-year, a Deputy Superintendent, and an Assistant Superintendent. There was likewise a Store Keeper of Furniture. The object of the heads of Departments seemed to be a multiplication of offices; and he should like to have a general review of all those persons who were connected with the various Departments in Hyde Park, or somewhere else. He had been told that a number of them might be turned to better account in the British Museum than as occupants of Public Offices. He had referred to the fact that there were four officials connected with Furniture; but his objections under the Vote did not end with them. He found that there was a Superintendent for the supply of Coal and Firewood, and a Superintendent for the supply of Candles and Oils. He should fancy that it would be easy to find a man perfectly capable of combining these two offices at a single salary. Unless some satisfactory explanations were given, he should feel it his duty to move a reduction of the Vote to the extent which would be implied in the cutting off of, at least, four officials, whom he regarded as totally unnecessary, and whose continuance was simply equivalent to a scandalous waste of public money.

MR. GERARD NOEL said, that with regard to the Private Secretary to the First Commissioner, a certain sum was deducted from his salary to compensate a clerk in a lower division for performing his duties. As regarded the Superintendents of Furniture, to which the hon. Member had alluded, he could assure him that those gentlemen had ample work to do. They had to look after the supply and repair of furniture in all the Public Offices in the occupation of Her Majesty's Government, in the House of Commons, in the Law Courts, in the Police Courts, in the Customs' Buildings, and in the Inland Revenue, and many other Departments to which he need not refer. They had, also, duties to perform in connection with the accommodation necessary for the different Commissions, and they had to take inventories of all the Public Offices. The hon. Member had only to glance at Class I. of the Estimates on Public Buildings to see the enormous number of those buildings which the officials in question had to look after. With reference to the Superintendent of Coals, he could assure the hon. Member that the duties of that officer were by no means light or unimportant. The Government made large contracts for coal in various parts of England, and it was necessary to have a gentleman who understood the different kinds of coal, and who could bring experience and knowledge to bear upon the duties of his office. As regarded the post of Superintendent of Candles and Oils, it was under consideration whether that office might not be combined with some other.

MR. MUNTZ said, no sufficient answer had yet been given to the question as to the Consulting Surveyor. That gentleman might be a very valuable servant; but, in addition to his salary, he found, a few lines further down in the Estimates, that salaries were paid to four first-class Surveyors and six of the second class. Surely, those gentlemen ought to be able to perform the work which required to be discharged without paying £1,200 to a Consulting Surveyor. He knew that £1,200 in itself was a very trifling sum; but he appealed to hon. Members to look back upon the Estimates, and see whether it was not the case that year after year there had been an increase of expenditure in this Department?

MR. WHITWELL inquired, whether the Surveyor who had been brought home from China and Japan would have the superintendence of diplomatic residences in more than one place, and whether he would supersede the local Superintendents?

MR. GERARD NOEL said, the gentleman referred to had been for many years in China and Japan; and, having learned his duty thoroughly, he had been brought home to England, and was now one of the first-class Surveyors. It was his duty to visit the different Embassies of Europe; but he would not supersede the local Superintendents.

MR. MELLOR asked, whether the Consulting Surveyor, with his £1,200 a-year, did not receive, at times, payment for other than Government work? Did he not, in fact, receive commissions on work done by contractors?

MR. GERARD NOEL replied, that the official in question received no commissions, but simply a salary of £1,200 a-year.

MR. MACDONALD said, that seeing the proposed Vote was in excess of that of last year, he would move its reduction by £791.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £32,791, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1879, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Works and Public Buildings."—(Mr. Macdonald.)

MR. BIGGAR did not understand how the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) had arrived at that particular sum; but he thought that if his hon. Friend would propose to leave out entirely the Vote for the Consulting Surveyor, he would simply be doing his duty. A more pernicious system could not exist than that of having a Consulting Surveyor paid by Government for part of his time, with liberty to take general practice. Hon. Members must be aware of what such a system might give rise to. He did not know the name of the gentleman referred to in this particular instance, and he could have no personal grudge against him. That gentleman might be immaculate and pure; but there could be no greater temptation than that which existed under the present system, for a Consulting Engineer or Surveyor to be employed by parties who wished to carry out little jobs for their own interest.

MR. PARNELL said, he desired to direct the attention of the Committee to the circumstance that one of the 15 third-class clerks, who received £300 a-year as a regular salary, also got £50 per annum as receiver of the tolls at Chelsea Bridge. That allowance was paid out of the tolls; but it appeared that there was a regular keeper who was paid for receiving the tolls. It seemed that the third-class clerk received the tolls from the toll-keeper; but all that the former functionary had to do might very well be performed by some official of the numerous Government Departments. A separate salary ought not to be allowed for such a purpose as this. There were several other salaries included in the Vote; but he could not trust himself to go into them in detail.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 25; Noes 231: Majority 206.—(Div. List, No. 135.)

Original Question again proposed.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. M'Carthy Downing.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he would ask the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Downing) not to report Progress. The Committee had discussed the Vote at considerable length; and, if the hon. Gentleman would withdraw his Motion, he would move to report Progress when the Vote was agreed to.

MR. PARNELL said, he merely wished to ask—"Oh, oh!"—it was impossible for hon. Members who had not been present the whole evening to understand the situation. He merely wished to ask a question of the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works. It was, whether he knew how many times the Consulting Surveyor was consulted during the past year? He could not make out whether the Surveyor was consulted at all. He believed it was a sinecure office.

MR. GERARD NOEL said, it was impossible to give an answer to a question of that kind; but if he were to say "a thousand times," he should be considerably under the mark. The office was no sinecure, the gentleman in question being consulted almost every day by the Department.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

(The O'Connor Don, Mr. Richard Smyth, Mr. Charles Lewis, Mr. James Corry, Mr. William Johnston, Mr. Dease, Mr. Dickson, Mr. Redmond.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 13th May.]

Clause 1 (Extension of Acts prohibiting Sale of Intoxicating Liquors to the whole of Sunday).

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING, on rising to move an Amendment, said, he hoped they had now arrived at a time when the Committee would consider what course ought to be taken in regard to the position in which the Bill now stood. They had had a very long time of it on Monday night and the whole of Tuesday morning. He was one of those who contributed to an arrangement which, he trusted, was now to be consummated; and he further hoped that they would now discuss with calm consideration a question which involved the interests of a large class in Ireland, and, he ventured to think, the interests of a large class of the people of England hereafter, if this Bill were carried into effect. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had proposed an Amendment to the Bill at the end of Clause 1. As the clause now stood, the hours were to be extended during which intoxicating liquors were not to be sold to the whole of Sunday. The right hon. and learned Gentleman's proposal to except five towns—namely, Dublin, Cork, Belfast, Waterford, and Limerick—had been accepted; and his (Mr. M'Carthy Downing's) Amendment was to insert certain words after the words which were accepted by the promoters of the Bill. The words would be—

"Except all towns and villages with a population of 500, according to the last Government Census of the population."

He should propose that, in these places, public-houses should not be open before 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and after 5 o'clock in the evening of Sunday. At present, the law in Ireland was this—that on Sundays, in all towns where the population exceeded 6,000, the time during which intoxicating liquors could be sold was from the hour of 2 o'clock until 9 o'clock. In all towns where the population did not exceed 6,000, the hours were from 2 to 7 o'clock. The Committee would perceive that towns of over 6,000 had the right to sell liquor for two hours later than towns of less than 6,000. When this Bill was introduced, the Petitions in favour of it were for closing public-houses all through Ireland on Sunday. Those who had charge of the Bill referred to public meetings held in Dublin, Belfast, Limerick, Waterford, and Cork, to prove that the people of those great towns were entirely in favour of closing on the Sunday. No doubt that made a great impression on the minds of hon. Members. He (Mr. M'Carthy Downing) had heard the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) speak in that House of the important meeting which took place in Phoenix Park, Dublin, where so many thousands of people were in favour of the closing of public-houses in that City. He also referred to an inquiry made in every house in Dublin, which ended in an immense majority signing in favour of Sunday closing. The same thing occurred in some other large towns; and yet the hon. and learned Gentleman voted for their exemption. What said the right hon. Baronet the late Chief Secretary for Ireland, when this measure was introduced in 1877—when some of the Irish Members said that, when there was a majority of Irish Members in favour of this question, then, as a matter of course, it ought to be accepted by the House, and English and Scotch Members ought to vote for it? He (the Chief Secretary) denied that if a majority of Irish Members were in favour of this measure, therefore it ought to be carried. If, he said, it was good for Ireland, it must be the same for England.

Mr. Gerard Noel

This was the thin end of the wedge; for, as sure as they passed the Bill for Ireland, the House would hereafter be assailed with thousands of Petitions from England, praying that a similar measure might be passed for that part of the Kingdom. He could not conceive how those who called themselves Liberals could advocate this Coercion Bill—how those who sat on the front Opposition bench could have allowed their “Whips” to go out and call in their Friends to speak in support of a measure which the people of Ireland looked upon as one of extreme injustice. The promoters of the Bill had talked a good deal of the Petitions that had been presented in favour of it; but where did those Petitions come from? The greater part from England. Since the 19th of January, the Petitions presented from Ireland were as two to one against the Bill; and most of those from England were from the Wesleyans and Primitive Methodists, and other Dissenting Bodies, thus showing that the movement was a Sabbatarian one, and not one coming from the people. If the Bill should be passed for Ireland, English Members who voted for it would certainly be told by their constituents at the next General Election—“You voted in favour of Sunday closing for Ireland; we, therefore, ask you, will you do the same for England? If you will not, we shall vote against you.” If they were prepared to pass a similar measure for England, they would have the people up in arms against them. That certainly would be the result, if they attempted to deprive the people of England of their pint of beer on the Sunday, or of the means of enjoying themselves on that day. Many of the people in Ireland had to go two or three miles into a country town in order to attend a place of worship; and when they did so in cold and wet weather, were the promoters of this Bill to say to them—“You cannot go into a public-house and get refreshment?” There were other persons who went into a country town for the purpose, perhaps, of meeting their friends, or of settling their accounts. If this Bill became law, the public-house door, the only place where they could meet for such a purpose, would be shut against them. It had been asserted that a measure of this kind had done good in Scotland; but he asked the Committee to consider what were the Returns upon that point. They showed that, since the Forbes-Mackenzie Act was passed, there had been more arrests than before of persons charged with being drunk or incapable; for, between 1871 and 1876, the number of those offences had increased by 50 per cent in Scotland, while in England they had increased by 33 per cent, and in Ireland there was little, if any, increase. It had been said that an increase had occurred in the year 1874; but why? Because an Act was then passed requiring that the name of every person arrested for drunkenness should be entered in the petty sessions book; whereas, previously to that year, the law insisted upon no such record—if a man, brought up before a magistrate for drunkenness, was discharged, no more was heard about the matter, and this enactment was made on an Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Louth. So that, in Ireland, there was a decrease of drunkenness, as every magistrate knew perfectly well whose duty it was to preside at petty sessions. But how was the opinion of the people to be ascertained? The House knew that there were paid agents employed—there were those who got up Petitions in favour of Sunday closing, and those who got up Petitions against that measure. But let hon. Members make inquiry as to the meetings which had been held where neither prejudice nor interest existed, and let them ascertain what had actually been done at those meetings. One such meeting had been held in his own county—Cork—presided over by the Rev. Canon Griffin, a dignitary of the Church. He held in his hand an account of what took place. In opening the proceedings, the rev. gentleman stated that when he consented to preside he did so on the distinct condition that the meeting was to be an open one, and that all parties might give their opinions on this vexed question of closing on Sunday. He went on to say that, if he were asked his own opinion with regard to the villages surrounding his own parish, he could emphatically affirm that there was no necessity for Sunday closing. The amount of intemperance on the Sunday, during the five years he had been in that parish, would not justify the passing of an Act by which the people would be deprived of their liberty. The very last visit he had the honour of receiving from Dr. Moriarty was on the Feast of St. John the Baptist, which fell on a Sunday, when Dr. Moriarty was gratified at the orderly and sober demeanour of the people as they left for their homes. On that, as on former occasions, his Lordship expressed himself to the effect that curtailing the number of hours during which public-houses might be open on Sunday for the sale of liquors would meet all necessary requirements. That was the opinion of a Bishop, who certainly was known for great wisdom and prudence, and his testimony amounted to this—that it was not necessary to close on the whole of the day, but all that was required was to limit the hours. The Amendment which he had to submit to the consideration of the Committee was, in effect, that on the Sunday, instead of having public-houses open until 7 o'clock in the evening, in towns other than the five excepted by the proposal of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, they should be open from 2 to 5 o'clock. Everyone acquainted with Ireland knew that, before the hours were curtailed, they extended from 2 to 9 o'clock. In the small country-places, when riots or assaults occurred, it was always after nightfall, and it was found desirable to alter the hours—namely, from 2 to 7—since when a great improvement was the result. By his Amendment he asked the Committee to curtail them still further, instead of closing public-houses altogether. He believed if the hours were fixed at from 2 to 5, that would give the people the opportunity of enjoying themselves. As a magistrate, Chairman of the Town Commissioners, and member of a Board of Guardians, he had not, in the course of his experience, known drunkenness to prevail on the Sunday. Why, then, he asked, did the promoters of this Bill wish to inflict upon the people of Ireland a deprivation of the right which they at present possessed? They desired to have their glass of beer, or their glass of whiskey-and-water; and was the House going to deprive them of this enjoyment without even consulting them? That was, in effect, what the promoters of the Bill wished the House to do; because the number of real, bona fide signatures attached to Petitions from Ireland against the Bill exceeded by two to one those in favour of it. He had examined the Petitions from Cork, and had been unable to recognize any names of note. There were many, no doubt, that were respectable; there were several old unmarried ladies who had signed these Petitions; and there were names which belonged to various sections of the Church; but the great body of the people had not signed them; and he defied any hon. Member from Ireland, who had advocated this measure, to show that Petitions had been largely signed in favour of the Bill by the people of Ireland. With regard to the magistrates and the Clergy, it had been asserted that they were all in favour of it; but the fact was, that only one-fifth of them had signed Petitions in support of the measure. He made that statement without fear of contradiction. If there were a General Election to-morrow, and this question were brought before the electors in every county and every borough in Ireland, hon. Members would not receive a favourable reception from their constituents if they voted for the passing of this Bill; and that would make them regret their having taken a course which was opposed to the wishes of the Irish people. But he would appeal more particularly to English Members. As for the Scotch Members, he knew very well that no argument would have any effect upon them. He appealed to English Gentlemen, representing English constituencies, because they knew what was due to the people; he appealed to them to consider fairly and justly the question before the Committee, and not to be led away by the Sabbatarian feeling which had induced many hon. Members to vote, if not against their consciences, against their better feelings. If English Members allowed this coercive measure to pass, and to appear on the Statute Book, they would find it very hard, at the next General Election, to resist a similar Bill for closing public-houses on Sundays in England. If they were prepared to meet that demand, of course they might vote for this measure; but if they were not prepared, because they believed that such a Bill would not be accepted by the English people, then he asked them not to force it upon the people of Ireland. There could be no doubt that it was attempted to force the Bill upon them. No public meeting had been held, at which the question had been freely discussed, where there was not a Petition signed, or where there were not resolutions adopted, against this Coercion Act. Let the Committee fairly consider the position of the question. This Bill was originally brought in for the purpose of closing public-houses all over Ireland. Was that actually the Bill before the Committee at the present moment? Had they not exempted from its operation the five chief towns of Ireland? Was that consistent? Had they done that which the people had required of them, and which the Petitions called upon them to do? The hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) had boasted in the House that his Eminence, Cardinal Cullen, was an advocate of this Bill. Was he an advocate of it, as it stood now? He was not. This was proved by a statement, signed by the Archbishop of Dublin, by Cardinal Cullen, as well as by the Mayors of Dublin, Belfast, and of Cork, Sir Dominic Corrigan, the Mayor of Limerick, the Bishop of Limerick, the Bishop of Waterford and Lismore, and the ex-High Sheriff of Waterford. It was to this effect—

“In view of the probability of the above ‘Order of the Day’ being reached on Wednesday next, the undersigned beg respectfully to request the attention of Honourable Members to the following ‘reasons’ why any proposal to exempt Dublin, Belfast, Cork, Limerick, or Waterford from the operation of the Bill should be resisted and opposed:—

“(1.) Because the question of ‘exemption’ was expressly referred by the House of Commons to a Select Committee. This Committee, largely chosen by the Government, sat for three months, heard evidence, and decided that the Bill should apply to the ‘whole’ of Ireland, and that there ought to be no place excluded from its operation. (2.) Because the evil against which the proposed legislation is directed exists in its most intensified form in the large cities and towns, and to exempt these from the Bill is to deny the remedy to the very places that most require it. (3.) Because to leave the public-houses open in these large cities and towns will have a direct tendency to increase the evils already existing there, by tempting people of intemperate habits into these places from adjacent districts where the Bill is in force, thus adding rural to existing city drunkenness. (4.) Because the suggestion of riots taking place on the enforcement of Sunday closing in these cities and towns, hinted at by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, broke down before the Select Committee—not a single witness, official or otherwise, failing to ridicule any such idea. (5.) Because the public opinion of these cities and towns has been often and frequently expressed in favour of total and universal Sunday closing, by public meetings, house-to-house canvasses, petitions, and other means.”

This was not the Bill in favour of which Petitions had been presented. It was not really a Bill for the closing of public-houses in Ireland, because five large towns were to be exempted from its operation; although, in those towns, the greatest amount of excess, drunkenness, and vice prevailed. Were the Government justified in making that exception? What he asked the Government to do was to be fair and just, and at least limit the hours in the way that he proposed by his Amendment. If they accepted his Amendment, and gave the people the opportunity of meeting their friends, nothing would be done in opposition to the proposal of the Government, which exempted the five large towns. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had fairly and manfully stated that he had no respect for this Bill, or, at any rate, that he did not like it. That was, no doubt, the opinion of most of the Members who sat behind the right hon. Gentleman. He (Mr. M’Carthy Downing) believed there were very few who really liked this Bill. They were influenced by feelings which he very much respected. He could understand those hon. Gentlemen, like his hon. Friends the Members for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) and for Kilkenny (Mr. B. Whitworth), who were teetotalers, and who never drank intoxicating liquors of any kind, trying to convert Members of the House to their way of thinking on this question; but he could not understand the advocacy, in favour of this Bill, of those hon. Members who went to their clubs on the Sunday and took refreshment there, or who had the best of wines and spirits in their own homes. He could not understand how such hon. Gentlemen could go into the Lobby with the promoters of this measure, and so deprive the poor working man, after abstaining for a whole working week, of the pleasure of smoking a pipe and taking his glass of grog with his friends whom he met on the Sunday. He hoped that the Government would take a right view upon this question. They had insisted upon the exemption of five towns. If he were in the position of those who supported the Bill he should refuse to accept that Amendment, and say to the Government—"No, this was a measure for closing public-houses throughout Ireland. It was upon that principle that the Bill went before the people; it was upon that principle that they signed Petitions which influenced the House in passing the second reading. Therefore, as advocates of a measure which they thought essential for the moral welfare and for the sobriety of the people, they must reject what the Government offered. They would not exempt the five towns that the Government named, and they would appeal to the country on the question." The city, where his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Louth had spent so much of his life, was the very place where the greatest amount of drunkenness prevailed. There was more crime in Dublin than in the other large towns, according to population. Dublin and Cork were to be exempted. What would be the consequence? Queenstown, with a normal population of 11,000, had besides a floating population of 1,500 or 2,000. Every Sunday in the year a number of packets arrived there from Liverpool and other places. They called at Queenstown and landed their passengers. There were vessels arriving there from all parts of the world. If all the strangers, and all the inhabitants, were to be deprived of drink on a Sunday, what would be the consequence? They would go on to Cork, and get drunk there. A rivalry would spring up between the men of Cork and the people of Queenstown; they would sit drinking together for a considerable time, and, in the end, there would be riots; so that, when the time came for the party from Queenstown to go back, a great number of them would fall into the hands of the police because they had got drunk. The same thing would probably occur with regard to Bardon, a town with 6,000 inhabitants. The people there requiring drink would go to Cork, and the two great parties—the one boasting of the Orange flag and the other of the Green—would come in contact with each other, and a riot would probably ensue. The number of she-beens would rather increase than diminish. The people would purchase whiskey on the Saturday to be drunk on the Sunday; and wives and children would be seen taking their portion of the whiskey provided. There would be contamination in every family. In making these remarks he might state that he had no interest whatever either in a brewery or in a distillery. He would rather resign the position he held as a Member of Parliament than express his approval of what he believed to be a measure that was opposed to the convictions of the people. He believed that the Bill, in its present shape, would be detrimental to the best interests of Ireland; and that, if passed in that form, it would be resented by the people. If the Government accepted the Amendment he now proposed, they would not violate any principle in regard to the Bill, and would, at the same time, he thought, satisfy all classes. He advised the Government to accept his proposal as an experiment. If the trial proved successful, his Amendment might continue to be the law; if not successful, the Government would, at any rate, be able to say that they had made a fair attempt to remedy the evil. He was sorry to see that a great many people, with whom he had been in the habit of acting, should have taken up this measure as a Party matter; but he hoped that hon. Members on both sides of the House would see that the adoption of his Amendment, which he would now move, was only fair and reasonable, and that it was only extending to all towns and villages of Ireland what had been concerned to the five towns having the largest population.

Amendment proposed,

After the word "Sunday," at the end of the last Amendment, to add the words "and except in all towns and villages, with a population of five hundred according to the last Government Census of population, and within the said towns and villages, the said hours or times are hereby extended, and shall be as follows—that is to say, up to the hour of two o'clock in the afternoon, and after the hour of five in the evening."—(Mr. McCarthy Downing.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

THE O'CONOR DON had listened with very great pleasure to the speech that had just been delivered, inasmuch as it was in striking contrast to the speeches which he had heard on the last occasion, when the Committee was occupied in considering the Bill. It must be clear to everyone that the Amendment his hon. Friend proposed was one that touched the whole principle of the Bill. Most of his speech was directed to show that the Bill was not approved of by the Irish people; that it was a Bill that in every way would be objectionable, and one that ought not to be considered, or, at all events, that it was one that would not give satisfaction to the country. In carrying out the endeavour to subvert the whole principle of the Bill, his hon. Friend had fallen back on an argument with which they were all familiar. He had told them, as usual, that this was a purely Sabbatarian question—that the Bill had no strength outside that view. He had pictured to them the deplorable condition in which certain of his countrymen would find themselves when they came into town on Sundays, saturated with wet, and unable to obtain refreshments, and the remedy suggested by the hon. Member was that they should be allowed to saturate themselves internally. Then, it was said that the Bill was not approved by the Irish people, and how was that shown? First of all, reference was made to the enormous number of Petitions which, it was said, had been presented to Parliament against the Bill. For his part, he was surprised that the opponents of the Bill should rely so much upon this question of Petitions. They had heard a great deal about the Petitions that had been presented with regard to that Bill, and they knew that an enormous number of signatures had been paraded before them as having been attached to those Petitions. But the great majority of those signatures were without addresses, and the signatures might have been written out in a few public-houses, for no one could tell whether they were genuine or otherwise. They also knew that a certain number of those Petitions had been before the Petitions Committee, who had reported against them, and that some of them had, in consequence, been discharged. He attached very little real value to the Petitions on either side, and in arguing the question before the House, he had never based his case on the Petitions presented in favour of the Bill. The next question raised by the hon. Member was with regard to the great number of meetings which he said had been held against the Bill. It seemed to him (the O'Connor Don) that that statement was rather a flourish than anything else; for the hon.

Member did not go on to tell the names of the different places in which those meetings were held, but he confined his remarks to one meeting held at a place called Mill Street in his own county. What were the facts in connection with that meeting? No doubt the hon. Member for Cork would correct him if he stated wrongly, that since that meeting had been held an action had been brought in the City of Cork against a distiller of the City by two men, who attended at that meeting, in respect of their wages in going there. The action was tried in Cork, and those men recovered their wages against the distiller. That was the sort of way in which those meetings against the Bill had been got up, and those were the persons by whom they were attended; and, therefore, the Committee would pay very little attention to these proceedings. It had been further said that no meetings had been held in the South of Ireland in favour of the Bill; and his hon. Friend went further, and said that whenever there had been a free discussion at any meeting resolutions had been carried against it. During the course of the debate they had heard many astonishing statements; but he had heard none that more astonished him than that no meetings had been held in the Province of Munster in favour of the Bill. The truth was, that not alone had meetings been held there in favour of the Bill, but even at a meeting of the opponents of the Bill, convened under the auspices of the Mayor of the City of Limerick, himself a stern opponent of the Bill, resolutions were carried in favour of it. In spite of that fact, they were told that not a single meeting had been held in the Province of Munster in favour of the Bill, and that not a single free discussion had taken place at which resolutions had not been carried against it. He begged most emphatically to deny that statement. Meetings had been held in Limerick, Waterford, Clonmel, Carrick-on-Suir, Maryborough, Wicklow, and in other places—in all, over 78 meetings had been held in Ireland in favour of the Bill. He might mention that in those he had enumerated he had not included one in the North of Ireland, because the views of the Province of Ulster were well known although they were objected to, as if they had no voice in the matter. He could show four meetings for every one given by the other side; and if the fate of the Bill depended on this test it could not be doubtful. Reference had also been made to the next General Election, and he was not going to imitate his hon. Friend in what he had said; but he would venture to express his opinion that it was an unconstitutional course to threaten Members of that House for the consequences of their acts when they came before their constituents. He apprehended that his hon. Friend did not really mean to use that as his argument; although, were it done, he could point out to him that if this question was not made a hustings question on the last General Election, there had been many bye-elections since at which it had. That question had now become understood, and a candidate's opinion was now asked at the hustings about it. In no case of the bye-elections had the opponents of the Sunday Closing Bill carried the day. Several elections had taken place in the Province of Munster, and one, an election for the County of Waterford. At that election, the question of Sunday closing was raised. He perfectly admitted that Sunday closing views would not carry a man through an election if he were otherwise objectionable; but the Gentleman he had referred to was obliged to pledge himself to Sunday closing, and had always supported the Bill since he had been elected. In no case, so far as he knew, had any man been returned in Ireland, since the question had come into prominence, who had not been a supporter of the Bill. Upon that point he would say no more, but would proceed to make some observations with respect to what had been said regarding the omission of the five towns from the operation of the Bill. The Amendment embodying that had been accepted by the promoters of the Bill; but, of course, the Committee were perfectly aware that the proposal to exempt the five towns did not come from the proposers of the measure. They introduced the Bill as one for the whole of Ireland; and it must also be quite clear, if the matter were considered for a moment, that in consenting to exempt certain portions of the country from the operation of the Bill, they consented to nothing that was inconsistent with the principles of their measure. His hon. Friend said—"Oh! but it was true the Bill was not originally proposed as one to extend to the whole of the United Kingdom." From the commencement the Bill was partial in its operation, and intended only for Ireland, and there was nothing inconsistent in having it still further restricted, and accepting the proposal of the Government for exempting certain portions of Ireland from it. It should be remembered that the Bill was promoted by private Members, and when a hostile minority were opposed to it, it would be utterly impossible for the promoters to pass the Bill without making some concessions to the minority and to the Government. They had been told, in previous Sessions, that public opinion in those large towns was divided on the necessity of the measure; they had been further assured that if the Bill were extended to those places dangerous consequences would result, and that the minority against the Bill in those large towns was considerable, and that that minority would not consent quickly or quietly to the measure. Furthermore, it had been urged that the habits of the people of those large towns were very different from those of persons in other parts of the country, and that in those places there were respectable traders and small householders who were in the habit of getting in beer at dinner times, as was usual in England. Those five towns, it was said, very much resembled the towns in England to which hon. Gentlemen opposite thought this Bill should not be applied. Therefore, it was said that this Bill ought not to be applied to the large towns; but with regard to the rest of the country, a fair case for its passing had been made out. It was proposed to the promoters of the Bill that they should accept that condition. They had accepted it reluctantly; but, nevertheless, they did accept it. Some remarks had been made by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), in which he said that he, representing a county constituency, had always supported the Bill, because his constituency wished it; but he certainly would not give it any further support if he found that the promoters were going to sacrifice the whole of the country districts of Ireland for the sake of those five towns. He urged what would be the feelings of their constituents, if they saw that their Repre-

representatives had sacrificed the good of the greater part of Ireland for the sake of those five towns. For these and other considerations, they had consented to the exemption; but that was not giving everything up. What they said with regard to it was, they had accepted it in order to give what they believed would be a blessing to the whole of the rest of Ireland; they had accepted it in the belief that the Bill would be found to be such a success in the rest of the country, that it would eventually be applied to large towns; and if it should turn out that the experiment were unsuccessful, then the case for extending the operation of the measure to the large towns would be gone; but if they were right, and the measure proved beneficial, it would be impossible to prevent its being extended.

MR. GREENE observed, that the exemption of the five large towns of Ireland from the operation of the Bill was an illogical proceeding. Whether Sunday closing in Ireland was right or not, it was clear that the principle of the Bill was sacrificed if people were encouraged to leave their homes on Sundays and go into the large towns for the purpose of getting drunk. In his humble opinion, and he had had some experience in these matters, the safest course would be to shorten the hours during which public-houses were opened all over the country. They could not advocate entire Sunday closing without taking a Sabbatarian view of the matter. He did not say that those who took that view were not right, and that there should not be any liquor sold on Sunday. But he could not for one moment reconcile his mind to the inconsistency of exempting the five large towns from the operation of the Bill, and yet supporting the measure for the rest of the country. The Irish Members appeared to be very much divided in opinion on this subject. Some had said that Members from Ireland who voted for the measure would be marked men at another General Election, and would not be likely to be returned to that House. At the same time, it was said that if the Bill even passed for Ireland, it would also be passed subsequently for England. Those statements were difficult to reconcile; although it was known that in Ireland different views were generally taken from those held in England. His belief was that if restrictions were made severe and unyielding people rebelled, and the object failed. They could not suddenly get people to fall into the habit of severe restrictions. It would be much better to shorten the hours of closing in Ireland. He thought the prevalence of drunkenness was much exaggerated. Because two or three men were seen drunk in the streets, it was forgotten that there were probably 1,100 who were perfectly sober, it was, moreover, unjust to deprive the great majority of men of proper enjoyment of their refreshment, because an insignificant minority abused the privilege. They should take a rational view, and legislate for men as men, and not as if they were children. Did they suppose for one moment that men would be restrained from drink by any legislation they might pass? A great deal had been said about public-houses. Now, what he saw of the evil in England, it appeared to him that severe restrictions on those places encouraged men to form clubs, over which the police had no control, and where no one had any right of interference. Only the previous day a Bill had been before the House with regard to the franchise. The House was asked then to give to the same people, who it was now said had no power of self-control and must be governed like children, the right to say whether the country should be at peace or war. They did not act on the same principle for two days running. In Ireland, he thought the great evils they suffered from were agitators and priests; and until they got rid of them the people would be below par, and Ireland could never enjoy the same prosperity as the rest of the United Kingdom.

MR. FAWCETT said, that on this question frequent appeals had been made to English Members, and, as an English Member, he did not wish to give a silent vote. It seemed to him that the Bill raised a most important question connected with the future government of the United Kingdom, and it seemed to him that its principle, once settled, would have very serious and mischievous consequences. He would not say a word on the general principle of Sunday closing. The hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson)—whose absence from indisposition the Committee must regret—and those who thought with him, were perfectly logical and consistent in the action which they were taking, because they were in favour of Sunday closing alike for Scotland, for England, and for Ireland. To them he had nothing to say; but he did desire to address one or two remarks to those hon. Members, and especially to responsible Ministers, who were going to vote for the principle of this Bill, and yet who would give a similar Bill for England an unhesitating opposition. He would ask them to consider how they could justify their vote. They might say that they would oppose Sunday closing for England, because of their opinion that the majority of the English people were opposed to it; and that they supported Sunday closing for Ireland, because they believed the majority of the Irish people were in favour of it; but so long as he had a seat in the Imperial Parliament—a Parliament that was the Parliament alike of England, of Scotland, and of Ireland—he would not, whether with reference to Sunday closing, to Home Rule, or to Education, vote to do that for the Irish people which he thought would be bad for the English or the Scotch people. The majority of the people of Ireland were, by their Representatives, in favour of Home Rule; and it should also be borne in mind by hon. Members opposite, and by a Conservative and Protestant Government, that a still greater majority of the people of Ireland were in favour of denominational education. If Parliament were to do for Ireland what they would not do for England, because the majority of the Irish people demanded that it should be done, on what possible ground could the demand for Home Rule or for denominational education be resisted? What answer could be made to Irish Representatives, when next they made a proposal for the settlement of a purely Irish question by the granting of a Charter to an Irish Catholic University? Such a proposal would involve no expenditure of public money, and could not be opposed on that ground. It need not involve the loss of a single shilling to the Imperial Exchequer; but such a proposal would be strenuously resisted by scores of Scotch Members and English Conservative Members. His hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis) would oppose it, and not a man on the front Ministerial bench could do otherwise than oppose it. The Members to whom he addressed himself ought, therefore, seriously to consider their position. He could not help feeling, with the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Greene), that there was some inconsistency between the attitude of those who one day came down to the House and pleaded for an extension of the franchise, on the ground that those whom they wished to enfranchise were as intelligent, as independent, and as good citizens as any in the rest of the Kingdom, and who, on the next day, exhibited the same people to the House as little better than children, who were in want of the patronizing and coddling care of the State, because they were bent on doing what they confessed they ought not to do. He had only one appeal to make to the hon. Member for Cork County (Mr. M'Carthy Downing). He (Mr. Fawcett) was going to support the hon. Member's Amendment, but on one condition, and it might be for the practical convenience of the House that the condition should be stated. He was going to vote for the Amendment, if he was not compelled to stay till an unreasonable hour in order to do so. The principle of the Bill had been again and again discussed. He had not the least sympathy with some of the tactics by which the Bill had been postponed. He was at the House at noon to attend a Committee, and at noon again he would have to be there; and though he was as anxious as the hon. Member for Cork County could be to record his vote against the principle, which many other English Members were going to support, he would tell him frankly that he could not do so if there were any foundation for the rumour he had heard that the Amendment was going to be discussed for three or four hours. The hon. Member would obtain a much better division, and would consult the convenience of the House, if he would allow a decision to be taken at a reasonable hour.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I so cordially agree with the closing words of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) that I am reluctant to trespass on the time and attention of the House, even for a moment; but there were some of his observations to which I think it necessary to make a reply. He has challenged the Government to say with what consistency they can support a measure of this kind, which is intended to apply to Ireland only, when, as he says, they would oppose it if it were proposed for England, or, I think he said, for Scotland; but I must remind the hon. Gentleman that this is one of those measures which cannot be regarded from a purely Imperial point of view, and that legislation precisely of this character, or nearly of the same character, has already been for some years in force in Scotland: and I do not think it at all necessary, for justifying the course which Government take in this matter, that we should enter into such large questions as how we are to deal with the demand for Home Rule or for denominational education, with which the Bill before us has no real analogy. The hon. Member, of course, knows that, while we are anxious to assimilate legislation for all parts of the Kingdom, there are a great many subjects upon which there has been, and always must be, different legislation for different parts of the country—that legislation having reference to differing circumstances and to local considerations. This is exactly one of those measures in reference to which we have to take into account the feelings and the wishes and the circumstances of the portion of the country for which we are legislating. We have to consider that the measure is not one which can be called bad in itself. The great objection that, no doubt, would be taken to the application of such legislation to England is, that it is not suited to the circumstances of the country, and would do more harm than it could possibly do good. In itself, the limitation of the amount of drinking cannot but be considered a good and desirable object, provided it is not likely to meet with such opposition as might do more harm than the good effected; and it was not until it was pretty clear that this measure was agreeable to the feelings of those to whom it is to be applied, that the Government cared to offer it a conditional and moderate support. It is the qualification of our support that illustrates the spirit in which it is given. We say that, believing that the measure is one which in itself is well-intended, and suited to a considerable portion of Ireland, we do not think it one that can safely or properly be applied to certain large towns, and upon that ground we make our proposals in favour of legislation of a partial and local character. I think there is sufficient ground for taking that course, and that it is by no means necessary to follow the hon. Member for Hackney into the larger question which he has raised.

MR. STACPOOLE deprecated such allusions as those made by the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Greene) to the Irish priesthood. He (Mr. Stacpoole) was a Protestant; but he must certainly say that all the priests in Ireland were in favour of law and order. He had also to say, however, that he believed the majority of the people of Ireland were against the Bill. Many of them did not properly understand it, and of those who had come to appreciate its significance, many now refused to sign Petitions in its favour. He hoped the House would postpone legislating on this subject until after a General Election.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS reminded the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) that on the questions of Home Rule and denominational education Ireland was divided into two hostile political camps, with no possibility of their agreeing; while in reference to the question involved in this Bill the case was far otherwise. Of about 70 Members representing Ireland on the Opposition side of the House, only 12 or 15 voted against the Bill. The rest who voted did so in its favour. Of about 35 Members from Ireland on the Ministerial side, not more than three or four voted against it. In Ireland large numbers of the leaders of Roman Catholics, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, and Non-conformist Bodies petitioned Parliament in its favour. To say only that a majority of the people of Ireland were in favour of the Bill was a weak and quite inadequate statement of the real fact of the case, which was that the vast majority of all parties, classes, and political or religious creeds in Ireland were in favour of the Bill. ["No, no!"] He was told by the exclamations of some hon. Members "No, no!" but he was at a loss to understand how any other or better evidence of the fact could be brought before the House than the several measures taken to exhibit the real feeling of the people. As to the Government Amendment proposing to exempt five large towns from the operation of the Bill, would those who support the Bill not have been foolish in the last degree if they had opposed a proposition which would secure the Government help in trying the experiment of Sunday closing in regard to the rest of Ireland, which they believed would result in convincing the Legislature that the grounds on which the Bill was promoted were right grounds? He thought, if the Bill was good for the villages, it was good for the cities, and he had not voted for the Government Amendment. But were they to be told that, because the force of the Government was sufficient to carry a clause exempting certain portions of Ireland from the operation of the Bill, that they should allow the Bill to be lost? In consequence of what was frequently being said as to the evidence given before the Select Committee on this Bill, he challenged hon. Members to controvert his assertion that the evidence of those witnesses who spoke to matters of fact in relation to the working of the Scotch system since the passing of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act was all in favour of that system; while among those witnesses who came from Ireland to give, as a matter of opinion, their idea as to the applicability of the system to Ireland, there was a vast difference of opinion. With the Scotch example and experience, and the admission by Parliament, in the case of Scotland, of the principle that upon this subject the Legislature was entitled to deal with the different parts of the country in different ways, he thought the legislation now requested by all classes and parties in Ireland ought to be granted. The exemption of the five towns should not be an obstacle to the passing of the Bill; because it would give supporters and opponents alike the opportunity of comparing the state of things in those towns and out of them, and testing whether the principle of Sunday closing could successfully be applied to the whole of Ireland.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, for some years he was in favour of this Bill, believing that its promoters expressed the public opinion of Ireland; but he confessed that the arguments used in a former debate by the hon. Member for

Cork (Mr. Murphy), and the statistics then produced—and never since combated—had perfectly convinced him that the general impression as to the currency of opinions in Ireland in favour of this Bill was without foundation in fact. Drinking of itself could not be more objectionable or criminal on Sunday than on any other day; but Sunday being a day of rest, if the leisure then enjoyed were made bad use of for the purpose of excessive drinking, it was right that the facilities for drinking on that day should be largely curtailed. But what was proved by statistics given to the Select Committee, and never challenged? That the offences arising from drinking on Sunday, compared with those arising from drinking on other days, were as two to three. He admitted that, as far as external appearances were concerned, the Forbes-Mackenzie Act had not been a failure in Scotland. But he denied that it had been a success in the way of effecting a reform of the drinking habits of the Scotch people. The alcoholic liquors now consumed in Scotland greatly exceeded in quantity per head of the population their consumption before the passing of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act. He respected the honourable consistency with which Sabbatarians and teetotallers supported the Bill; but he wished to take that view of this subject which presented itself to the ordinary man of the world, and to investigate the subject uninfluenced by their principles. The case which it was attempted to make out was, that the Irish people had abused their facilities for drinking on Sunday, and that it was absolutely necessary that these facilities should be curtailed. He could not see how that contention could be maintained side by side with a proposal to except populations numbering five-eighths of the whole borough population of Ireland. The Bill, as it now stood, raised the question of the different treatment of one town and another. Was it not monstrous to propose that those who might go from Cork on a Sunday to enjoy themselves in the country should not be able to procure their accustomed recreation and refreshment, while those who went from more wholesome localities into the slums of Cork could get what they chose to drink? He opposed the Bill, and would vote for the Amendment of his hon. Friend (Mr. M'Carthy Downing), not only because he thought the measure ill-considered, but because he considered that, in its new form, it would be unfair and partial in its operation.

MR. KING-HARMAN hoped the Bill would be made a temporary measure, since if there were ground for believing that it would be extremely unsuitable for the large towns excepted from its full operation, it might also be found extremely unsuitable for the whole country. He would therefore like to know from the promoters of the Bill, whether they would be prepared to accept his Amendment limiting the operation of the measure to a period of two or three years, in order to test its usefulness?

MR. O'CONNOR POWER expressed his intention of being brief in the remarks he had to make, although the opponents of the Bill had not supplied a motive for that brevity by their example. The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Greene) appeared to have been so impressed with an argument which he had adduced on a previous occasion that he had repeated it that evening, and he had so repeated it as to win the approval of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett). But he would ask—what was that argument worth? The hon. Gentleman who represented Bury St. Edmunds said—"You are asking the franchise for people whom you will not intrust with the liberty of taking a glass of beer on Sunday." The answer to that statement was that, if the majority of the Irish Members were in favour of a Sunday Closing Bill, they were also in favour of a Permissive Bill. Had a Bill of the latter description been carried, the Irish people would have settled this question without asking the House of Commons to decide the matter by a Sunday closing measure; for he had no doubt that, in the large majority of districts, the preponderance of opinion on the part of the ratepayers would have been found on the side of shutting up the public-houses. The hon. Member to whom he referred had also said—"Get rid of your priests, and you will solve the difficulty." He must tell the hon. Member that the only body of men in Ireland who had been able to exert sufficient power to close the public-houses without the aid of the law were the very priests whom he called upon them to get rid of, in order that they might promote the cause of temperance. The hon. Member had no right to introduce an element, not of religious feeling, but of religious bigotry, into a question of this kind. If that were an improper thing to do in relation to most questions, it was a most improper thing to do in connection with a body of men who had, as he had already indicated, exerted their influence successfully in favour of the cause of temperance. The hon. Member for Hackney had spoken of the inconvenience which would result from the Government supporting this measure. He (Mr. O'Connor Power) looked at it from a moral standpoint; and he believed that the mistake which the hon. Member made was in thinking that whatever happened to be the wish of the Irish people must therefore be opposed to the integrity of the Empire—the mistake of elevating what were purely local Irish questions into the dignity of Imperial questions, and of saying, in effect, from an unfounded fear of the result of conceding the wishes of the Irish people—"We cannot do this; if the Irish wish it, it must be opposed to our own desires and interests," was one into which many hon. Members seemed not unfrequently inclined to fall. He regretted that the hon. Member was not now in his place. Had he been present, he would have taken the opportunity of assuring him that if he were interested in the integrity of Empire, the best way to preserve that integrity was to concede every local wish in regard to local affairs in Scotland, local affairs in England, and local affairs in Ireland. If, on the other hand, the hon. Member desired to stimulate the disaffection of the Irish people towards Imperialism, he should endeavour to thwart their local and natural wishes, and should use his influence in the House in opposing the views which had been endorsed by a majority of their Representatives. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the County of Cork (Mr. M'Carthy Downing) had threatened the supporters of the Bill with the prospect of not being returned to the next Parliament if they continued to advocate the measure. The answer which he had to make to that threat was that the principle of the Bill appealed to the moral sense of the Irish people, and that in such a case he had no fear of the result. He had seen great politicians and strong parties frightened by appeals of a different character—appeals coming from great and powerful organizations. Those for whom he spoke did not regard such appeals in Ireland. They appealed to the moral feeling which had sustained this agitation through many vicissitudes; and they would return from Ireland to advocate the same principles when, perhaps, the hon. Member for Cork County was left weeping alone by his own fire-side.

MR. STORER thought that the great end to be attained was a limitation of the hours during which public-houses were open in Ireland on Sunday, and he believed that the Amendment of the Government would effect that result. He desired to point out how very futile was the argument which was derived from the case of Scotland and the frequent allusions that had been made to the Forbes-Mackenzie Act. It had been said that since the passing of that measure the consumption of ardent spirits in the country where it was in operation had not increased; but the statement was entirely erroneous. The fact was, that of late years whiskey-drinking had increased to a great extent in Scotland. Not only so, but the only country in which it had increased was the very country that had been spoken of as being the land of Sunday piety and Sunday closing. The Returns of the Revenue Department clearly proved this to be the fact. They showed, that during 1877, whiskey-drinking in Scotland had materially increased; whereas in England and Ireland it had materially decreased.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he had listened attentively to the speech of the hon. Member for Cork County, and, so far from looking upon that speech as an argument against the Bill, he regarded it as a strong argument in favour of the measure. In the course of his remarks, the hon. Member had produced a certain document by way of illustration; but what was the nature of that document? It was a document signed by some of the most eminent men in the country, not in opposition to the Bill, but expressive of their regret that it had been abandoned so far as the large towns were concerned.

Question put.

On Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill?"

MAJOR O'GORMAN said, he must express a hope that the spirit of compromise was now at an end.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 2 (Travellers' exemption orders) struck out.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir Joseph M'Kenna.)

THE O'CONOR DON said, he had no objection to that being done.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he had no wish to detain the Committee; but he desired to be allowed to make a brief personal explanation. An accident had occurred to him that evening which, he believed, had sometimes happened to other hon. Members. He had gone into a different Lobby from that which he intended, and had voted for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork County when he had intended to vote against it. It was with great surprise that he had found himself, when too late, in the wrong Lobby.

MR. RICHARD SMYTH believed that the hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure) had made precisely a similar mistake.

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF DEEDS BY MARRIED WOMEN (IRELAND) BILL.

(Mr. Meldon, Mr. O'Shaughnessy.)

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Meldon.)

MR. O'CONNOR POWER moved, as an Amendment, the adjournment of the debate, and appealed to his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Meldon) not to press the matter upon the present occasion. The Bill had arrived at this stage without having attracted much attention on the part of Irish Members; and, unfortunately, as he was advised, it was a measure which affected a case that was now sub judice. At all events, he again appealed to his hon. and learned Friend to give him some further time in order to examine into the effects of its provisions.

MR. BIGGAR seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. O'Connor Power.)

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, the Bill was simply a declaratory enactment, assimilating the law of Ireland to that of England in certain important legal particulars.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Gibson) hoped that no opposition would be offered to the passing of this simple measure. The object of the Bill was to enable the Courts to do a simple act of justice, and to put parties under such terms with regard to costs as they might think proper. The law had been amended in England under precisely the same conditions a few years ago; and the present Bill simply gave to the Irish Courts the discretion which was already enjoyed in England.

MR. DODDS hoped the Bill would be allowed to pass.

MR. MELDON was afraid that if the measure were not passed, the effect might be to unsettle hundreds of settlements of sales.

Question put.

The House divided:—Aye 1; Noes 79: Majority 78.—(Div. List, No. 137.)

MR. BIGGAR moved the adjournment of the House. He did so because—

MR. SPEAKER, interposing, pointed out to the hon. Member that, having seconded the Amendment for the adjournment of the debate, he had exhausted his right to speak.

MR. MELDON moved, in Clause 5, line 4, after the word “the,” to insert the words, “Common Pleas Division of the.”

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. O’CONNOR POWER said, he did not desire to put himself in opposition to an overwhelming majority of the House; but, really, he did not understand why there should be all this hurry in regard to the Bill. He asked once more that some further time should be allowed for its consideration.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member must confine his observations to the Motion immediately before the House.

MR. O’CONNOR POWER had only further to say, that he felt himself reluctantly bound to exhaust all the Forms of the House in opposing the Bill.

MAJOR O’GORMAN desired to state that in the last division he had voted in error, and had gone into the wrong Lobby. He was very much in favour of married women possessing their own property.

NOXIOUS VAPOURS COMMISSION— THE REPORT.—QUESTION.

LORD WINMARLEIGH asked the noble Lord the Chairman of the Commission appointed the year before last to inquire into the operation of the Noxious Vapours Act, when it was likely the Commission would report? The subject into which the Commission had been inquiring was one of great interest to his county and other parts of the country.

LORD ABERDARE said, he regretted the delay that had occurred. The Commission had taken a great deal of evidence in various parts of the country. He had been so occupied with other duties and cares, that he had not been able to give as much time as he could have wished to the preparation of the Report; but no time would now be lost in preparing it and presenting it to Parliament.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS)
BILL.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that the Amendments in this Bill proposed to be moved in Committee by the Lord President occupied six pages of the Notice Paper. It was true that a number of those Amendments were merely verbal; but he thought it would be well to reprint the Bill, and give their Lordships time to look into them before the House was called upon to go into Committee on the Bill.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that, while anxious to have the Bill sent down to the other House in good time, he was also desirous of consulting the convenience of the noble Duke and the rest of their Lordships. He would postpone the Committee from Tuesday to Thursday if that would suit the noble Duke, and, in the meantime, would have printed Amendments relating to the Irish part of the case. Most of the Amendments already printed were merely verbal.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE suggested that their Lordships should go into Committee pro forma on Tuesday, in order that the Bill, with Amendments, might be reprinted by Thursday.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he would adopt that arrangement if it would meet the views of the noble Duke.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, he was satisfied with that arrangement.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON asked, whether, before Thursday, his noble Friend the Lord President would be able to produce the Correspondence with foreign countries on the subject of the Bill.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, there would be no unnecessary delay in producing the Correspondence, but there had been very

MATRIMONIAL CAUSES ACTS AMENDMENT BILL—(No. 60.)

(The Lord Sudeley.)

THIRD READING. BILL PASSED.

Bill read 3<sup>a</sup> (according to Order) with the Amendments.

LORD PENZANCE said, he had given notice of an Amendment to meet the views of those who thought there was some objection to the mode in which, by his clause, it was proposed to recover maintenance money from husbands against whom magistrates pronounced judicial separation in consequence of their having assaulted their wives.

Amendment moved, in Clause 4, line 3, leave out from ("the board") to ("conviction") in line 5, both inclusive, and insert ("his wife"); line 7, leave out from ("the support") to ("her") in line 14, both inclusive, and insert—

("Her support, and the payment of any sum of money so ordered shall be enforceable and enforced against the husband in the same manner as the payment of money is enforced under an order of affiliation.")—(The Lord Penzance.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that the Amendment proposed by his noble and learned Friend was a great improvement, and met the difficulty which he pointed out when his noble and learned Friend introduced the clause.

Amendment agreed to; further Amendments made.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

PREACHERS IN ST. PAUL'S.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY inquired, Whether it was the fact that the Reverend Mr. Edwards, Vicar of Prestbury, who has been suspended from his ministrations by the Provincial Court of Canterbury, has been selected to preach in the Metropolitan Church of St. Paul's, London; and, if so, by whom so selected? It had been stated, in plain words, that a certain gentleman notorious for his contempt of the law of this country had been invited to preach in the Metropolitan Church of St. Paul's. At the present time, that gentleman refused to acknowledge the jurisdiction of the highest Tribunal of the Church in the Province of Canterbury, and was under suspension for contumacy. Whatever might be the difficulty of getting certain gentlemen to submit to the judgment of the legally constituted authorities, it did seem strange that a clergyman under sentence for contumacy by the highest Tribunal in the Church should be selected to preach in the Cathedral of the Metropolis. Surely, the Church was not reduced so low, as to be obliged to invite such clergymen to preach in the cathedrals? Whether or not it was a fact that Mr. Edwards had been selected to preach at St. Paul's, he could not say. The statement had been circulated in the newspapers for some days, and, as he believed that St. Paul's was under the control of the Dean and Chapter, who enjoyed their high position by the laws of this country, he thought it strange they should have selected to preach in the Church under their charge a clergyman who had earned his distinction by wilfully breaking and setting at nought those laws. Therefore, he thought it right to ask the right rev. Prelate, who presided over the Diocese of London, whether there was any truth in the report?

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, he would give their Lordships the best explanation he could; but it must be borne in mind that it was only that morning that he saw the notice of this Question in the newspapers. In the middle of the day he received a note from the noble Earl; but it was quite impossible since to make such inquiries as to give him a definite answer. The appointment of preachers in St. Paul's stood thus. The morning preachers were appointed by the Bishop, and the afternoon preachers were the Canons in residence, who took the duty in turn. The evening preaching was a comparatively late institution. It commenced 11 or 12 years ago. For a few years, evening sermons were preached only in the first three months of the year. The preachers for those three months were appointed by the Bishop; but the evening preachers for the nine other months were now appointed by the Canons on some arrangement among themselves. The appointment was supposed theoretically to be made by the whole Chapter. As soon as he saw in the newspapers the announcement referred to by the noble Earl, he wrote to Canon Lightfoot, the Canon in residence, to know if there was any truth in the statement? In reply, he stated that he had no knowledge at all of such a selection, nor could he obtain any information on the subject from any other member of the Chapter. Canon Lightfoot added, that neither the Dean nor Canon Gregory was at home. Since the receipt of Canon Lightfoot's letter he had seen Bishop Claughton, the Archdeacon of London, and the Archdeacon had stated to him that neither he nor Canon Gregory knew anything about the matter, and that the Dean and Canon Liddon were absent. The letter of Canon Lightfoot went on to say that he had heard the rumour a few days ago, but attached no importance to it, and that a large proportion of the rumours relating to St. Paul's were without foundation. He could assure their Lordships that if he took the trouble of contradicting the rumours which he saw in the newspapers respecting himself, he would have very little time left for the work of his Diocese.

WATERFORD, DUNGARVAN, AND

[Lords.] (By Order.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."

The Earl of Harrowby

MR. DELAHUNTY, in rising to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, the Bill related to a railway in the county of Waterford—a county bounded on the south by the sea, and on the north by the Commeragh and Knockmealdown chain of mountains. Attempts had been made, over and over again, to get this railway constructed, but all of them had failed, for the traffic was not looked upon as sufficient to invite private speculators to invest their capital. After the abandonment, in 1871, of an Act which had previously been obtained by a private Company, the local solicitor and engineer of the line which was abandoned got up a subscription of a few hundred pounds from certain individuals in Waterford, and lodged a Bill for consideration in the Session of 1872, which asked, among other things, for a guarantee from four out of the eight baronies in the county of 5 per cent for 20 years on £280,000 required to construct the line. A meeting of the ratepayers of the baronies was called in 1872, and at that meeting a committee was appointed to draw up a resolution for the general meeting outside. He (Mr. Delahunty) happened to be a member of that committee, which also included Lord Waterford, Sir Robert Paul, Mr. Carew, the Hon. Mr. Stuart, Mr. Power, and Mr. Edward Roberts — making seven altogether. At the meeting, Lord Waterford and others said, at once, that they would give no guarantee; and in the discussion which took place, the opinion was adopted that it would be well if the ratepayers themselves would supply the whole of the capital for making the line by pledging the rates of the eight baronies, and also the rates of the city, for a certain period, and raising a sufficient sum to cover both interest and sinking fund, so as to give the county and city the sole property in the railway at the end of 35 years. At that meeting the solicitor of the promoters of the Bill was present, and he suggested that the Bill then before Parliament should be adopted in the same light as a Parliamentary dummy Bill, for the purpose of avoiding the expense that was always incurred in lodging plans for a new measure. The committee agreed with that suggestion, and that the Bill, although at that time considered as merely so much waste paper, should be adopted in that way, as a step towards getting a new Bill in the subsequent Session, in which the wishes of the ratepayers might be inserted and carried out. He could, if necessary, refer to the speeches which were made on the occasion, and particularly his own, to show what the intention at that time was with regard to the Bill. Undoubtedly, there was no intention of giving a guarantee for 20 years. That was distinctly refused; but the conclusion arrived at was to provide 5 per cent on an estimated capital of £280,000 for a period of five years, during the construction of the line, and for 35 years after the opening of the railway for traffic by charging the rates with 3½ per cent upon the capital, which was expected to be got from the Board of Works, and 1½ per cent for a sinking fund. That being so, it was estimated that these two payments of 3½ per cent and 1½ per cent would enable the county and city to acquire the entire property of the railway at the end of 35 years. It was not necessary that he should state all that was said at the meeting. He had brought the newspaper reports with him, and he might read the views expressed as to the intentions of the meeting, if the House thought necessary. The dummy Bill was assented to, and in August, 1872, a meeting of the ratepayers was held, at which both the county and the city agreed in effect to ratify the proceedings of the former meeting. Resolutions were, therefore, passed, one of which he would read, authorizing the construction of the railway, and making provision for raising the necessary capital. Not only were the four baronies of the county included in the liability of the original Bill, but the other four baronies and the city of Waterford were combined with them in carrying into effect the same object. The resolution would show exactly what was understood to be the nature of the liability. It was as follows:—

“That, inasmuch as the ratepayers of the county and city of Waterford are to guarantee the payment of interest on the whole capital required for the construction of the Waterford, Dungarvan, and Lismore Railway, whether advanced by the Public Works Loan Commissioners or otherwise, it should be enacted, that the directors thereof be appointed and elected by the Grand Juries of the county and city in the proportion of eight for the county and four for the city, and that such directors, as trustees of the ratepayers, have and enjoy full powers to construct and manage such railway."

Nothing could be more explicit than that resolution, and no contrary resolution of ratepayers ever passed in regard to this railway. But the professional gentlemen to whom he had already referred, who assisted in getting up the meeting, and had the confidence of the directors, in place of carrying out the wishes of the ratepayers for the construction of the railway as a county and city railway, omitted altogether in the Parliamentary Notice published in November, 1872, any provision to authorize the ratepayer ownership and control, but merely conferred a subsidy—if it might so be called—of £14,000 a-year for 40 years to the parties who were the original promoters of the line, and leaving the county out altogether. It was not until 1873 that the ratepayers found out how they were being treated, and that this fraud, if he might call it so, perpetrated upon them. They petitioned Parliament, but it happened that they were too late, the Bill having passed the Commons, and the time for petitioning in the Lords having expired. Even at the eleventh hour the justice of their case was so strong and so apparent, that they succeeded in getting inserted a Proviso in the 10th clause of the Bill, by which the Grand Juries of the county and city at the next ensuing Assizes were authorized to appoint directors in the manner proposed by the resolution previously passed by the ratepayers. When that power was conferred upon the Grand Juries the city Grand Jury acted upon it, and appointed their four directors. The county Grand Jury, influenced by the promoters, however, did not appoint their number, and the consequence was, that the intentions of Parliament were frustrated. He held in his hand a letter, written at the time by Messrs. Holmes and Co., Parliamentary agents, who acted for the Petitioners, and it showed exactly what occurred in regard to the Proviso inserted in the Bill. The letter was as follows:—

"7th July, 1873.

"DEAR SIR,—I have duly received from you The Waterford News of the 4th inst., containing a letter from Mr. Edmond Power, dated the 1st of July, 1873. [Mr. Edmond Power was solicitor to the Company.] As regards the paragraph in that letter referring to the presentation of the Petition, Mr. Power's statement is entirely erroneous. In the first place, you were not present, although he has stated that you were. Secondly, the object of the meeting with Lord Redesdale, referred to, was for the purpose of asking his Lordship to suspend the Standing Orders, so as to enable the ratepayers to present a Petition against the Bill, and to appear by counsel before a Select Committee of the House. On his Lordship being informed that the Bill had passed through the Commons unopposed, and was to come before his Lordship in Committee in a day or so after, as an unopposed Bill, he very properly, without hearing any argument on the subject, declined to suspend the Standing Order, but informed the promoters, who were represented by their Parliamentary agent, that he would require strict proof of the Preamble. When the Committee met, his Lordship heard your statement, and supported the correctness of it by declining to pass the Bill as it stood. He required the promoters to alter the 10th clause, so as to deal with the Bill in conformity with the resolutions passed by the ratepayers, which was all that you required."

The Bill was then amended by Lord Redesdale, although there was no Parliamentary Notice given of any such Amendment, and the Bill went down to the Grand Juries in that shape. The provision was that the Grand Juries at the coming Assizes should appoint all the directors—eight by the county Grand Jury, and four by the city Grand Jury. The city and Grand Jury, as he had already stated, appointed their four; but the county, influenced by the directors of the Company, of whom there were several on the Grand Jury, refused to carry out the law; and the consequence was that the ratepayers found themselves bound to pay the whole price of the railway—£14,000 a-year for 40 years—without having any ownership or control whatever over the concern. It was a scandal that such a thing should have occurred, or that the ratepayers should be mulcted to such an extent by persons acting without their consent and against their wishes. He thought that the ratepayers of the county and city of Waterford, having thus been robbed and plundered, had a right to be heard. It was a scandal and disgrace to find that such a thing could have occurred without a remedy. If a private individual paid the interest upon the purchase money of an estate and provided a sinking fund to pay off the capital, and then an attorney, who had acted for him, stepped in and made the property his own, surely a Court of Equity would make such person give up the property so acquired. The county of Waterford had paid for this railway, and yet they found themselves without ownership or control. The Bill now before the House was a new Bill brought forward to give further powers to the Company, so that they might dip their hands still further into the pockets of the ratepayers. The ratepayers were almost to a man against it, and thousands of signatures could be obtained to a Petition against the Bill. He would read two letters which he had received from two of the principal landowners of the county. One was from Mr. More Smyth, of Ballinatrav, who was very well known all over Ireland. Mr. Smyth wrote—

“SIR,—I have just seen and read your Circular about the Waterford, Dungarvan, and Lismore Railway, which I most heartily approve of.

[That was a Circular which he (Mr. Delahunty) had sent to every elector of the county. A meeting was held in the county, at which the gentleman who wrote the next letter he intended to read acted as chairman, and the meeting was unanimous in passing votes of approval, support, and co-operation with him and those who desired to restrain this attempt at the perpetration of further wrong.]

I was on the Grand Jury of the county when this Bill was first introduced. It is as different now as day is from night. I regret much that my time is limited, and that I cannot more fully enter into the matter; but, perhaps, I may have an opportunity of doing so some other time. In the meantime, I will set the wires going, and get as many signatures as possible from the ratepayers. Wishing you every success in your efforts to relieve the ratepayers from an act of injustice and from the burden of ruinous taxation which has been thrust upon them,—I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) C. U. MORE SMYTH.”

The second letter was from a gentleman—well known as a large landed proprietor in the county—Mr. R. Maxwell Gumbleton. He wrote—

“MARCH 27th, 1878.

“DEAR MR. DELAHUNTY,—Thanks for your letter just received. I beg to say that it is out of my power to leave home just now, or I would have much pleasure in assisting in letting the Parliament know the feeling of the Waterford ratepayers concerning the guaranteed railway. Any way, you have done your duty like a man, and you may be sure all the landholders, and many of the landowners, feel grateful to you for the trouble you have taken in trying to stop more taxation being put on the people, who can hardly hold their heads over water.—Yours sincerely, &c.

R. M. GUMBLETON.”

In 1873, the Press of Waterford all commented upon what occurred. He mentioned the fact, because it had been said that the ratepayers never wanted to have this railway. He would read one short paragraph from one of the papers of that day to show that such was not the case. It was as follows:—

“Nothing could be more gratifying than the fact—novel in this country—that the new railway will be the property, not of speculators (which it was now), but of the people who will find the money for it—namely, the ratepayers both of the city and county—to be used for their own benefit. It will be made by a loan from Government, to be repaid, both principal and interest, in 35 years.”

That showed what the general feeling was as to the real intention of the ratepayers. It was fully in accordance with the statements made in the speeches, and showed the construction placed upon such statements by the newspapers. He had read this extract, because he regarded it as short, conclusive, and entirely to the point. It showed at once what was intended. Matters, however, had been so manipulated since, that the people of Waterford now found themselves in the position of having to pay a subsidy, equal, according to population, to that of the French after the German War. Nevertheless, this Company comes before Parliament, asking for further powers to enable them to mulct the people. Parliament fully intended that the ratepayers should have the control of this railway. The Proviso inserted in the Bill, and which was inserted upon the Petition of the ratepayers, was to the effect that the Grand Juries at the Assizes of 1873 should appoint the directors. Unfortunately, it was left optional with them. It was said at the time that it ought to be compulsory; but, unfortunately, the ratepayers had confidence in the Grand Juries that they would do what was right. He saw now that they ought to have made the exercise of the power compulsory; but, unfortunately, they did not, and the result was that the county was sold. The present Bill proposed to raise additional capital, and it said that the new capital was not to be charged upon the ratepayers. Supposing this were really the fact, the Company took powers in the Bill for making working traffic and running arrangements with other Companies, which they could exercise independent of all control by the ratepayers. They would virtually be allowed to do what they pleased, and they could enter into arrangements with other Railway Companies, particularly with a line belonging to the Duke of Devonshire, between Lismore and Fermoy, by which they would be able to sweep away any receipts that ought to go to the relief of the liabilities of the ratepayers, and give the benefit of them to the other lines. In effect, this Bill would hang an additional millstone round the neck of the ratepayers, and any railway man must know that a Railway Board could enter into arrangements with another Company, so that they could lose up to 75 per cent of the expenses incurred in the working of the line. He had himself been Chairman of a Company, which made an arrangement with another Company, by which that Company worked the line at a price which ensured a loss of near 75 per cent on the working. He was in a position to prove the truth of this statement, and in this particular case they were dealing with parties who had an interest in doing what was right. In the case he was acquainted with, the Company paid for their shares without a guarantee; but here was a Company whose dividends were paid by the ratepayers, and who had no interest in keeping down the working expenses. In fact, during the whole time of the construction of the line, the county had paid 5 per cent on all the money raised. They were paying £14,000 a-year now, although the line was not opened; and yet the Company, who had paid nothing towards their dividends, were coming to Parliament and seeking for further powers to enable them to enter into arrangements with some such line as the Fermoy and Lismore Railway, which, now paying nothing to its owners, would, under these arrangements, be sure to increase the working expenses of the guaranteed line, and prevent for ever any hope of lessening liabilities or repaying advances. All he would say, further, was that a contract had been deliberately entered into, which contract had not been fulfilled. Parliament had itself stepped in for the purpose of securing something like the performance of the contract; but from circumstances, over which the ratepayers had no control, unfortunately, the intentions of Parliament had been frustrated and violated. He thought that, under these circumstances, the House of Commons ought not to allow any further powers to be granted to this Company until they had restored the ratepayers to a proper control over the line. That was one position that he took up. Another was, that the ratepayers had already been served with a notice by the Company that they had no locus standi to appear before a Parliamentary Committee against this Bill. If they had no such locus standi before a Select Committee, they would find themselves done. It was, therefore, imperative that they should oppose the second reading of the Bill, unless the promoters consented to restore to the ratepayers, by the insertion of clauses, the power they claimed of appointing the directors. The parties who contributed to the cost of the line were entitled, under the Act, to receive 5 per cent. The county and the city were the only parties who had paid anything, and they should be the only parties who ought to work the line. Unfortunately, the line was in the hands of parties who had no interest to work it cheaply. On the contrary, in the place of making the line for the estimates as they ought to have done, they added £200,000 to the cost. They had not only spent the £280,000, but £193,000 in addition, which had been raised by debenture bonds, and still they were £100,000 short of the means of making the line and providing the rolling stock. At the present moment they had no rolling stock, and to obtain it they wanted to dip their hands further into the pockets of the ratepayers. It was under these circumstances that the ratepayers objected to any further powers being granted to the Company. Let them finish the line they had contracted for, and if there were to be a new speculation set on foot, let them carry it out independently. There was another speculation they had put forward, not in connection with the present line, but for the construction of another—a line from Fermoy to Cork. They had issued notices for a line between those towns, although they had not a penny, and were unable to find the funds to finish their present contract. Yet Parliament was asked to allow them the further powers asked for in the present Bill. He hoped that Parliament would do justice to the ratepayers; that they would reject the Bill; and that this fresh attempt at extortion would be defeated. Parliament ought to stand by their own declaration to the ratepayers of the county, and concede to them the right of appointing the directors of the Company. It was part of the Bill of 1873 that they were to appoint, through the Grand Juries, all the directors. The income of all landholders was, for Income Tax purposes, reckoned to be £1 per annum for every £3 of their land valuation. They would, therefore, on a 3*d.* Income Tax, have to pay 1*d.* on every £1 of their land valuation. This special tax was 1*s.* 4*d.* in the £1, so that they had to pay 16 times as much for this tax as they had to pay for the Income Tax. He asked, if that were not a direct scandal? And it must not be forgotten that, although they paid the money, they had no sort of ownership over the line. The Company ought to endeavour to act towards the ratepayers in an equitable spirit. The ratepayers would be perfectly ready to meet them; but they would not rest content to be for ever deprived of their property. If the Bill were not rejected on the second reading, the chances were that the Forms of Parliament would prevent the ratepayers from being heard before a Select Committee; but, whether or not, he did not see why the ratepayers, burdened as they were, should have to spend £700 or £800 to fight a battle before a Select Committee, in which their own money would be employed in fighting against them. That this was so was apparent from the Bill itself, which stated that the cost of the measure was to be paid for by the Company; so that the ratepayers would find their own money was being used for the purpose of cutting their throats. He trusted that the House would unanimously reject the Bill, and he begged now to move that it be read a second time on that day six months.

THE O'CONOR DON said, he rose to second the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Waterford, and he did so without having any interest whatever in the locality affected by the Bill. Nor did he intend, in the remarks he intended to offer, to say anything at all in regard to the merits or details of the question. It seemed to him that in the Bill now before the House a very great principle was involved. It would be recollected that on former occasions the question of localities guaranteeing a certain dividend on the money invested in railways had been before the House. It would also be remembered that that principle had never been adopted in England. In England the principle had never been assented to of allowing a Company to go down to any part of the country and construct a line with a guaranteed dividend to the shareholders. The principle had, however, been adopted in the case of Ireland, and the abuses which crept in in regard to this guaranteed system in Ireland became so great, that a few years ago it was found necessary to pass a Standing Order which required the approval of the local authorities, before the promoters of such a Bill were heard, or before the Bill was taken into consideration by Parliament. In the year 1874 a Standing Order, upon his Motion and at his suggestion, was passed by the House, to the effect that none of these guarantees should be sanctioned and none of these charges thrown upon the local rates, or even received or entertained by Parliament, unless the proposal was first approved by the Guardians, the Presentment Sessions, and by the Grand Juries. This particular Bill was passed before that Standing Order came into force, and consequently, in this particular case, the preliminary assents were never obtained, and the Bill passed through Parliament without the sanction of the local authorities in this respect having been obtained. But in addition to this fact, there was this circumstance connected with the existing Act, which he believed was quite exceptional—namely, that the whole of the capital had been guaranteed. As the hon. Member for Waterford had explained, the county having guaranteed the interest upon the capital, it was intended that the railway should really belong to the county. It was further intended by Parliament that the county, representing the only parties having an interest in the line, should have full control over it. As the hon. Member for Waterford had pointed out, as a matter of fact that understanding was not carried out. The railway, instead of belonging to the county, had been converted, like all other guaranteed railways, into a shareholders'

they could exercise independent of all control by the ratepayers. railway, under directors appointed by the shareholders. It was under these circumstances that the Company came now to ask for a further extension and for the privileges to which his hon. Friend had alluded. He (the O'Connor Don) contended that even if this further extension did not interfere with the guarantee or the charge already placed on the county, the Company would have no right to come to Parliament and ask for a further extension until, in the first instance, they had carried out the intentions of Parliament in passing the original Act—namely, that the line should belong to the county through whose money it was made. Another reason why he had risen to second the Motion of his hon. Friend was this—It seemed to him that in the Bill there was an endeavour to place an additional charge upon the ratepayers indirectly, which, if it were to be placed upon them directly, would come under the Standing Orders, and would consequently require the sanction of the Grand Jury. It would, he thought, be well for the House to consider whether it would allow a Standing Order, passed with the intention of securing the interests of the ratepayers in all these cases, to be evaded, as was done in this case. He asked the particular attention of the Chairman of Committees to this point. By the Bill, as he understood its provisions, certain powers were taken for entering into arrangements with other Railway Companies with regard to running powers and so on. Everyone connected with railway management knew perfectly well that under an arrangement entered into with another Company the running powers and arrangements made for carrying on the traffic might be of such a character as to absorb almost the entire amount of the receipts, or, at any rate, the greater portion of them. Under the existing Act the receipts were to go towards the relief of the burdens of the ratepayers, who were to provide any excess of expenditure and interest upon the capital invested over the receipts. By reducing the receipts, and taking away from the ratepayers anything not contemplated by the original Act, they interfered with the security given to the ratepayers. Therefore, in the present Bill, although there was no proposal to have a new guarantee, there was, in reality, a proposal to interfere with a sum of money which, by the original Act, was to go to the ratepayers. He held that this was as much an attack upon the pockets of the ratepayers, as if the Company proposed in the Bill to have a new guarantee. If they proposed a new guarantee on their new capital, there could not be a question that they would have, under the Standing Order, to go, in the first instance, to the local authorities for their approval; and he was of opinion that Parliament ought not to permit them to do indirectly that which they could not do directly. This, he thought, was a good and sufficient reason for rejecting the Bill on the second reading. As a rule, he was indisposed to reject a Bill on the second reading, believing that it might be much better settled in a Committee upstairs. There was, however, a further reason why the House should go into this question upon the second reading—namely, that by the technical Rules of Parliament it was possible that the ratepayers might not be able to obtain a hearing before a Select Committee. An objection had already been lodged against their being heard; and, consequently, if the House did not discuss the question now, it might be the case that the ratepayers would never obtain a hearing at all, and the promoters of the Bill might technically, in the first place, defeat the Standing Order intended to protect the ratepayers; and, in the second place, might, upon another technical Rule, shut out this important question from the consideration of the Committee. Under these circumstances—having no interest in the Bill, knowing nothing about the country through which it passed, but feeling an interest in the question of taxing the people of Ireland for speculative Railway Companies—he felt he was justified in supporting his hon. Friend the Member for Waterford in the Motion he had made.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Delahunty.)

MR. RODWELL did not propose to follow his hon. Friend through the matters which he had brought forward in a somewhat more impassioned appeal than was generally found provided in the materials of a Private Bill; but, if the House would permit him, he would supplement one or two facts, which he thought would satisfy the House that the proposal made by his hon. Friend was not only somewhat strong, but somewhat questionable. His hon. Friend asked the House, if not in entire ignorance, but with a partial knowledge of the facts, to reverse the decision come to after a three days' inquiry by the House of Lords, where all the facts were investigated, and where his hon. Friend appeared not only as a petitioner, but as a witness. He thought it was hardly expedient—and he spoke from some experience, both there and elsewhere, of these matters—that the House should take upon themselves, without further knowledge, to reverse the decision of the House of Lords. He thought it right that the Bill should be read a second time, and referred to a Committee, equally competent with that which had already considered it, to deal with all the questions which might be submitted to them, and before whom all the facts might be laid. He was satisfied of this—that if the justice of the case demanded it, a Committee of one House would never allow itself to be influenced by the decision of another House; and experience told him, that not unfrequently a decision already arrived at by one House had been reversed by the other, if a proper ground were presented, or if the case had been imperfectly heard by the first tribunal: therefore, he thought his hon. Friend would be perfectly safe in leaving the matter to be dealt with in the ordinary way. The hon. Member for Roscommon opposed the Bill, because it involved a question of principle. But the principle was recognized already in Irish Bills; and, although an attempt had been made to introduce the same principle into England, it had never succeeded. It had, however, prevailed in regard to Irish Bills; and the reason why it was introduced was, because railways had added so much to the wealth and prosperity of Ireland, and because they never would have been made or undertaken if there had not been some guarantee of this nature secured to the promoters of the original undertaking. No one could look at the success which had attended the construction of railways in Ireland, so far as the interests of the people were concerned, without feeling that Parliament was right in giving these facilities. Certainly, without them, many of the railways of Ireland would never have existed. Therefore, if it was proposed to reject the present Bill because it introduced a new principle, he said that the principle was already acted upon. They were now asked to stop a great public work. It was upon public grounds alone that this Bill was introduced. He knew nothing of the parties or of the locality, but he had seen the Bill, and its object was to give additional station accommodation to the persons who would use the railway. He said, then, that there were no facts or circumstances in the case which an ordinary tribunal was not competent to deal with, and he hoped the House would be satisfied to allow it to be so dealt with. If there was one consideration which he might offer, it was this—that when the parties went before a Committee in either House, and their case was fairly heard, and, after having done their best to succeed, had been defeated, they would accept the decision without a murmur, although they might be dissatisfied with it. He did know this—that if a Bill was rejected on the second reading after a short discussion, which involved no new principle, parties would have little faith in Private Bill legislation. They would necessarily be greatly dissatisfied, and would have very little confidence in the judgment of the House. And he thought the general public outside would be of the same opinion. He therefore hoped that the House would not take the extreme course of rejecting a Private Bill on the second reading, unless there was something exceptional in its provisions, which he confessed he was unable to discover in the present case.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA remarked, that the hon. and learned Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Rodwell) had addressed the House on general principles, and was unacquainted with the special facts of this particular case. [Mr. RODWELL said, he had already stated that he had seen the Bill.] He did not mean to say that the hon. and learned Member had not seen the Bill; but he thought if the hon. and learned Member had read the Bill carefully, he would have seen much on the face of it which would have induced him to suggest to the House considerable caution before they allowed the measure to be read a second time. He would not trouble the House by again going over the ground which had been so well covered by his hon. Friend the Member for the county of Waterford (Mr. Delahunty). His (Sir Joseph M'Kenna's) own locus standi was simply that of a proprietor and ratepayer in the county, and therefore he did know something about the matter. A railway had already been constructed, called the Waterford, Dungarvan, and Lismore Railway, and it had a capital of £280,000, with borrowing powers to the extent of £93,000. The mode in which the original Act had been carried out had already been described, and it was unnecessary that he should dwell upon it further. He would confine his remarks, therefore, to the present Bill. What was this supplementary Bill to do? He admitted, that on the face of it, it did not charge the county with any subsidy for the purpose of paying interest or dividend; but it authorized the Waterford, Dungarvan, and Lismore Railway Company to extend their line from their present terminus into a new terminal station at Waterford, and to carry out other objects. That was to say, that it was a Bill to constitute a new Company and a new set of proprietors, who would take possession of the terminus of the line which had already been carried out by the money of the ratepayers of the county, and without which the new stations, and other things proposed by the Bill, would be of little value. He regarded it as one of the cleverest feats of railway legislation that had ever been suggested. The Bill had already passed the Upper House; but he doubted whether the House of Lords or the Committee had heard the reasons which had been adduced that day for objecting to the Bill. It was virtually a Bill to create another and a separate and hostile interest to the general interest of the ratepayers of the county. It was, indeed, a Bill to give possession of the line to a new set of proprietors, and to give them rights with respect to charges over a particular portion of the line, no matter how far the general traffic. They could put on such terminus charges as would strangle all possibilities of the recovery of the main line. Such a principle as this had never been recognized by the House. What would have been said to any projector who, having already got the money for the purpose of making a main line from one part of the Kingdom to another, who afterwards constituted a new Company to own the terminus, and which was under no terms whatever to the old Company, or which would have the command of a bridge like the Victoria Bridge, and which could strangle the traffic if it thought fit to do so? Never had there been brought forward a Bill which had so much upon the face of it to warn the House against granting these rights to the directors. They had constructed a great line, and had asked for a security and guarantee for the capital; but now, when they had to deal with a portion of the line which could scarcely pay a farthing if it stood alone, they said they did not want any security. No! what they wanted was power over the whole line. They wanted to possess the power to strangle and to mulct the traffic if necessary. This was a measure which ought to be rejected without a division. In conclusion, he might state that, as a ratepayer and proprietor, he had a perfect knowledge of the circumstances of the county, having devoted a great deal of attention to the subject.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING entirely agreed with the hon. Gentlemen who thought that Ireland derived great benefits from the system of guarantees. He was one of those who had always advocated the principle; but it was a long time before they succeeded in passing a measure which enabled many parts of Ireland to obtain railways, which otherwise would not have been constructed. But the present was a very different question. It appeared to him that the ratepayers of the county of Waterford—with which, by-the-bye, he had no connection—had been deceived. Faith had not been kept by the promoters of the Bill; and, consequently, this House had now a right to interfere in order to insist that they should fulfil their contract with the ratepayers before the House would enable them to get further powers. He thought the statement made by his hon. Friend the Member for the county of Waterford (Mr. Delahunty) was true; and really some person who was interested in this question, and who knew something of the facts, ought to get up and give some explanation of the conduct of the Grand Jury of the county of Waterford. In the case of a railway in which he was formerly concerned, the baronies through which the line ran took the precaution to have the directors' names inserted in the Act of Parliament, with a view to protecting the ratepayers against unnecessary expenditure. It was to be regretted, he thought, that a similar step had not been taken in the present instance. In order to protect the ratepayers, a provision was inserted in the original Act of Parliament, to the effect that the city Grand Jury should appoint four directors of the Company, and that the county Grand Jury should appoint eight. The city Grand Jury appointed directors; but the county Grand Jury refused to do so. The ratepayers of the county had entered into the most foolish arrangement he ever heard of. The county was to pay the capital of the railway and the interest on it, while the makers of the railway were to become the owners of the railway. The capital being £280,000, they were allowed to raise £93,000 by debentures; and the county of Waterford agreed to pay £14,000 a-year for five years under the Act of Parliament. He never heard of such a thing before. He never heard of a guarantee line coming into operation before it was open to traffic. If the ratepayers of the county of Waterford had no locus standi before the Select Committee, there was no tribunal to which they could appeal except the House of Commons; and, in his judgment, it was the duty of that House to protect the ratepayers, who had not been able to protect themselves. They had done a most foolish thing in mortgaging the property of the county to the promoters of the railway, who might be mere speculators; and the House ought to protect the ratepayers against anything like a further mortgage of their property. If an arrangement were entered into for the working of the line by another Company, that other Company would be able to do what it liked; because there were manipulations of these matters among Railway Companies that most hon. Members did not understand. The question had been brought before that House because the Select Committee, perhaps, did not clearly see the bearing of what was now demanded and how the ratepayers had suffered. If ever there was a case in which the House ought to intervene between the act of a Select Committee and the parties interested, it was the present case.

MR. RAIKES remarked, that in the course of this discussion a great deal had been said, which was very well worthy of consideration, as bearing upon the general question of Grand Jury guarantees in relation to Irish railways. No doubt that was a policy which called at all times for careful examination, and which was open to much question. The hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don), in seconding the Motion for the rejection of the Bill, called attention to the share he had taken in dealing with this matter by the Standing Order which was enacted in 1874, and which required a popular assent in addition to the authority of the Grand Jury, before any subvention could be granted to any particular railway. But although there was, doubtless, a great deal to be said upon that subject which would always receive from the House the most respectful consideration, he wished to point out that that was rather a question beside that raised by the present Bill. The arguments advanced by the hon. Member for the county of Cork (Mr. M'Carthy Downing), and the hon. Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna), would have been more appropriate if they had been delivered in the year 1872, when the original Bill was before the House. He agreed with the hon. Member for the county of Cork, that for the county and city of Waterford to mortgage their rates to so large an amount was a somewhat extraordinary proceeding on their part; but, still, that was a matter which might have been more fitly debated when the House had before it the original Bill relating to the guarantees. The history of the legislation in regard to this railway was practically as follows:—In 1872 an Act of Parliament was passed, by which the railway was, in the first instance authorized, and this guarantee called into existence. The hon. Member for the county of Waterford (Mr. Delahunty) alleged that the consent of the Grand Juries of the city and county of Waterford to that measure was obtained by representations made to them that they would have a powerful voice in the administration of the railway, and that those representations were not embodied in the Act of 1872. Well, in 1873, a further Bill was introduced into the House, and it also became law. Owing to the action of the Chairman of Committees in the other House of Parliament, this second measure contained a Proviso to the effect, that at the Assizes next after the passing of the Act, it should be lawful for the Grand Juries of the city and county of Waterford respectively to nominate, if they thought proper so to do, 12 persons to be duly qualified directors of the Company in the place of the then existing directors. Of these 12 new directors, eight were to be nominated by the county and four by the city of Waterford. The House would perceive that this Proviso made it lawful, but not obligatory, for the Grand Juries of the county and city to appoint these directors; and it also provided that they should only take that step if they thought proper to do so. It was, therefore, a doubly optional course on the part of each Grand Jury. Immediately after the Royal Assent had been given to the Bill, the Grand Jury of the city of Waterford nominated four directors. They likewise invited the co-operation of the county; but the county decided not to exercise their optional power, and not to nominate the eight directors whom they were entitled to appoint. The four directors nominated by the Grand Jury of the city were Mr. Bennett, Mr. White, Mr. Garth, and the hon. Gentleman who was now one of the Members for the county of Waterford. Three of them were still directors of the Company, and the only new director whom the city of Waterford proposed to appoint was the gentleman who now opposed this Bill. As he had already observed, the county Grand Jury refused to co-operate with that of the city. He thought, however, it would be clearly seen by the House that at the present moment the result was nearly arrived at which would have been attained if the Proviso had been acted upon. Seven members of the County Grand Jury were also directors of the Company; and almost the only difference would have been that the hon. Member for the county of Waterford would have been a director, whereas he was not one at the present time. The hon. Member was doubtless very popular in the county, and any matter he might bring before it was sure to be warmly taken up. Indeed, he thought the representation of the ratepayers had been made, in a great measure, in consequence of the hon. Gentleman's popularity in the county. Well, the county having refused to nominate directors the Company still remained in the hands of the directors, who were originally appointed by the shareholders. What was the share of the contribution to this railway as between the city and the county? Yesterday he was enabled to see the valuation rolls of the baronies affected by this Bill and by the Act of 1872, and also the valuation roll of the city of Waterford; and he found that the city would only be liable to some ninth or tenth part of the amount for which the Grand Jury of the county would be liable. The Grand Jury of the county of Waterford consisted of landowners, whose interests were bound up with those, he supposed, of the ratepayers.

THE O'CONOR DON said, everyone who knew anything about Ireland was aware that the Grand Jurors, as Grand Jurors, did not pay a shilling of the rates.

MR. RAIKES said, he wished to disentangle from the arguments which had been used in this discussion the point about the guarantees. The House would be carried away by a false impression if they thought that by passing this Bill they were dealing with the rights of the Company as regarded the guarantee. If the House should refuse to pass the present Bill the county would have to pay the subsidy of £14,000 just the same. The guarantee really had nothing to do with the matter. The directors asked for running powers, because they believed they would thus improve the value of the property. Never since he held his present position had he known an opposition which was more beside the mark in dealing with a particular question. He would now say a few words in regard to the locus standi. Of course, he could not anticipate the judgment of the Court of Referees in this matter; but it should be borne in mind that the question had been already argued before the Committee of the House of Lords. Each Committee of the House of Lords was its own authority as regarded locus standi. They had no Court of Referees; but the reports of the decisions of the Referees were constantly quoted before Committees of the House of Lords, and he believed it was on the report of a case which occurred in the Commons that they decided to admit the locus standi of the parties in this particular case. It was fair to assume, therefore, that the Committee of the House of Commons would pay the same regard to the precedent. In conclusion, he expressed his opinion that this House would make a great mistake if it rejected the second reading of the Bill.

MR. SYNAN thought the question before the House was one of considerable difficulty. They had to select their course between the necessity of reading the Bill a second time, and relieving the ratepayers of the county of Waterford. If anything unpleasant had occurred it had been the result of the conduct of the Grand Jury of the county which, like all Grand Juries in Ireland, was not a representative body. Its members did not pay the rates on this guarantee; and when the opportunity was offered to them they would not even accept the proposal that they should become directors of the railway in order to protect the ratepayers. It had been stated that the profits arising from the extension line would be applied for the Company solely, and without any reference to the guarantee or any protection of the ratepayers of the county of Waterford. Even the promoters had denied the locus standi of the ratepayers before the Committee, although they wanted to get possession of the railway made by their money. If protection could not be afforded to the ratepayers, he thought, in the circumstances, that the second reading of the Bill ought not to pass, and that time ought to be given for the purpose of enabling the promoters to introduce such clauses as would protect the ratepayers under the guarantee formerly given, or that the locus standi of the ratepayers should be admitted for the purpose of introducing such clauses.

MAJOR O'GORMAN maintained that the ratepayers were by this Bill fully protected. The 8th clause provided that no further demand was to be made on the ratepayers of the county of Waterford. The original capital of the old Company was £280,000. A guarantee was given for the payment of interest and dividend upon that sum at the rate of 5 per cent. More money was required for the purpose of finishing the railway to Waterford. How was that money obtained? He could inform the House that it was obtained by the munificence of the Duke of Devonshire, who had advanced no less a sum than £80,000 to complete the railway. But the sum of £35,000 was required in order to finish the new extension. This £35,000 could be obtained in the usual manner; and he had the most perfect authority for stating that not a shilling should be demanded from the ratepayers any more. They would, of course, be liable to the 5 per cent on the £280,000, but not on the £35,000 which was now to be raised. He wished to draw the attention of the House to the argument which had been made use of in regard to guarantees on railways. It was true there were no guarantees on railways in England, but there were guarantees on tramways. There were no less than 20 miles of tramways in the City of Manchester, and if they did not pay the ratepayers would be saddled with the interest on them. Consequently, it was hardly competent for the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) to say that there were no guarantees in England upon railways, for, after all, a tramway was neither more nor less than a railway. Again, he was in favour of this railway because it would open the resources of the country. They ought to take a broad view of the question, and he sincerely hoped this House would allow the Bill to be read a second time.

MR. BIGGAR was disposed to think that a guarantee might, under certain conditions, be proper; but, at the same time, it should be carefully guarded, and the ratepayers ought to have an opportunity of expressing their opinion on the subject. In this particular case no expression of opinion had been given in favour of the scheme of 1873. Meetings were held, and the ratepayers were led to believe that they would have the full ownership of the railway if they guaranteed the expense of making it; but the promoters of the Acts of 1872 and 1873 manipulated the Bills so, that any surplus profits which might arise beyond the amount of the guarantee would go into their own pockets. The promoters did not, in the slightest degree, represent the ratepayers either of the city or the county of Waterford. They now made an application for fresh powers, which amounted to a power to manipulate the total income of the present railway in such a manner, that it would find its way into their own pockets. In spite of what had been said, he maintained that this new project did amount to a guarantee. He thought the ratepayers of the county of Waterford ought to have an opportunity of expressing their opinion before the Bill was passed through this House. It was, he believed, an established rule, that no guarantee was ever given in a case where any material number of the ratepayers were opposed to it. In this case, however, there was the strongest evidence that the ratepayers did object to it. The hon. Member for the county of Waterford (Mr. Delahunty) had told the House distinctly that his constituents were strongly opposed to the present Bill. For this reason, he thought the House would do well to put a stop to this attempt to saddle the ratepayers with a further liability. They had been told that the Grand Jury represented the ratepayers of a county. This was not the fact. They really represented the sub-Sheriff of the county, who appointed whom he pleased. The hon. Member for the county of Waterford, and not the gentlemen who were gathered together as the nominees of the sub-Sheriff, really represented the feelings of the ratepayers. The Grand Jury did not even represent the largest ratepayers of the county, for many of its members, he was informed, were very small ratepayers. It had been urged that the persons who opposed this Bill might go before a Select Committee of this House, and state their objections there. This was equivalent to saying that these gentlemen ought to incur a heavy expense out of their own pockets in fighting persons who were spending, not their own money, but the money of the ratepayers.

MR. PARNELL had a proposal to make to the Government. He did not wish to go into the general question as to the desirability of allowing Grand Juries or other local authorities to burden the ratepayers with charges as they had done in the present case, although it would necessarily have some influence on the House, when they saw that this charge of £280,000 was placed on the four baronies in the county of Waterford under what, practically, amounted to false pretences. He wished to show, very briefly, that the ratepayers of the county of Waterford were really entitled to every consideration from that House, entirely apart from the question as to whether the Grand Jury Laws were beneficial or the reverse. The hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees had argued as if this was not a question which in any way affected the ratepayers. It had been pointed out by the hon. Gentleman that the ratepayers were liable for this guarantee of £280,000 and the interest upon it at 5 per cent; and he argued from that, that the ratepayers had no further interest in the proceedings of the Company, and in the matter of the proposed extension, because no further guarantee was to be placed upon them. This line, 43 miles in length, from Dungarvan to Waterford, had been constructed with the money of the ratepayers, who would continue to pay interest on the money which was borrowed in the first instance. The line was still in an unfinished condition, and it was proposed by this Bill to add to it a short connecting link. The House would, therefore, see that the interest of the ratepayers remained unimpaired and undiminished as regarded the Bill. What had been the course adopted by the promoters? Foreseeing what would be the consequence if they gave the ratepayers any opportunity of obtaining a locus standi before a Select Committee of this House, they adopted the very unusual course of framing the Bill in such a way as to endeavour to prevent the ratepayers from having any locus standi in the proceedings before the Committee. Now, entirely apart from the question of the Grand Jury laws, he asked whether it was right or wrong originally to put a charge of £280,000 on these four baronies? And, apart from the consideration as to whether the ratepayers had obtained a benefit from the imposition of this charge, he would ask the House whether it was reasonable or just that the persons whose money had made this line should be shut out by technical objections from all the proceedings before the Committee appointed to consider the question of its extension? He submitted that no reasonable person could help saying that facilities ought to be given to the ratepayers, so as to enable them to appear before the Committee and state their objections to the scheme. The promoters, however, instead of seeking to give to the ratepayers, whose property they had wrongfully taken away, an opportunity of appearing before the Committee, had taken advantage of technical objections, so as to exclude the ratepayers from a locus standi. In these circumstances, it would be very fair if the House were, by assenting to adjourn the debate, to signify its desire that this opposition to the locus standi of the ratepayers should cease. With that object he had risen, not to prolong the debate, but to move its adjournment, until the promoters of this extension could consider whether they would not agree to withdraw their technical objection to the locus standi of the ratepayers, who had spent £280,000 in making this line. In conclusion, the hon. Member begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY, in seconding the Motion for adjournment, said, the difficulty in this case arose from the circumstance that the ratepayers of the county of Waterford felt themselves aggrieved by the conduct of these very men in dealing with another portion of the line now in existence. They sought to be heard before the Committee of this House, and to state their objections to the proposed extension; but they were met by a technical objection which was raised by the promoters. If the House would only remove those technical objections, this Bill would not be further opposed.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Parnell.)

MR. STACPOOLE supported the Motion for the adjournment of the debate, and took this opportunity of protesting against a statement made by the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), who said that the Grand Juries were summoned by the sub-Sheriff. Now, this was certainly not always the case. In his own county, for example, the High Sheriff was very jealous of the privilege, and always summoned the Grand Jury himself.

MR. GRAY thought the proposal of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) was the real way of meeting this difficulty. He could say now, with responsibility, that if the hon. Member for the county of Waterford (Mr. Delahunty) withdrew his Motion, all objection to the locus standi of those whom he represented would be withdrawn by the promoters of the Bill. The opponents of the measure would have a full opportunity of being heard before the Committee of the House of Commons, as they had been heard already before the Committee of the House of Lords.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD considered that the debate had been thoroughly thrashed out. The arguments used by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. M'Carthy Downing) showed clearly what the popular feeling was. For his part, he objected strongly to the Bill; indeed, good reason had been shown why the Bill should not be passed. It had been said that the money was to be raised in the way of guarantee, and that was what the ratepayers were objecting to.

MR. PARNELL explained, that in moving the Motion for the adjournment of the debate he had done so merely that the promoters of the Bill might have an opportunity of saying whether they would give the ratepayers a locus standi. He had been informed that the promoters would give them the locus standi; and, therefore, he should withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

THE O'CONOR DON wished to say but one word. A strong appeal had been made on the ground that the question of guarantee would not be affected. He wished to point out that the guarantee question was affected; because the Bill, as introduced, proposed to give to the Company power to enter into an arrangement with other Companies for working the extension. Every director of a railway knew perfectly well that, under such powers, the receipts of a line under such an arrangement would go to the credit of the Company, and not to the relief of taxation. They might be, in fact, absorbed in the payment of the Company. That affected the guarantee in a substantial way; and if the Bill was passed, the ratepayers would be seriously injured.

MR. MUNTZ was extremely sorry to stand in the way of a division. He wished to say that he had something to do with the Bill in 1872, and he considered it was not merely an Irish question after all. When the Bill was first mooted it was brought in by a Company who had obtained the consent of the Grand Jury, virtually a self-appointed body. The Bill was really one of speculation. It was a question of—"Heads I win, tails you lose." What would be said if a Railway Company offered to make a line through any county in England, and then got the consent of a Grand Jury to guarantee 5 per cent, to be paid by the ratepayers? Why, the idea would be scouted; and he wanted to know why Parliament should force upon the Irish people a taxation which they would not think of imposing upon the people of this country?

MR. DODSON thought the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) had spoken under some misapprehension. The objection he had urged might be all very well against a system of guarantee, and against the Bill as it passed in 1873. Under the present Bill, it was expressly provided that no additional liability should fall upon the ratepayers. The locus standi of the ratepayers was accordingly opposed, and it was feared the ratepayers might be injured. He understood, however, that the promoters of the Bill had agreed to withdraw that opposition. Some of the opponents of the Bill were satisfied with the assurance thus given to the ratepayers, who would have an opportunity of offering any further objections they might have in Committee.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, the objection urged was that there would be no locus standi for the ratepayers before the Committee. That, however, was not the only objection. He was by no means certain that, even if a locus standi were given, all the objections would be removed. The Bill was to enable the directors of a railway, who had broken their trust with the ratepayers of the county of Waterford, to get possession, by an outlay of £35,000, of the terminus of a railway which they had deluded the ratepayers to guarantee. They were trusting to the Bill to give them powers to enter into a new arrangement for the working of both lines; and everybody knew very well that would be the means of throwing over the main interest in favour of the terminal stock, and leaving in the cold those proprietors and ratepayers of the county who had guaranteed the dividends on the main line.

Mr. Muntz

He hoped his hon. Friend would divide the House.

MR. DELAHUNTY said, he could not understand why the ratepayers of Waterford should have this Bill thrust upon them, and he would, therefore, divide the House on his Motion. One thing he would say, and it was this—that the hon. and gallant Member for the city of Waterford (Major O'Gorman) was thoroughly mistaken in saying that the Bill would merely affect the paying of 5 per cent upon £35,000. That would be nothing to the injury which the ratepayers would sustain in the Company obtaining working traffic and running powers with other Companies, so as to make arrangements through which the net earnings of the line would be sure to be diverted from benefiting the ratepayers. It must be remembered that the Company were getting 5 per cent from the ratepayers on the estimated cost of construction, and it was the fault of the promoters that it required £100,000 to finish the line. The hon. and gallant Gentleman knew nothing about it. He (Mr. Delahunty) would fight the Bill stage by stage, and take a division whenever it was necessary.

THE MILITARY FORCES OF THE CROWN—THE INDIAN CONTINGENT.

NOTICE OF AMENDMENT TO MOTION.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH gave Notice, that on Monday he would move, as an Amendment to the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Boroughs—

"That this House, being of opinion that the Constitutional control of Parliament over the raising and employment of the Military Forces of the Crown is fully secured by the provisions of the Law, and by the undoubted power of this House to grant or refuse Supplies, considers it to be unnecessary and inexpedient to affirm any Resolution tending to weaken the hands of Her Majesty's Government in the present state of Foreign affairs."

QUESTIONS.

LAW AND JUSTICE—THE POLICE MAGISTRACY—MR. BENSON.

QUESTION.

DR. KENEALY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether Mr. R. A. Benson, who is reported in to-day's "Standard" as having addressed a Conservative meeting at Reading yesterday, is the same person as the Metropolitan Police Magistrate of that name; and, whether it is consistent with the quasi-judicial office which Mr. Benson holds, that he should attend public meetings and take an active part in political discussions during an election contest?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, in reply to the Question of the hon. Member, I have to say that I have no means of knowing whether Mr. Benson, the magistrate, is the person who is supposed to have made the speech referred to, nor have I any information that such a speech was made. I communicated, however, with Mr. Benson, on seeing this Question on the Paper. Unfortunately he is not in town at the present moment, and, therefore, I have not yet received from him any reply. I may say, with regard to the other portion of the hon. Member's Question, that the only legal disabilities by statute imposed upon a police magistrate are, in the first place, that he cannot be a Member of Parliament; and, in the second place, under an old statute, that he could not vote within the Metropolitan Police District in which he was engaged. That restriction on his Parliamentary franchise was repealed in 1874. How far a person holding the position of a police magistrate is to consider himself disfranchised or disentitled to interfere in political affairs in any part of the country other than that in which he is acting is a matter of discretion. Everything must depend on the way in which he uses the liberty which the law allows him.

CRIMINAL LAW—RELEASE OF GEORGE BROOMFIELD.—QUESTION.

DR. KENEALY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he will state for what reason he has advised Her Majesty to set at large one George Broomfield, a prisoner convicted of murder at Winchester in 1865; and, if he would lay upon the Table of the House Copies of any Communications made to him, or to the Under Secretary of State, with reference to the said prisoner prior to his release?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that he had followed, in dealing with the case, the ordinary course pursued by his Predecessors in similar instances. George Broomfield had been convicted of murder at Winchester in July, 1865, and was afterwards examined by an eminent medical man, who reported that he was of unsound mind, and the sentence was commuted to one of penal servitude for life. On the 9th of July, 1866, an application was made for the removal of the prisoner from Millbank Prison to Broadmoor Asylum, and on the 11th of November, 1877, his wife applied for his release. A special Report as to his condition was made to the Secretary of State, the general effect of which was that there was no risk in discharging him, provided some person would take the responsibility of taking care of him, and of reporting at once any tendency to relapse into his former state of mind which he might exhibit. A competent person was found to undertake this duty; and, following the usual course, he was allowed, on the recommendation of the authorities at Broadmoor that he was fit to be permitted to be at large, to take his discharge. All the communications made to the Secretary of State in the matter were, he might add, of a confidential character; therefore, he could not consent to produce them.

REGISTRY OF DEEDS (IRELAND)—THE ROYAL COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

MR. KING-HARMAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he is aware that the Royal Commission issued on the 22nd January last, for the purpose of inquiring into the present system of Registry of Deeds in Ireland and other matters connected therewith, has up to the present been inoperative, as the Commissioners have not yet held a meeting or taken any steps in pursuance of the directions contained in the Commission, although offices have been fitted up, a secretary appointed, and all necessary preparations made by the Irish Treasury for their accommodation; and, whether it is the intention of the Irish Government to take any steps in reference thereto?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON), in reply, said, that the Commissioners had been engaged in collecting information, and making arrangements for the due prosecution of their inquiries, and they would hold the next meeting on the 24th of the month, and would continue to sit regularly every week, and would, he hoped, be able to make their Report within the time assigned to them.

COAL MINES—EDDLEWOOD COLLIERY EXPLOSION.—QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he has had information that an explosion took place in the Eddlewood Colliery, near Hamilton, on Friday the 10th inst., by which two men were seriously injured, and that the explosion was caused by the use of naked lights; and, since the colliery in question is in the same coal field as that of the Blantyre Colliery, where the fearful loss of life took place in 1877, whether he will prohibit, if possible, the use of naked lights in all the collieries in that coal field?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he had not as yet received full information on the subject, though inquiries had been made to which he hoped he would soon have an answer. Inspector Dickinson, and the lawyer who held the inquiry into the cause of the serious explosion at Blantyre, having made a recommendation as to the danger of that particular coalfield, he (Mr. Assheton Cross) thought it right that the Inspector should be instructed to call a meeting of the coal-owners together, and submit the Report to them, with that paragraph marked out for their special consideration. The matter would not be lost sight of; but at the present moment he was unable to say more.

THE COTTON MANUFACTORIES—THE WAGES DISPUTE—THE LANCASHIRE RIOTS.—QUESTION.

Home Department, Whether he has received any further intelligence as to the disturbances in Lancashire; and, whether any arrests have been made?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I have received a letter written last night by the Chairman of Quarter Sessions, a man of great competence, whose word is in every way to be trusted, in which he says—

“From all I can learn this evening all is quiet. Some shots have no doubt been fired”

—those, I think, must be the shots alluded to in the telegram which I read to the House last night—

“by a gentleman and some police officers at Oswaldtwistle, in defence of his home, which was being attacked by a riotous mob. Any further intelligence which reaches me I will let you know.”

I have not heard anything further this morning; but I have heard from the Mayor of Blackburn, who informs me that several arrests have been made in that town for breaches of the peace and assaults on the police. Some have been dealt with summarily, some remanded, and one released. The house belonging to Colonel Jackson, which was unfortunately burned down, is not within the jurisdiction of the Mayor, but in the county; and I am informed that the reason why no arrests were made for complicity in that proceeding is, that all the county constabulary were on one side of the borough, expecting the mob would come that way, but ascertaining that gentlemen who lived on the other side were coming home by train, they immediately changed their purpose, and anticipating the action of the police they got there before them, and when the police did arrive the mob had been dispersed. The county officers, however, inform me that a description of the ring-leaders is in their possession, and they entertain no doubt that the offenders will be brought to justice. It is quite true that last night a very large mob came out at Preston, and that the military were called out, but there was no disturbance, and it was not found necessary to read the Riot Act, or to put into requisition the services of the troops; and the telegrams I have received from that place to-day are much more satisfactory than those of last night. I observe there is a telegram downstairs which speaks of a mill having been burned down this morning at Blackburn; but as in the communication I have received from the Mayor of the town, the subject is not mentioned, I cannot think the information is correct. I entirely agree with what fell from a noble Lord in "another place" last night. I cannot think those outrages have been committed by the better class of operatives. I know them too well to think that they would be guilty of offences of this kind. I have no doubt there are a great number of rough, idle people loafing about in the neighbourhood of these towns, and, taking advantage of the excited passions of the operatives, they instigate these disturbances.

THE MILITARY FORCES OF THE CROWN
—THE INDIAN CONTINGENT—MOTION OF THE MARQUESS OF HART-INGTON.—QUESTION.

MR. E. JENKINS said, he wished to put to the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition a Question, of which he had given him private Notice. The noble Lord had announced it to be his intention to bring forward a Motion with reference to the movement of certain Native Indian troops to Malta, and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Colonies had, to-night, given Notice of the terms of an Amendment which was to be proposed to the Motion from the other side of the House. What he desired to know from the noble Lord was, Whether it was his fixed intention to press his Motion to a division?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I think the Question of my hon. Friend, though perfectly regular in form, is somewhat unusual in character. I believe that the action which any Member of this House may take, either in pressing or refraining from pressing, a Motion to a division, must always be held to depend, to a certain extent, on what may occur during the debate to which it gives rise. I might, perhaps, say, that my course will be influenced by the support which I receive from my hon. Friend and others who act with him on the occasion to which he refers. I should imagine that it would be only regular, at all events, that we should all suppose that it is possible I may be converted by the arguments which may be used on the other side, or that hon. Members opposite might be converted by my arguments. Under those circumstances, a division may not be necessary; but I can assure my hon. Friend that, as at present advised, it is my most undoubted intention to press the Motion, of which I have given Notice, to a division.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT MACDUFF rose to call attention to the unsatisfactory condition of the harbours on the north-east coast of Scotland; and to ask, If Her Majesty's Government, now that they are in possession of the Commissioners' Report, will consider the expediency of increasing the annual grant of £3,000 towards the harbours of Scotland, or otherwise providing for their improvement? The noble Viscount said, that he had originally intended to bring the subject forward on Vote 30, but that he had taken the present opportunity of bringing it under the Notice of the House and the Government lest that Vote should never be reached. He did not wish to detain the House for more than a few moments on this question; but as it touched a matter of great importance to the North of Scotland, he should like to ask the Government whether they now saw their way to take any action in accordance with the views expressed in the Report of the Commission which they appointed last year? He would not venture to take up the time of the House by going into that Report particularly, as he was quite sure it must be fresh in the memory of the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury. He might, however, merely state that the whole gist and substance of that very careful Report was that the state of the harbour accommodation on the exposed coasts of Scotland was most inadequate to secure the safe landing of the fish supply, which they declared to be as bountiful as ever. Those who urged upon the Government the appointment of a Commission to investigate the vexed question of the falling-off in the herring trade had had considerable misgivings as to the different remedies that had been suggested by fishermen and others. But the Commissioners had again reported, as they had done in former years, against every restriction on the fishing—except some prohibitions as to trawling on the west coast—and they maintained that the herring fishery as a whole had increased and was increasing. Indeed, they asserted that enormous losses were yearly incurred by the impossibility of landing the fish in the present insecure and unprotected state of the coast, and yet he (Viscount Macduff) noticed that on the present Estimates was borne the stereotyped figure of £3,000, a sum which had been absorbed for a number of years by one series of works. He did not wish, for obvious reasons, to put forward the claims of any particular place, or advocate the granting of any particular sum, but when he found in the Report such a sweeping statement as the following:—

—he felt some astonishment at seeing no signs of any alteration in this old figure. He was aware that at Fraserburgh and Peterhead considerable sums were being spent and works begun which, when completed, would provide what the Commissioners recommend; but these places were close together, and beyond them stretched, far away to the Orkneys, a rocky and dangerous coast, upon which every year a great loss of life and property occurred. The north-east winds were apt to blow in sudden hurricanes, and unless the fishing-boats could, at a few hours' notice, make a port both near and sure, they were exposed to the gravest perils. Only that morning he received a communication from the magistrates of one of the harbours on the Moray Firth, stating that after borrowing money to the full extent of their available security, they were in danger of seeing their works swept away, if some additional labour, which they were not able to provide, was not at once spent upon them. He would like, therefore, to know whether, considering the Report of their own Commissioners, the Government had any intention of increasing this sum of £3,000 for the harbours of Scotland, or otherwise, of providing for the improvement of those harbours which had been for many years the subject of repeated complaints from Scotch Members?

MR. R. W. DUFF hoped that before the hon. Baronet answered his noble Friend, he would allow him to make a suggestion as to the funds to carry out the recommendation of the Commission. When this question had been brought before the House the invariable reply was—We quite admit that there should be better harbours on the east coast of Scotland, but we do not know where the money is to come from. For the purpose of answering that question, he would address a few observations to the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Henry Selwin - Ibbetson). It would be in his recollection that about 20 years ago a herring brand was established for Scotland. This herring brand, when first established, was only sufficient to pay the expenses of the brand; but as the fishing had gone on from year to year, this brand had increased enormously. In 1875, he found the money paid into the Treasury for the brand amounted to £8,729. In 1874, it was £8,625. He had not got the Report of last year. The Report of 1876 could not be fairly quoted, because it was a bad season. This brand for the purpose of branding herrings was now a source of revenue, yet the House would scarcely credit the statement that since the brand had been established £98,902 had been paid into the Treasury from the Scotch fisheries, and not a sixpence had been got back. The expense of branding was estimated by the Government Commissioners, in 1856, at £3,280; so, for 19 years, the cost of the brand would amount to £62,320, leaving a clear balance of £36,000 to be paid to the Fishery Board. He trusted that when the hon. Baronet rose to reply, he would tell the House what had become of the money. Everyone would admit that the fishermen were a deserving class, and everyone would admit the utility of their occupation. The Commission had reported in favour of harbour improvements. He had shown where the revenue was, and asked the Government not to put this money into the Treasury, which already benefited in a large degree from the industry of Scotland, but to keep it for the purpose of lending it out in small loans to the poor fishery people.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that the question which the noble Viscount had brought before the House was one to which the noble Viscount had on many occasions directed the attention of the Office to which he had the honour to belong. The noble Viscount had now called their attention to the Report of the Commission issued during the year. He would remind the noble Viscount that the Report had only recently been received, and that the Government had not had time to consider thoroughly the subject-matter put before it in that Report. No one questioned, and he certainly should not question on reading that Report, the importance of harbour accommodation for the Scotch coast; but the difficulties in the way of dealing with it were really very large. There had been difficulties that were already well-known in the attempts that had been made to deal with some of these harbours. He would point to a total sum that had been already spent of, he believed, nearly £140,000 in the attempted improvement of one of these harbours at the port of Wick. That had not resulted in anything so satisfactory as to encourage efforts of that kind, and he believed the noble Viscount would see in the Report that the Commissioners had stated that the expenditure on the harbour had been practically thrown away, and instead of resulting in the protection of the trade of that district, it had created fresh difficulties in the anchorage to which the fishermen resorted. There was a question which had to be considered on a broader principle, and that was the question whether these grants in aid of particular trades were advisable or not. There was evidence of local efforts having been made, and successfully made, on several of the harbours of Scotland. One of the most important of these harbours was Peterhead. He believed that efforts at that port had for some time been made to improve the harbour. They had gone so far as to apply for a loan to the Public Works Loan Commissioners for that purpose. Fraserburgh was another of these northern ports which had been engaged in a similar way to that he had mentioned. In other places, also, local effort had been applied to get over the difficulty the noble Viscount had suggested, and it was hoped that in the course of three years these local efforts would be of immense service to the harbours of the North. That, he ventured to think, was the direction in which they ought to look in the future for the improvement of these ports. The Government would be quite prepared to encourage and assist local efforts in Scotland, as in England, as they had shown in the Acts which had been passed for that purpose. He believed that in one of these ports within the last two years the fishermen of the district and the people of the locality had raised a sum of something like £2,000, and £3,000 had been given in aid of that contribution. With such examples before them as to what local effort could do, surely that was a better form of effecting such a desirable object as the improvement of these harbours than the accepting of a large sum from the State, without any effort of the locality to assist the object. He did not say the Government would be averse to amending the Harbours' Tolls Act of 1861, so as to give further facilities to the Commissioners. He did not see his way to increase the £3,000 in the Estimates of the present year; but he was quite certain that any application supported by local effort, such as was made at Peterhead or Fraserburgh, would always meet with the favourable consideration of the Government. In answer to what was said as to the application of the particular fund received from the brand, he stated that that was a subject which had never been brought under the consideration of the Treasury. All he could say was that the Government would consider the matter; but he ventured to think that, productive as that brand might have been, it had never been so extremely productive that they could suppose that it would ever enable the Government to make grants from it to any extent. Considering the short time that had elapsed since the Report of the Commission had been made, and considering the local efforts that had been made, he ventured to think that that was a better way to deal with the subject than by increasing the sum that had been applied to this particular purpose in the Estimates.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he agreed with the exceedingly practical remarks which had fallen from the Secretary to the Treasury. The harbours in Scotland were of three kinds—namely, harbours of refuge, harbours belonging to Corporations, and harbours that were purely proprietary, belonging to the neighbouring landholder. He agreed that the expenditure on harbours of refuge had been exceedingly unfortunate. It was quite true that between £100,000 and 200,000 had been expended at Wick, involving a large burden on the neighbourhood, and that the harbour was now in a worse state than it was before the experiment took place. In some of the other harbours considerable improvements were going on. It only required that local efforts should be supplemented by loans from the Treasury. He was sorry to say that, in comparatively few cases, had much been done for proprietorial harbours. If the policy now proposed was adopted, the practical result would be that the property of the proprietors would be improved at the public expense. The local proprietors derived considerable benefit at the present time from the fishing boats, and it seemed to him that by Provisional Orders under the general Act, the localities might be able to carry out improvements in their harbours to a greater extent than they had hitherto done. With regard to the fees, he suspected that the House would have to consider very soon whether that system ought not to be abolished. He was not going to take up the question at that moment, because he intended to raise it on a later occasion; but he thought the great preponderance of opinion in regard to fees was, that instead of the system being an advantage to trade, it was quite the opposite.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON wished to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary to one means of improving the condition of the fishermen of Scotland, and that was by reducing the amount paid for branding herrings. He thought that the right hon. Gentleman might take into consideration the propriety of reducing the fees from 4*d.* per barrel to 2*d.* per barrel, which would be not only a very great relief, but would also be an act of justice; for the practice of levying a higher fee for branding than was necessary for covering the expense was, in fact, a direct tax upon the producers of an important article of food.

MR. C. S. PARKER hoped that in one way or other the Government would see their way to giving the advantage of these fees to the trade, either by reducing the price of branding herrings, as the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Alexander Gordon) had suggested, or, on the other hand, by applying the surplus collected from year to year to the improvement of the harbours. He hoped he was right in understanding the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) to say that it was not the wish of the Government to make a revenue for general purposes out of this branding of herrings; and, if the fees were not to be reduced, the surplus from them might be regarded as peculiarly available for promoting the improvement of harbours. It was true that efforts had been made, with some success, at Fraserburgh, Peterhead, and Buckie; but these were all near together, while, northwards, the long stretch of coast as far as the Orkneys was still without good harbours; and if he had to choose between the two, he thought he would rather see the present fee for branding herrings sustained, and the amount applied to the improvement of the harbours. As to putting an end to branding altogether, he hoped that would not be done without full consideration of the Report of a former Royal Commission in its favour.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY said, that as a director of the British Fisheries Society, he wished to protest against the assumption made by the Secretary to the Treasury, that the breakwater at Wick was a total failure, or that the débris of the breakwater had injured the anchorage. He was informed that it was of very great service to the fishermen at some states of the wind and tide, and he wished it to be understood that before the breakwater was constructed all the plans were submitted to the Admiralty and the Board of Trade, and received the approval of their engineers. With regard to the other question—namely, as to the harbours, he thought that £3,000 a-year was a very small sum to be expended upon them, and he never could see why the balance of the sum obtained for branding herrings should not be employed in this service.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he wished to urge upon the Treasury that Scotland had a very strong claim to justice in the matter of these local improvements. Scotland, unlike Ireland, not only paid its full share of all the general taxation of the country, but paid much more than its share of the taxes upon alcoholic liquors. It was also the case that there were several subjects of local Revenue in Scotland which were not wholly devoted to local purposes, but to Imperial Revenue. There was the matter of registration in Scotland, which should not be made a source of Imperial profit, as in fact it was, and there was also the branding of fish, which was a source of income to the Imperial Exchequer. He contended that Scotland had a claim to simple justice in the matter.

DIPLOMATIC APPOINTMENTS — APPOINTMENT OF THE HON. COLONEL WELLESLEY, MILITARY ATTACHE AT VIENNA.—RESOLUTION.

MR. BENETT-STANFORD, in rising to move—

“That this House disapproves of the appointment of Colonel Wellesley, of the Coldstream Guards, to the post of First Secretary of Embassy at Vienna, over the heads of a large number of old and competent diplomatic servants,” said, it was with considerable reluctance that he brought this subject before the House, because it was exceedingly disagreeable for one who was generally a warm supporter of the Government to expose what he regarded as a great piece of favouritism and jobbery. He had been asked not to bring the matter forward, as it might seem that he was attacking the Government; but he disclaimed all intention of attacking anything more than the principles which had been acted upon. Whether a job was a Conservative or a Liberal job, it was a job notwithstanding. If the supporters of a Government were never to make complaints, they might just as well be mere mutes or Lobby loungers at the beck and call of the Whips. He also wished to guard against its being supposed that he was attacking an individual, inasmuch as he had never, to his knowledge, seen Colonel Wellesley, and certainly had no personal feeling against him. He had heard it said on all sides that Colonel Wellesley was a smart young officer, an accomplished gentleman, highly connected, and a moderate linguist. But, in spite of all those qualifications, he considered him totally unfit to carry out the duties of the post to which the Foreign Secretary had appointed him. No less than four different debates had taken place in the two Houses of Parliament with reference to Colonel Wellesley. In 1871, he was selected to fill the post of Military Attaché at St. Petersburg, and there was immediately a debate on the appointment. It was explained by Lord Enfield, then Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, that it was a military staff appointment, and would only last five years, and that the great reason why he had been appointed was that he had been adjutant of his regiment, and that there were no other officers who were fit for the appointment. The fact was, that there were no less than five most competent officers who applied for that post, but were refused; while Colonel Wellesley, at 26 years of age, a subaltern in the Guards, never having seen a shot fired in his life, except, perhaps, at Hurlingham, was appointed. Among the officers refused were Captain Burnaby, Captain Hozier, Captain Gould—an officer in the Guards at the time—all excellent Turkish and Russian scholars, and Captain Vincent, also an excellent officer and linguist. When Colonel Wellesley obtained that appointment, he did not leave the Army; on the contrary, his diplomatic pay of £600 was continued, in addition to his regimental pay, and his promotion also went on. The principal reason assigned for giving him that appointment was because he had been adjutant to his regiment; but there was a large number of senior adjutants over whose heads he was placed, and, therefore, the fact that he had held that office was no criterion for his qualifications. In 1875, he was made a lieutenant-colonel without purchase, being promoted over the heads of 900 majors, he never having done any duty with his regiment for over four years, the whole of his work having been performed by another officer of the Guards. In 1876, his time was up, and he ought, in due course, to have returned to his regiment, and some other deserving officer appointed; but he did not blame Lord Derby for retaining him in his position, because at that time our relations with Russia were rather strained, and it was as well, there-the performance of Colonel Wellesley's military duties, he could not but think that that went rather beyond the terms of the Motion, and partook somewhat of the character of a personal attack on a gentleman who was not there to defend himself. ["No!"] He was glad to hear that disavowal, and hoped it would be fully understood. With regard to Colonel Wellesley's services, they had already been pretty well recited to the House. But it was not right to pass by that which had been said about his previous appointment as Military Attaché at St. Petersburg without giving in some slight detail, the reasons why he had been selected for the very important post that he had so lately vacated. It would be recollected that, in a recent discussion in that House, his noble Friend Lord Cranbrook stated that Colonel Wellesley's appointment was made in 1871; that he was appointed, although an officer of very junior rank, very much owing to the special qualifications he possessed for the particular post to which he was sent as Military Attaché, and that no fewer than eight officers to whom the post of Military Attaché had been offered had declined it, partly on the ground of that which was very notorious—the expense of living at St. Petersburg—and partly for other reasons, into which it was unnecessary to enter. Colonel Wellesley, although a junior officer, was selected for the appointment; he had held it since 1871, and he thought it was, indirectly, no slight praise to him that, although there was no term, in the strict sense of the word, yet, when the ordinary period of five years expired, it was deemed for the benefit of the public service that he should be continued in the important post which he occupied. His noble Friend also stated that Colonel Wellesley was well fitted for the post, that he was not only an able officer, but an accomplished linguist, able to speak Russian, and that it was agreed on all hands that, although he had been appointed in 1871, it would have been injudicious to remove him last year, when events in the East of Europe took so important a turn. He had thought it right to bring to the notice of hon. Members, who were not present on a previous occasion, the fact that so far as concerned Colonel Wellesley's special fitness for the post of Military Attaché, it had been accepted by the House. As to the question of supersession, the hon. Gentleman said he did not mean to make any attack on the Government, but only attacked the principles on which they had acted; and if it could be shown that those principles were contrary to those which had been deliberately affirmed on more than one occasion, undoubtedly the hon. Gentleman's facts might have some force. But, so far from that being the case, the appointment which had been made—although, undoubtedly, somewhat out of the usual course—was one of a nature which had been foreseen and expressly provided for. If he turned to the 18th Rule of the Foreign Office, he did not find, nor had he heard, that there was any reservation in that clause. The Secretary of State preserved to himself the power of naming any person, even though he might not be a member of the Diplomatic Service, for the higher and more responsible posts in it; and with regard to any promotion, he would not be restricted by claims founded on seniority from making such appointments as he might deem right. The hon. Member had spoken as if that Rule had been inserted in the Regulations without any intention that practical effect should be given to it, and he would recount the circumstances under which it had been made. A Committee, which had been moved for by the then Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands), had conducted a very laborious and exhaustive inquiry for two years, and in their recommendations with regard to the Diplomatic Service, there was a paragraph in which they expressly said that, having considered the question whether outsiders should be brought into the profession of diplomacy, they thought that, under certain circumstances, the power of appointing them should be left to the Secretary of State, and they gave it as their opinion that he should not be confined to the service alone in filling up vacant appointments. It could not be said, then, that that power was so novel that it was inexpedient to exercise it. Under ordinary circumstances, there might have been something to say about this appointment; but, considering the present position of affairs, he contended it was justified by the facts of the case. The hon. Member seemed to think that no one had been taken into the Diplomatic Service from the outside; but there was the noble Lord (Lord Strathnairn) who, as Sir Hugh Rose, was appointed Secretary to the Embassy at Constantinople, and there were many other instances he could mention in which military men had received similar appointments. He observed that the hon. Member attached great importance to the regulations as to promotions in the Diplomatic Service; but these were only meant to apply to minor posts, and it seemed to him that he did not draw a distinction between those and appointments of a higher rank—

MR. BENETT-STANFORD: I rise to explain. It has always been considered in the service that gentlemen from the outside—Members of Parliament and such like—might be placed in the upper posts, but that minor appointments should always be conferred on gentlemen of the Diplomatic Profession only.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he would give the hon. Gentleman the benefit of his contention, for Lord Strathnairn formerly filled an appointment of some importance before he was promoted—namely, that of Consul General, and, unless he was very much mistaken, had been appointed to that very important place directly from the Army and while serving in it. He need not point out that there had been other cases, and notably that of Mr. Layard, where gentlemen had been taken from the outside to fill important places in the Diplomatic Service, and he would not weary the House by recounting the numerous instances in which transfers from the Consular to the Diplomatic Service had been of much public advantage. He drew from the fact of those transfers the argument that the Diplomatic Service was not a close profession; and it had always been understood that, on the authority and responsibility of the Secretary of State, it should be open to him to appoint those who would, in his judgment, best serve the required purpose. The hon. Gentleman had said that in the duties of Military Attaché there was nothing of a diplomatic character, and that he only had to collect details about arms, ammunition, and troops, which were in no way concerned with diplomatic matters. To that statement he was obliged to demur. In the first place, the information which it was the duty of a Military Attaché to procure was of very great importance, and it was no inconsiderable advantage to him to have facilities, from his position as an officer, for procuring proper information. In almost every country there was a very large number of questions connected with the military service which intimately concerned diplomacy, and the Military Attaché went through a course of training which would thoroughly fit him for duties more strictly of a civil nature. It was not to be lost sight of that in these days and in certain countries military rank had distinctly its advantages; and, particularly in relation to the Court to which Colonel Wellesley was about to be accredited, his military rank and his position as a personal aide-de-camp of the Sovereign gave him considerable advantages, and also enabled him better to discharge the duties to his country which he was sent to perform. [“No!”] Hon. Members might dissent from that view, but it was a matter of fact and not of opinion, and he felt sure that Colonel Wellesley would justify his prophecy rather than their interpretation of it. However, Colonel Wellesley had discharged other than military duties; and hon. Members, if they looked at last year's Parliamentary Paper, No. 9 on Turkey, would find records to show that Colonel Wellesley had the highest authority abroad, and a memorandum of the communications which passed between him, as the Representative of Her Majesty's Government, and the Emperor of Russia. It was only necessary to refer to those Papers to prove that Colonel Wellesley had already been trained to negotiations of extreme delicacy and importance. There was one point on which he would only touch very lightly. It would be difficult for him, acquainted though he was with many members of the Diplomatic Service, to take a series of names and point out the particular qualification which this or that man could show in competition with Colonel Wellesley. One gentleman had served for 62 years—perhaps that was no special qualification, nor was it necessary that a man should have experience of every clime in the world. He had rather not discuss the merits of those gentlemen; but, when he found that there were rules laid down upon principles which had been accepted by a Committee of the House and acted upon by successive Ministers, and that, according to those rules, Colonel Wellesley had been appointed as the fittest person, he was content to set the opinion of Lord Salisbury and Lord Granville against that of the hon. Member, and to leave the hon. Gentleman to draw his own conclusions. He had endeavoured, as far as possible, to avoid giving offence to anyone, and if he had spoken with warmth he must apologize for having been betrayed beyond his duty. He did not think he had said anything which could not be justified, and he believed he had sufficiently proved to the House that this appointment was consistent with the rules of the service, that it could be fully justified by the circumstances of the case, and that it did not fall under those terms of condemnation which the hon. Member sought to impose upon it.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, it was impossible to discuss a personal matter without personal allusions, and he claimed the right of saying everything with regard to Colonel Wellesley which he should have said if Colonel Wellesley were sitting opposite to him. In the first place, he admitted the contention of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just sat down, that it was right and proper that the Secretary of State should have the power of making these appointments in the Diplomatic Service; but to that high power attached a grave responsibility, and he did not think that any Secretary of State should put a man in any position in the Diplomatic Service unless he was prepared to meet, in the most distinct and categorical manner, any challenge in that House as to the merits of the person appointed. Two cases had been referred to in the course of this discussion. When the present Viceroy of India was appointed, the diplomatic post he vacated at Lisbon was conferred upon a gentleman whose preferment caused a certain amount of dissatisfaction among the friends of persons who thought they had a better claim to the position. But the reason why the gentleman in question was sent there was so obvious that no one on either side of politics in that House challenged the appointment. The other case was that of Mr. Layard, who was appointed to a very high position—to the Legation at Madrid; but his appointment, also, was not challenged in Parliament, although Mr. Layard had been a militant politician for many years, and had, as such, a fair share of enemies. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer would show that, in the present instance, there were thoroughly good reasons for the appointment of Colonel Wellesley, he should have nothing more to say on the subject. But, in looking at the case of Colonel Wellesley, the first thing that struck him was the fact—it was rare for any man to develop ability entitling him to exceptional promotion in two totally distinct lines of life; but this fortunate person had developed not only great diplomatic, but also great military ability. Although he was a comparatively young soldier, being only 33 years old, and having had only 15 years' service, he was put over the heads of hundreds of officers, many of whom had seen a great deal of service, and was made aide-de-camp to the Queen, thereby attaining the rank of full colonel in the Army. This happened in the month of January. Then it was a remarkable circumstance that, immediately after a connection of this fortunate young gentleman became Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, it was discovered that Colonel Wellesley possessed extraordinary diplomatic ability, as it had previously been discovered that he had extraordinary military ability. Accordingly, he was put into a high position in the Diplomatic Service, and was put over the heads of some 95 men, many of whom had done good service to the Crown. It ought not to be forgotten that the military position of this fortunate gentleman was an exceedingly irregular one—for either he would now draw his full military pay, in addition to his pay from the Diplomatic Service, or else he would draw his half-pay after only 15 years' service; whereas the usual period after which half-pay was drawn was 25 years. It was said that Colonel Wellesley had peculiar qualifications for the office—that he had acquired a certain knowledge of Russia and of the Russian language. The fact was that he had been in Russia for something over six years. Well, if he had not learned Russian, and had not obtained some knowledge of Russia in that time, he would have been an idiot, and would have been perfectly unworthy of any position in Her Majesty's service. If Colonel Wellesley's appointment was to be justified by his exceptional military ability, either the gentlemen over whose heads he had been appointed had grossly neglected their duty, and thus disqualified themselves for this post, which should have fallen to them by seniority, or else they lacked ability in a remarkable degree. But the fact was that a good many had been passed over who were much more competent to fill this position than Colonel Wellesley. If he had been sent as Military Attaché to Vienna, that would have been a natural course of promotion; but why was he advanced to a position for which he had evinced no aptitude? It had been alleged that the fact of Colonel Wellesley being a military man would give him some special advantage at Vienna. This, however, he wholly denied. It was well known that, although the policy of Austria might, on various occasions, be divergent from that of Russia, yet the alliance of a personal kind between the two Empires was very close, and the circumstance that Colonel Wellesley had had an unpleasant quarrel with a Russian Grand Duke was not likely to commend him to the Court of Vienna. He knew there were some persons in this country whose passion at present was hatred to Russia, and that the mere fact of a man having rendered himself peculiarly distasteful to Russia and having seen the seamy side of Russian society, was likely to make him very popular indeed. He, however, took a totally different view of the matter. Such experiences were not a qualification for a man becoming a member of a profession, whose honourable motto ought to be—"Peace on earth and goodwill towards men." It had been stated in the course of the discussion that the Earl of Malmesbury, when Foreign Secretary, appointed a defeated Conservative candidate to the post of First Secretary to the Embassy at Paris—the Ambassador at the time being Earl Cowley, the father of the gentleman to whose appointment attention was now called. But no mention was made of the fact that the position of the gentleman appointed was made most disagreeable to him, and that he was removed as soon as the Government of Earl Russell came into Office. Colonel Wellesley might be very well received by the Embassy at Vienna; but, if he were, the members of the Embassy were not possessed with the usual passions of human nature. Of this the Government might be perfectly certain, that the appointment would be criticized most bitterly in every capital of the world. It would be criticized not only by persons who thought that a grievous wrong had been done to the public service, but by men smarting under a sense of personal wrong, and they would be members of a society which had no superior in point of honour, and they would, on that account, be listened to. He would say no more on this subject. There were two kinds of truths. There were truths which it was wise to speak, and there were others on which it was better to keep silent. He trusted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be able to make a reasonable defence of this appointment, and to justify it on the ground of peculiar qualifications.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I must begin the few observations I have to make by saying that it is wholly out of my power to answer accusations which are not fit to be made, and I can only regret that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Elgin (Mr. Grant Duff), after having made a tolerably severe attack upon Colonel Wellesley, and upon this appointment, based on grounds which I think I shall be able to show have been perfectly untenable, has thought fit to wind up his remarks with a vague kind of charge which he does not choose to define. It may be that he took this course because he thought he had not made out a sufficiently strong case against Colonel Wellesley, or because he desires to throw a little discredit in a way it is utterly impossible to measure, and which we can only deal with on the principle of omne ignotum pro magnifico—or, in other words, on the suggestion implied in his observations that there was a good deal more behind to say, but that it was so bad he would not bring it before the House. I must say that I think this a most unfair way of dealing with the question before us. It is true, as has been said, that Colonel Wellesley is not present among us in person, but he is represented by his official superiors, and I think it was peculiarly desirable that no attack of the kind should have been made without full Notice having been given of the intention to bring the matter forward. It is true that the Foreign Secretary makes these appointments on his own responsibility, and it is also true that the hon. Member for Elgin has expressed his opinion that the Secretary of State ought to defend his appointments; but it is also a fact, as the hon. Member knows, that the Foreign Secretary has no voice in this House, and that he can only be defended by his Colleagues in this House after they have been made fully acquainted with the nature of the charges to be brought against him. The hon. Gentleman has implied that there are some personal and family reasons for this appointment, and he also spoke of Colonel Wellesley as a connection of Lord Salisbury. "Connection" is a word of wide meaning, and personally I know nothing of the matter as far as the present question is concerned; but I have the authority of my noble Friend the Marquess of Salisbury for saying that his connection with Colonel Wellesley, as far as his recent appointment is concerned, has been purely official, and therefore only dates as far back as the time at which my noble Friend became Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. I am further authorized by my noble Friend to say that the appointment was made entirely apart from any pressure from without, and solely because he thought, on public grounds, that Colonel Wellesley was eminently fitted for the office to which he has been appointed. Colonel Wellesley, as the House must know, has great personal experience of the peculiar circumstances existing at the present time, as far as foreign politics is concerned. The hon. Gentleman has suggested that Colonel Wellesley's peculiar qualification was that he talked Russian, that that was all he had done during the last six years, and that he must have been a great fool if he had not learned to talk Russian in that time. That is not the point. Nobody ever said a word about it. Colonel Wellesley was, I believe, able to talk Russian before he was appointed Military Attaché. ["No, no!"] It was one of the grounds given.

MR. BENETT-STANFORD: It was a wrong ground, then. Lord Enfield said so, but he was mistaken.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am informed that the Report made upon Colonel Wellesley, before his appointment, or at the time he was appointed Military Attaché, was to the effect that he had served in the first battalion of the Coldstream Guards, that he was much above the average ability, and in capacity was an exceedingly smart, zealous, and intelligent officer, and that he was acquainted with the French, German, and Russian languages; also that his knowledge of the world particularly adapted him for the position of Military Attaché. But that is not the point upon which we go. The point is the peculiar position that he has occupied during the last year or two, and the peculiar nature of the appointment which he has accepted. If the hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs had only looked at the Papers which have been laid on the Table of the House, he would have seen that within the last year Colonel Wellesley has been the medium of important diplomatic communications at times when the Emperor of Russia was far removed from St. Petersburg, and when, therefore, it would not have been possible for Her Majesty's Ambassador at the Court of the Czar to have been in personal communication with him. In these transactions Colonel Wellesley showed that he was something more than a Military Attaché, and that he was capable of dealing with delicate questions of diplomacy. Under all these circumstances, my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs came to the conclusion, in which all his Colleagues agreed, that Colonel Wellesley was eminently fitted for the post, and accordingly appointed him to it. This my noble Friend did on his own responsibility, believing the appointment to be the best that could be made for the public service. It therefore comes to be a question of opinion between my noble Friend and the hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs as to the eligibility of the appointment, and I must leave it to the House to decide the point between them; but I can confidently assert that the grounds on which the appointment was made were those which I have stated, and no other. I shall not go into the general question of the mode in which appointments of this kind are made. The names of the late Lord Lyons and of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe might be mentioned as eminent instances of the fact that in former times the Diplomatic Service was by no means a close service in the sense of being one confined entirely, or almost entirely, to men who had been brought up in it; but I admit that in more recent times—since 1861—it has had more the character of a close service. Still, I agree with the opinion expressed by a Committee which sat some seven years ago, namely—

“That it is undesirable in the interests of the public that promotion in the diplomatic service, especially for the higher and more responsible posts in it, should be by way of seniority; and the Committee are of opinion that the Secretary of State should be distinctly understood to make his appointments to such posts on his own responsibility by way of selection, and not by way of seniority; and that, while paying proper regard to the due claims of those in the service, he should not be confined in his freedom of choice in filling up such appointments.”

Upon that was founded the Rule observed in the present case. I admit that, as a general principle, the Foreign Secretary ought to be very careful—as he is—not to disappoint the proper hopes and expectations of men serving in the lower ranks of the service; and I admit that such an appointment as this is not one for which there is frequently reason and justification, except for the special circumstances under which it was made. Those special circumstances I have stated, and I can assure the House that the appointment was made by Lord Salisbury for no other reason than because he believed it was the best appointment under the circumstances.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, he should vote against the Motion. He was personally acquainted with Colonel Wellesley, and he had formed a high opinion of his ability. That fact alone, however, would not have been sufficient to induce him to vote against the Amendment before the House, but he took a broad constitutional ground. When Ministers took an unconstitutional course and slighted the House of Commons, no one was more ready than he to oppose them. But, on the other hand, he thought it most dangerous for the House of Commons to interfere between these appointments and the responsible Ministers of the Crown, unless there was marked incapacity shown—and especially at such a time as this. The responsibility of the Government was great in choosing proper officers, and it was impossible that the House could form so good an estimate of the capacity of the men that were appointed as those whose special duty it was to appoint them. Here there was no proof of incapacity, nor even any allegation that such existed. If there was any matter in which a Minister ought to be left to act upon his responsibility, it was in the case of an appointment such as that of Colonel Wellesley, and, happily, no question of Party politics arose to complicate the matter. The late Government was attacked because they placed Sir Robert Collier in his present position, but the result had shown that they were justified in doing so; and their main defence had been that, whatever technical doubts there might be as to the meaning of an Act of Parliament, they had, upon their responsibility, selected one whom they believed to be the best man for the place. Such, no doubt, would be the case in the present instance, and he should therefore support the appointment, because he believed it to be a good one.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he had been a Member of every Committee that had sat on the Diplomatic Service, and he could state that the general opinion of those Committees was that the Diplomatic Service should be thrown open as far as possible. Some five or six of the English Ministers abroad had never been attaché or secretary to an Embassy; and, as the First Secretary of Embassy had, in the absence of the Ambassador, to perform his duty, it was desirable that such appointments should be open. He believed Colonel Wellesley was fitted for the post to which he had been appointed, and he had no doubt the appointment would be attended with advantage to the public service.

MR. W. LOWTHER said, that it was with great regret that he had heard the answer given the other day by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He said the other day that nobody was so well qualified to fill the post as Colonel Wellesley, and he (Mr. W. Lowther) regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had gone out of his way to give a slap in the face to the whole of the junior members of the profession. He had not the honour of Colonel Wellesley's acquaintance, but he could not but regret his appointment as a departure from the invariable practice in such cases, and one which the Diplomatic Profession would very much deplore. The position of Military Attaché was quite different from that of other Attachés; and his firm opinion was that Colonel Wellesley would be equally useful at Vienna as Military Attaché, and he would have more ready access to the Court than if he were a Diplomatic Attaché. The action of Lord Salisbury might be legally right, but he (Mr. W. Lowther) could not help thinking that it was morally wrong.

THE MILITARY FORCES OF THE CROWN — EMPLOYMENT OF INDIAN TROOPS.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD SELBORNE rose to call attention to the question whether the Indian troops excepted from the Vote recited in the Preamble of the Mutiny Act can, consistently with Constitutional Law, be employed during time of peace elsewhere than in Her Majesty's Indian Possessions without the previous consent of Parliament?—and said: My Lords, it is not my intention to attempt to make use of the present opportunity to call in question the policy of the step taken by Her Majesty's Government in ordering troops from India to Malta. That is a very important matter, on which, doubtless, a variety of opinions may exist in your Lordships' House, and a matter on which I should be fully prepared, at what I might deem a fitting opportunity, to express the opinion which I may have formed. But, on the present occasion, I think it better to abstain from entering upon any such question of policy. The occasion in respect of which I shall address your Lordships is, as I view it, a peculiar and remarkable one. It has not arisen in a time of war, and therefore it does not give rise to any considerations peculiar or appropriate to such a state of circumstances. It has not arisen at a time when Parliament was not assembled, and when the Government could not advise the Sovereign to have immediate recourse to the counsels of Parliament. It has arisen when Parliament is in full Session, and when there has been no obstacle whatever to any communication which might be constitutionally right and proper between the Queen and Her Parliament. No doubt there have been occasions in the past history of this country—and such occasions may occur again—when, in consequence of alarm of war when Parliament was not accessible, extraordinary measures might not only be justified, but it might have been the duty of the Government at the time to take them; and in such circumstances, if those measures were wisely and necessarily taken, the Government might rely on the ratification of Parliament on the first opportunity after its re-assembling. But that is not the state of circumstances in this case. Neither can the case be represented as one in which there has been any inadvertence or oversight in any sense whatever on the part of the Government. The facts are these. The usual preliminary Votes having been taken, the annual Mutiny Bill, founded on the Vote of Men for the Army, passed the House of Commons on the 29th of March last. Before that time your Lordships will remember a change had occurred in the composition of the Government, which I cannot be far wrong in presuming to have occurred after the measure now under consideration had been decided upon by the Cabinet. On the 1st of April, in compliance with the requisition of the Act of Parliament relating to the Reserves, a Message was brought down from the Crown which communicated, in the proper and Constitutional manner, the measure which the Sovereign, on the advice of Her Ministers, had taken for calling out those Reserves; and I need not state to your Lordships, that, if Her Majesty's Government had not thought that this other measure, which then either had been resolved on or was in immediate contemplation, was one that needed no communication to Parliament, it is hardly possible that a communication respecting it should not have been made simultaneously with that relating to the Reserves. My Lords, no such communication was made. Both Houses of Parliament adjourned on the 16th of April for an unusually long period, and on the same day the Royal Assent was given to the annual Mutiny Act. Immediately afterwards the country became aware that the Government had given orders that, I think, seven regiments of Native troops should be sent from India to Malta. Naturally, as soon as Parliament met, attention was called to that subject; and Parliament was informed, in the most authoritative manner, and by one of the most authoritative organs of the Government, that this was an order

"strictly within the proper Constitutional Prerogative of the Crown, and one which Her Majesty has as much right to give as to order any portion of British troops now in England to proceed to Gibraltar or Malta, or anywhere else;" and was subject to the control of Parliament only like "all movements of British forces"—namely, by means of "the right of withholding or challenging the Supplies asked for the purpose."—[3 Hansard, ccxxxix. 1435]

Again—

"Under any circumstances, we should not have thought it our duty—even if we had foreseen that the matter would become public within so short a time—to have made a communication to Parliament with respect to it until the arrangements had been completed."—[Ibid. 1436.]

My Lords, I ought not to omit to mention that the same authority, while admitting that it would be an infringement of the Bill of Rights to bring Native troops from India to England, thought that those troops might legally be called on to serve in the Channel Islands. On the day following, this further announcement was made in the House of Commons—

"The Indian Government has for the moment provided what is necessary for the fitting out of the Expedition, and the payment of the troops."

(Adding, that a Supplementary Estimate would be prepared for re-payment, and to provide for future expenses). In The Gazette of India of April 20 appeared a notification regarding the force to be despatched for service beyond sea, laying down rules for its pay, equipment, &c.—

"Regiments of Native Infantry will draw extra batta and free rations, or ration money at 3 rupees and 8 annas per month will be allowed to rank and file while on foreign service. Forage will also be allowed to horses and ponies of Cavalry, &c. The commanding officers will be authorized to advance three months' pay to the troops for service."

That was, of course, out of the Indian Revenues. My Lords, it appears to me that even if I could not challenge this measure on the strictest grounds of legality—as I propose to do—I should be well entitled to speak of it as "unconstitutional," in the sense attributed to that term by the great Constitutional historian, Hallam; who, calling in question the strict historical accuracy of the statement in the Bill of Rights, that the maintenance of a standing Army in this Kingdom had always been against the law, added that it was at least unconstitutional in this sense—that it was "a novelty of much importance, tending to endanger the established law."

But, my Lords, I challenge this measure both on the ground that it is unconstitutional in that wider and larger sense of that term which may be taken to include things not against the strict letter of the law, and also on the ground that it is against the very letter of the law. The two propositions which I shall endeavour to establish before your Lordships' House are these—First, that the previous consent of Parliament is necessary before any Imperial Forces in addition to the 135,452 men voted for the year commencing April 1, 1878, and mentioned in the Mutiny Act of this year, can be employed in time of peace elsewhere than in India, whether they be Indian troops or any other; and, secondly, that under the India Government Act of 1858 the Indian Revenues cannot be legally used, unless in the particular cases excepted by that Act, without the previous consent of Parliament, for the payment of Indian Native troops serving out of India; and that such use of those Revenues is not made legal by any intention on the part of the Government to ask Parliament for repayment. These are the two propositions on which I take my stand. My Lords, to avoid any misapprehension, I may observe that, when I use the words "Imperial Forces," and say the previous consent of Parliament is necessary for the increase of these Forces serving out of India beyond the number mentioned in the Mutiny Act, I, of course, exclude every local Force in the nature of a Militia, or by whatever other name it may be called, in any of Her Majesty's Colonial or Foreign Possessions, which is not movable at the pleasure of the Crown. And, when I speak of the previous consent of Parliament, I do not mean only a consent signified by an Act of Parliament, or any formal or technical mode of consent; but I mean anything which, having regard to established Parliamentary and Constitutional usage, is habitually accepted as a sufficient Parliamentary consent. With those explanations, I confidently affirm the soundness of the propositions I have advanced. And, my Lords, I attach great importance to the word "previous," in my propositions; because, whenever by law or by the Constitution, the consent of Parliament is required, that consent, if you do not mean to make the obligation illusory and nugatory, must be sought for beforehand whenever it can reasonably be so sought. Of course, the safety of the State must outweigh all other considerations; and if it were not reasonably possible to ask the consent of Parliament before the thing was done, then, the thing being proper in itself, Parliament would doubtless condone the proceeding and ratify the act. But, wherever it is reasonably possible, it is of the first Constitutional importance—it is of the most urgent moment—that when the consent of Parliament can be obtained beforehand, the asking for it should not be deferred to whatever time may suit the convenience of the Government. There is another reason why the consent of Parliament should be "previous"—founded, as I understand it, first, on the manner in which Parliament from year to year gives its sanction to the raising and maintaining the Forces it authorizes; and next, on the form and manner in which that authority is now expressed and embodied in the Mutiny Act. The authority is given, in the first instance, by the Vote of that Body which has command over the public purse, and which votes for the year commencing on a particular day and ending on another day, over which the annual Vote runs, and over which the Mutiny Act also extends, a certain defined number of Men, "not exceeding" so many, who shall be maintained as the Army of the Crown. The words "not exceeding" express a plain prohibition, as far as the terms of that Parliamentary consent go, of any excess in addition to the number then sanctioned by Parliament, which Parliament may not afterwards, in the usual and Constitutional manner, authorize. Until a Supplementary Vote is asked for, and granted, any number exceeding that limit is a direct transgression of the terms in which Parliament has given its consent. And, although that exact form of words is not transferred into the Mutiny Act, yet the affirmative form of that Act amounts in substance to the very same thing; and, as I shall be prepared to show when I come to comment on that Act, it excludes by necessary implication any excess of the number therein mentioned which Parliament may not have authorized. Therefore, both by the letter of the law and on the Constitutional principle, the consent of Parliament is necessary before such a thing can be done; and it is the duty of the Government to obtain that consent before doing it.

How, my Lords, am I to establish the propositions I have advanced? I am content to adopt what was said by Mr. Pitt, in 1794, on the landing of Hessian troops at Portsmouth—

"In such a case there were only two principles to be proceeded upon—the written law, or the known practice and established usage of Parliament."

I think I shall be able to show that both the written law and the established usage of Parliament are against what has been done in this case.

My Lords, first as to the written law. The Bill of Rights, if technically construed—if construed without the application of the Constitutional principle which underlies it, and without regard to the Constitutional interpretation it has received—might not, perhaps, be in the mere letter of its terms sufficient to prove my case; yet, it is so connected with the foundation of that case, and with the whole history of the Constitutional practice that has resulted from it, that it is impossible not to mention it prominently and in the first instance. I refer to the famous declaration in the Act of Settlement of 1689—

“That the raising or keeping a standing Army within the Kingdom in time of peace, unless it be with the consent of Parliament, is against law.”

My Lords, you observe the words “in time of peace.” My notice has reference to a “time of peace,” and I am not now going into the question how far in time of war the application of that prohibition is co-extensive with its application in time of peace; but you cannot look through the documents containing the public history of this country since 1688, without seeing that Parliament has always been most anxious, even in time of war, to conform, as nearly as it possibly could, to the Constitutional principle laid down in the Bill of Rights as applicable to time of peace. The words are “within the Kingdom,” which, at least, means the Realm of England—though I should be sorry to construe the words as applicable to England alone; but it may, no doubt, be contended that they had reference to England alone, because, in 1689, the Union of Scotland, and the Union of Ireland, with England, had not been effected, though there were foreign Dependencies, and the Isle of Man, and the Channel Islands. I do not want to enter into that technical argument; but I cannot help calling attention to the fact that, the words of the Bill of Rights having been recited in every Mutiny Act down to the year 1800, the words “within the Kingdom,” were then and thenceforth, without any new legislation upon the subject, changed to “within the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland;” and I am much mistaken if I shall not satisfy your Lordships that Guernsey and Jersey had always been considered as included in their proper meaning. I think, also, that I shall be able to show your Lordships, that the Constitutional principle on this point has always been understood to include all the Dependencies of the Crown. What security could possibly be imagined to be derived from a law or a Constitutional principle, which limited the rule as to a standing Army so as to make it apply only to such a standing Army as might for the time being be within the four corners of Great Britain—or, after the Union of Ireland, of Great Britain and Ireland—if there might, at the same time, be a standing Army of unlimited numerical force in other Possessions of the Crown, which the Crown, for its own purposes, might move and dispose of without reference to Parliament? It appears to me quite plain that the public danger, which it was believed would exist if the Crown had the power of keeping a standing Army without the consent of Parliament, never could be provided against on such a limited construction of the Bill of Rights, as would admit of a standing Army being maintained without limit anywhere except in Great Britain and Ireland—even, according to the Government of the present day, in the Channel Islands.

And now, my Lords, let me refer to the Constitutional practice which followed the passing of the Bill of Rights. From 1689 down to the time of the Peace of Utrecht, this country was almost uninterruptedly at war. During those years, there were no numerical Votes and no numbers in the annual Mutiny Acts; but the manner in which Parliament, in the annual Mutiny Acts, then consented to the maintenance of the Forces necessary for the public service, was by declaring that—

“The present Forces should be maintained and others raised for the safety of the Kingdom and the preservation of the liberties of Europe.”

But, in 1714, after the Peace of Utrecht and the accession of George the First, an Act was passed for the regulation of the Army; and it was stated that there was to be—

“A number not exceeding,” &c., “to be kept up on foot for the guard of Her Majesty’s Royal person and the safety of the Kingdom, and also a certain number of troops for the defence of Her Majesty's Possessions beyond the seas belonging to the Crown of Great Britain."

This "certain number" was fixed by a numerical Vote of "not exceeding" so many men, for each Plantation and Foreign Garrison or Possession for one complete year; and the Appropriation Act followed the same distinction. This practice became permanent, and continued for nearly a century, during which the Forces maintained for the defence of the Possessions beyond the seas belonging to the Crown of Great Britain were not numerically defined on the face of any Mutiny Act; but they were numerically defined by annual Votes of the House of Commons, for which distinct and separate provision was made in every year by the Appropriation Act. The whole subject was fully debated in the House of Commons in the year 1717; and from that time down to 1808, in every year, there were separate Votes taken for what it may be convenient to call the "Home Service"—though I shall presently show that much more than "Home Service" was comprehended within it—and for the service of our Foreign Possessions, during the current year; which Votes passed into the several Appropriation Acts. The Mutiny Acts, during the same period, did not mention numerically any Forces, except those which were for what I have called the "Home Service," which, in the Votes, were often described as "for guards and garrisons, and other His Majesty's Land Forces, in Great Britain, Jersey, and Guernsey;" and which, in time of war, always included the Regular troops serving abroad. My Lords, that "Home Service," as you will see very plainly, really meant the whole standing Army of the country, which was kept up for the defence of Great Britain, and also for the maintenance of those Imperial interests of which Great Britain was the centre and the guardian. I wish to show the House for what purpose the troops mentioned in all those Mutiny Acts were kept up. From 1717 to 1866, with very rare exceptions, the Forces mentioned in those Acts were stated to be maintained—

That shows clearly how mistaken would be the notion, that those numbers were at any time kept up simply for domestic purposes, or as an Army to be employed only in the United Kingdom. It was the whole Imperial Standing Army which was mentioned in those Acts. The Forces for outlying Plantations and Garrisons were kept separate from that Army—they had separate numerical Votes taken, and separate Appropriations made for them, and were not regarded as part of the Imperial Standing Army maintained—

"For the safety of the Kingdom, the defence of the Possessions of the Crown, and the preservation of the balance of power in Europe."

I do not know why, but since 1866 the "balance of power" has been left out of the Mutiny Acts. That, of course, makes no difference, but I mention the fact. In 1808 the form of the Estimates, Votes, and Appropriation Act was changed, so as to comprehend in one general Vote all Her Majesty's Land Forces for service at home and abroad, except the regiments in the East Indies, the foreign corps in British pay, and the embodied Militia. That Vote included all the Foreign Garrisons, the West India, and other Colonial regiments, and Canada and other Fencibles; and, from that time forward, no separate Vote was taken for Plantations and Garrisons abroad. The annual Votes and Appropriations have ever since followed the precedent of 1808, with variations of form only. Till 1812 no corresponding change was made in the Preamble of the Mutiny Acts. Then, for the first time, there was given in the Mutiny Act of that year the whole number voted—245,996—which in that year included the King's Forces serving in the East Indies, for which a separate Vote was taken. From that time, there has been swept away both from the annual Votes and from the Mutiny Acts the distinction which, from 1714 to 1808, had been made between that which I have described as the Home Army—but which, in a far higher sense, was the Imperial Standing Army, kept up for the defence of the Possessions of the Crown and the preservation of the balance of power in Europe—and the Local Garrisons and Plantation Forces. From that time the whole were consolidated and brought together. I find, that from 1813 to the passing of the Act for the Government of India, in 1858, all the Mutiny Acts followed the precedent of 1812, except that they excluded from the number mentioned "His Majesty's Forces employed in the territorial possessions of the East India Company," but included "the officers and men of the troops and companies employed in recruiting for those Forces." After that date, there were no men employed in the moveable Armies of the Crown, anywhere save in India, who were not included in the number of men voted, and mentioned in every year's Mutiny Act. Since 1858, the same principle has been adhered to, with some differences of expression, which I shall note hereafter. The Votes, the Appropriation Acts, and the Mutiny Act, all continued to refer to the number of men, voted for the year as "not exceeding" so many, excluding the Forces in the territorial possessions of the East India Company. I apprehend, therefore, that if a portion of the latter had in any year been withdrawn from those territorial possessions and sent to Malta, so as to add to the whole aggregate of the number of troops to be maintained under the Mutiny Act, that would have been a plain and distinct violation of the Mutiny Act, and an undoubted contravention of the law. It would have been necessary to go to Parliament, and get a Supplementary Vote, before any of the Forces employed in the territorial possessions of the East India Company could be moved from India and taken anywhere else, except in exchange for an equivalent number, sent instead of them to India. That brings me down to the end of the time which preceded the change, such as it was, which was effected by the Government of India Act; and when I deal with that Act, I shall have to cover the ground of both at once of the propositions, which I told your Lordships it was my intention to maintain.

Before, however, I leave this part of my subject, I should be doing wrong if I did not refer your Lordships to two historical precedents illustrating what I have said, both of which occurred during the last century. In the first place, I shall refer shortly to what happened in 1734. Europe was then engaged in war. Great Britain was not at the time involved in it, but there was great reason to apprehend that this country might become so involved, and Parliament was about to be immediately dissolved. The new Parliament could not meet for a considerable time, and events of the gravest importance might occur in the interval. What did the Government of the day do in that state of things? Did they consider it their duty to dissolve Parliament, and to meet any case of necessity, by making an addition, on their own responsibility, to the Forces, and afterwards applying to Parliament for an Act of Indemnity? No; they took a very different view. They saw that the state of circumstances was such as might make it necessary, in the interval between that time and the meeting of the next Parliament, to raise additional Forces. Accordingly, a Message was sent down from the Crown, asking the consent of Parliament to an indefinite increase of Forces, of which an account was promised to be given to the next Parliament, on the ground of a necessity for taking precautions—

"During such time as it may be impossible for His Majesty to have the immediate advice and assistance of his great Council."

The King, therefore, having asked beforehand, that both Houses would give their consent to the raising of such additional Forces as might be necessary, both Houses voted Addresses of Assent in answer to the Royal Message. It was thought by many statesmen of that day that even that was too large a power to be entrusted to the discretion of the Crown; but Lord Hardwicke and Lord Chancellor Talbot held that consent might be given by an Address from each House of Parliament, as well as by an Act. The imminence of the danger was held to justify His Majesty's Message, and what followed was covered by the consent given beforehand. That was an example of a clear adhesion to the Constitutional principle for which I am now contending.

Again, my Lords, in 1775, on the breaking out of the American War, Parliament was informed in the King's Speech, on the opening of the Session, that his Majesty had "sent to the garrisons of Gibraltar and Port Mahon a portion of His Electoral troops, in order that a larger number of the established Forces of this Kingdom might be applied to the maintenance of its authority."

That was done while Parliament was not sitting, and the proceeding was defended on the ground of necessity;

but it was very much contested whether such a proceeding, without the consent of Parliament, could be justified; and I find that some of the most eminent men of that day supported a Motion for a grave Censure. Among them were Lord Lyttelton, the Duke of Grafton, the Duke of Richmond, and Lord Camden, all of whom insisted on the received Constitutional understanding of the principle of the Bill of Rights. Lord Camden,

"from the true construction of the letter and spirit united, as interpreted for a series of almost 90 years. . . . drew this obvious conclusion—that no foreign troops could be brought into the Dominions of the Crown of Great Britain without the previous consent of Parliament. . . . It was true," he said, "that the word 'foreigners' was not mentioned in the law; but would anyone infer from that, though it was not permitted to keep a standing Army of natives, it might be wise, constitutional, and legal, to keep on foot a standing Army of foreigners?"—[Parl. Hist., xviii. 811-12.]

He added, that "he was ashamed to dwell on such puerile distinctions." But it does not rest on what Lord Camden said. Other ancestors of noble Lords now in the House expressed similar opinions. The Lord Chancellor of that day, Lord Bathurst,

"deserting what he called the quibbles of Westminster Hall and the subtle distinctions of lawyers, allowed that the fortresses of Gibraltar and Port Mahon were fairly within the spirit and meaning of the paragraph in the Act of Settlement; and that, in the same sense, too, he understood it applied to foreigners, but to neither in the manner now contended for."—[Ibid., 815.]

He justified the measure on the ground that America belonged to "the Kingdom" in the same sense that those fortresses did, and that, there being war in America, it was not a "time of peace." Even when so defended, the Government of the day, though professing to believe in the strict legality of their act, did not depend upon that justification, or meet the Motion of Censure moved in both Houses with a direct negative. They moved the Previous Question, and, in that way, of course, succeeded; and Lord North, the Premier, brought in a Bill, reciting that there were doubts of the legality of the measure, and proceeding to grant an Indemnity for it. That Bill passed through the House of Commons and came up to the House of Lords. In the House of Lords it met with opposition, not from any unwillingness to grant the indemnity, but because it was not thought right to acquiesce in the proposition that there was any doubt as to the law. The supporters of the Government said—"We do not care about it on our part." They were strong and confident both in their majority, and also in their substantial justification for what they had done, when Parliament was not sitting, for the safety of the Realm. They knew, that in so acting, they had incurred no actual peril; and therefore they were content to leave the matter as it was, and to let the Bill be rejected. But history records that, far from taking their stand upon the ground that this was a thing which could properly be done in time of peace without the consent of Parliament, they justified their conduct only because the country was at war; and they were not content to take a negative Vote against the proposition of Censure, but they moved the Previous Question, and pressed forward a Bill for their own indemnity, until they found that it would not pass with the unanimity which in their eyes would alone give it value. These are the precedents, arising before the year 1808, to which I have thought it right to call your Lordships' attention; and, if your Lordships will allow me, I will read a short passage from the speech of Serjeant Adair, delivered in the House of Commons in 1775, because it bears strongly upon the question now under discussion. Serjeant Adair said—

"It was no answer, to say that, in fact, the number of troops mentioned in the Mutiny Act are only those kept up in Great Britain, exclusive of those employed in the garrisons abroad; because Estimates were every year laid before Parliament, and supplies granted for the express purpose of supporting the troops kept in those garrisons, as well as in Great Britain; and, therefore, the one had the consent of Parliament as well as the other."—[Parl. Hist., xviii. 833.]

Serjeant Adair was a man of considerable reputation in his day; but I am not obliged to rely on his authority, because your Lordships have seen that Lord Chancellor Bathurst, in speaking upon the same question, admitted that Gibraltar and Minorca came within the substance of the principle, and only justified the step taken by the fact that we were then at war.

My Lords, this brings me to what may be called the second division of the subject—namely, that arising out of the legislation for the Government of India in 1858. Your Lordships are aware that the Act for the Government of India contains a clause of great importance, which bears upon this subject, and on which the second proposition which I have submitted to your Lordship depends. The terms of that clause are as follows:—

It is quite clear that the present case does not fall within the exception stated in that clause. There has certainly been no actual invasion of Her Majesty’s Indian Possessions, and, however serious the present emergency may have been considered to be on this side of the world, it would not justify any steps being taken under the other branch of exception laid down in the Act, which the context plainly shows to mean a sudden and urgent necessity with respect to the safety of India. That being the effect of the clause, I will, with your Lordships’ permission, advert briefly to its history. The Bill, as introduced, did not originally contain that clause. There had been a clause, not identical with it, in the first Bill introduced in the same year, 1858, by the Government of Lord Palmerston, which was to the following effect:—

“Provided no such military Forces as aforesaid, or any other military Force hereafter paid out of the Revenues of India under this Act shall, while so paid, be employed out of Asia.”

When the change of Government occurred, the late Lord Derby brought in the Bill which afterwards became law. It was, in the House of Commons, that Mr. Gladstone, on the 6th of July in that year, proposed a clause, differing from that which we now find in the Act in this respect—that it proposed to prevent the employment of our own Indian Forces beyond the frontier of Her Majesty’s Indian Possessions, except with the consent of Parliament, or in cases of emergency. When Mr. Gladstone proposed that clause, he made use of some expressions which I think it right to read to your Lordships—not so much on account of Mr. Gladstone’s authority, but because of the assent given to them by the then Secretary of State for India, the present Earl of Derby, who had charge of the Bill. Mr. Gladstone insisted on the danger of leaving it

“in the discretion of the Executive to make use of what might be called extraneous finance and an extraneous Army for the purpose of making war, the expense of which was to be hereafter charged on the British people.”—[3 Hansard, cli. 1011.]

Lord Stanley (accepting the clause with only a slight verbal change, suggested by the present Lord Chancellor, then Solicitor General) said that Mr. Gladstone “had said nothing to which he was not prepared to assent.” When the Bill came up to this House on the 19th of July, the late Lord Derby proposed that the form of the clause should be changed, so as to make it stand as it is at present. It had been objected to in the House of Commons by Lord Palmerston, and in the House of Lords it was still objected to in its altered form by several Peers then in Opposition, including my noble Friend behind me (Earl Granville), as interfering, more than was safe or desirable, with the Prerogative of the Crown: and that for a very plain reason—namely, because it would operate, not in time of peace only, but also in time of war. In answer to those objections, Lord Derby said—

“The Crown would be at full liberty to employ those Forces in any quarter of the globe for which, by the terms of their enlistment, they were eligible. It being the undoubted Prerogative of the Crown to make war and peace, the constitutional check upon the exercise of that Prerogative was the sanction of Parliament, by the granting of pecuniary resources. . . . The clause did not prevent the Crown from making use of the Indian troops; subject only to this—that, as a general rule, the expense of those troops must be defrayed by Parliament; and the same constitutional check, therefore, was imposed on the Crown with respect to troops serving in India which was imposed with respect to troops serving in every other part of the globe.”—[Ibid. 1697.]

The noble Earl the present Prime Minister had spoken in the House of Commons to the same effect. I do not see a word there to which reasonable exception can be taken, or which is inconsistent with either of my propositions. There is not a word there about moving troops from India in time of peace—the whole argument was, that in case of war the Crown would be able to use these troops out of India, subject to the control which Parliament might exercise by refusing Supplies; and that any troops which might be so moved would be subject to all the Constitutional checks and safeguards which would be applicable to any other part of Her Majesty's Forces serving beyond the limits of India.

What has been the practice since the time to which I am referring? I find that the Votes, the Appropriation Acts, and the Mutiny Acts, have all mentioned numerically the whole Army of the Queen, excepting such part of the troops as were serving in the Indian Possessions of the Queen; in addition to which, care has been taken to let Parliament know how many European troops were, from year to year, actually serving in India. It is remarkable that, almost as if anticipating the present discussion, and giving beforehand a crucial answer to the arguments that might be used in support of the course which has been taken, the language of the Mutiny Acts underwent in 1863 a change which has been continued down to the present year, and from that date gave the numerical total of the Forces serving, or to serve, for the following year, "exclusive of the numbers actually serving within Her Majesty's Indian Possessions"—as if the expressions formerly used had been too ambiguous. I do not suppose that the present question was foreseen; but the alteration in the terms is useful, as showing distinctly the sense of Parliament, that the number voted was meant to include all Her Majesty's disposable Forces, which could be used for the purposes of a standing Army, except such troops only as, from time to time, might be actually serving in India; and that, when Indian troops might be moved to places other than India, the fact should be made known to Parliament, so that, by means of Supplementary Votes, or otherwise, a Constitutional and Parliamentary sanction might be obtained for their employment and payment.

My Lords, I now come to the action which has been taken—for action has been taken—on this view of the law; and we are not left to mere abstract arguments with reference to this matter. My contention is, that according to the terms of the Mutiny Act, it is altogether contrary to law to exceed, elsewhere than in India, the number of men actually voted for the service of the year, and mentioned in the Mutiny Act, and I shall endeavour to prove this from what has been said and done. I also contend that it is against the express words of the 55th clause of the India Government Act to use the Revenues of India without the consent of Parliament for the payment of these troops; and that it is no answer on the part of the Government to say that they intend, at some future time, to ask Parliament to sanction, or to refund that payment. What has been done is opposed to the letter of both the Statutes to which I have referred, and it is also opposed to the great and broad Constitutional principle which underlies them both. It cannot be said that what has been done has resulted from inadvertence or oversight; inasmuch as on three previous occasions the same question has arisen in Parliament, and with one uniform result. The first occasion was in the year 1863—the very year in which the words "Exclusive of the numbers actually serving in India" were first inserted in the Mutiny Act. In that year a Maori outbreak occurred in New Zealand, and Sir George Grey, the then Governor of the Colony, sent a message to the Duke of Newcastle, suggesting that it would be very useful if some Sikh troops could be sent from India to his assistance, the case being one in which help was urgently required. The Government thought that the application was reasonable, and it was agreed that the troops should be sent. On the 23rd of July a debate arose in the House of Commons on the proposal to send 3,000 Indian Sikh troops to New Zealand. In the course of the debate, my right hon. Friend Mr. Forster used words which I quote, not as of authority, but because they produced their effect. He said—

"He did not object to the employment of Sikh troops in New Zealand; but it appeared that, by little and little, the Crown was getting the disposal of a much larger Force than was voted by Parliament; and it was highly important that the relations in which we stood to the Indian Army should, in this respect, be clearly established and understood. The subject was noticed when the Bill for amalgamating the Indian with the Queen's Army was under discussion; and the difficulty was foreseen by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who introduced a clause to meet it. It was a high breach of the privileges of the people to maintain a standing Army without the authority of Parliament; and the precise number of men of which the Army was to consist was annually voted by the House. But if they permitted the employment, without remark, of Indian troops out of India, although there might appear reasons for it, the result would be to place at the disposal of the Crown an Army of 100,000 or 200,000 men beyond the Force directly sanctioned by the House."—[3 Hansard, clxxii. 1291.]

Lord Palmerston, who answered Mr. Forster, justified the proceeding as one of urgency; the expense of which, if not met out of the money already voted, or by the Colony, would be asked for from Parliament in the next Session. Lord Palmerston showed a bold front to Mr. Forster on that 23rd of July; and on the 25th the Duke of Newcastle sent the following despatch to Governor Sir George Grey:—

"On learning the apprehensions which are entertained by yourself and your Government, I wrote without delay to the Secretaries for War and for India, requesting that you might receive immediate assistance. I have every reason to hope that a European regiment will be at once sent to you from Ceylon and two Sikh regiments from India, unless, happily, the occasion for their services in New Zealand shall have passed away before they can be embarked."

But what was the result? It is not difficult to see, that, between the 23rd and the 27th, the Cabinet must have had an opportunity of deliberating on what had been said in Parliament; and, on the 27th of July, two days after his first despatch, the Duke of Newcastle wrote again to Sir George Grey in these altered terms—

"With reference to my despatch No. 78, of the 25th inst., I have now to acquaint you that Her Majesty's Government have not considered it desirable to send from India the two Sikh regiments for which you have applied. The Governor General for India has, however, been desired to despatch immediately to the Colony two of those regiments which would, under other circumstances, have returned home during the present season."

I am now going to quote the authority of a man whose name must have considerable weight with noble Lords opposite, because of his great reputation with them on military matters, and because of his public services—I mean General Peel. General Peel, on the 9th of March, 1863, speaking in the House of Commons, took exception to the omission from the Vote of men, then proposed by Sir George Lewis, of two regiments of Indian Native Infantry employed in China; and he moved to reduce the money Vote so far as it covered their pay and clothing. He said—

"His object was to prevent any Government employing a Native Indian Army in China at the charge of this country, without the House knowing and having control over the expenditure. He wanted the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Cornwall Lewis) to add these two regiments to the number to be voted, and then the House would know what the actual Force was; for it was quite evident that the number of 148,242 set down in the Estimates was not the total Force."—[3 Hansard, clxix. 1277.]

Nothing was done in consequence of that at the time; and, in the following year, the Vote, as again brought forward, still omitted those two regiments from the number of men to be voted. It was stated, however, on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, that there was no objection to including them in the Estimate; and a statement of their actual number was laid before the House. On that occasion General Peel said—

"Last year, when the Indian troops were first noticed in the Army Estimates, and a sum of money was taken for their payment, no number was given, and there were no means of ascertaining their number. . . . The result of what then took place was that this year not only the amount of cost, but also the number of men, was given. Certainly, if the control of the House was necessary in one case, it must be in the case of the Indian Native troops. [Colonel SYKES: 'Serving out of India.'] If any part of the Native Indian Army could be employed without a Vote of that House, those troops were altogether removed from Parliamentary control. In the case of ordinary troops there were two checks—the Mutiny Act, and the money voted by Parliament for the pay of the troops. But neither of these checks applied to the Indian troops. Native Indian troops were not liable to the Mutiny Act, being expressly excluded. . . . and were ruled by Articles of War expressly framed for India: and the House had no control over Native troops through its privilege as to money Votes, because those troops were paid, in the first instance, by the Indian Government, and the expenditure never came under the notice of the Imperial Parliament till long after it had been incurred."—[3 Hansard, clxxiii. 1431.]

The consequence of what then occurred was this—that from 1865 to 1872—the last occasion on which there has been any employment of Native Indian troops out of India—the number of those troops to be so employed in each year was regularly voted by Parliament; though they were not included in the numbers mentioned in the Mutiny Acts of those years. It is true that the numbers were small; but the smaller the numbers, the more important, as illustrating the principle. Lord Hartington, Sir John Pakington, and Mr. Cardwell, were the successive Secretaries of State who moved those Votes. In 1865 the number of Indian Native troops voted was 178. They were employed in China and the Straits Settlements. The same number was voted in 1866 and in 1867. In 1869 the number was 880, and, in the two following years, 1,760. The Army Votes in 1866 were in this form—and, in such matters, form is of importance—

First:—"That a number of Forces, not exceeding 138,117 men, be maintained for the service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland from the 1st of April, 1866, to the 31st of March, 1867, inclusive."

There, my Lords, "the service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland" means the service of the standing Army, as voted by Parliament, for all Imperial purposes. The second Vote followed:—

"That a number, not exceeding 178 of Native Indian troops belonging to Her Majesty's Native Indian Army, be maintained beyond Her Majesty's Indian Possessions."

In the present year, there is only one Vote, for a

"total number of men, including the staff of the Militia Forces on the Home and Colonial Establishments of the Army, exclusive of those serving in India, 135,452;"

and that number has passed into the Mutiny Act of this year,

"exclusive of the number actually serving within Her Majesty's Indian Possessions."

And now, my Lords, I come to the latest precedent. It is that of 1867, and it arose out of the Abyssinian Expedition. The Native Indian troops employed in that Expedition were so employed during a time of Recess, without the previous, though with the subsequent consent of Parliament. They were, from the first, paid out of Indian Revenues. But what occurred? An Autumn Session was held for the express purpose of getting that consent. In the course of the discussion which arose in November, 1867, on the Message from the Crown, Mr. Gladstone, referring to the 55th clause of the India Government Act, said—

"This was the very thing the Act of 1858 was passed to prevent. If the application of the Indian Revenues, by way of advance, be not prohibited by the clause as it stands, the clause is little better than a dead letter."

Lord Selborne

Two days later, on the 28th of November, Sir Stafford Northcote moved Resolutions for the payment of the Indian troops employed on that Expedition out of Indian Revenue. Sir Stafford Northcote, who is always as frank as the interests of the public service will permit, but whose frankness differs in its manifestations under different circumstances, said, in moving these Resolutions—

"I am bound to say, wishing to be as frank as I can with the Committee, that, although the question is by no means free from doubt, I am inclined to think, upon a very strict interpretation of the Act, it may be held that what we have done is outside the letter of the law. The point on which we are challenged, so far as I understand, is this:—In the application of the Revenues of India to the purposes of the Abyssinian Expedition, as far as it has hitherto gone, we have been proceeding upon the view, not to their ultimate application without the consent of Parliament, but only to their advance for the purposes of an Expedition, which advance will be repaid by subsequent payments from the Imperial Revenue. I am inclined to think that the wording of the clause would, strictly speaking, prohibit that proceeding."—[3 Hansard, cxc. 359.]

I certainly regard that as a very frank admission, indeed. Your Lordships will, I think, be of opinion that there has been no occasion on which the same question has arisen in so practical or important a form as on the present occasion; but, on every occasion which the question has arisen, the result has been the same. Lord Palmerston, a man as inflexible of purpose as any man could be, abandoned the intention he had formed, as I have shown, when he gave it further consideration, because he could not reconcile that intention with the existing law. General Peel, for several successive years, caused Votes of the House of Commons to be taken for the numbers of the Native Indian troops employed out of India; and Sir Stafford Northcote admitted that the payment of Indian troops serving beyond the limits of Her Majesty's Indian Possessions out of Indian Revenues, even by way of an advance intended to be afterwards repaid, was, strictly speaking, prohibited by Act of Parliament; although he pleaded, by way of extenuation, that others had done the same thing before, and that it was always the intention of Her Majesty's Government to come as soon as they could to Parliament to obtain assent to what had been done.

This, my Lords, is no mere matter of form—it is a matter of principle. If that principle be violated, the effect may be to take away the practical securities intended to be given to the nation by the Bill of Rights. It is no answer to plead the general control which Parliament has in the matters of Supply. It is no answer to say that the Government has a great majority, which is sure to approve their action, and that it little signifies whether that approval is asked sooner or later. It is of the very essence of the Constitution and of the safety of our civil government that the power of the majority should not be so strained; and that, when other checks have been provided, you should not rely merely on the power of a majority. And, my Lords, if I could give no other reason, I would insist upon this—that the observance of these checks and rules enables Parliament to form an unprejudiced judgment upon the measures which it is proposed to take, and that their neglect deprives it of that power. When troops have been actually employed, they must be paid; and when advances have been made out of the Indian Revenue, Parliament has no choice but either to leave the charge on that Revenue, or to provide for its repayment. My Lords, I shall not dilate further upon that subject. I prefer to quote words by no means without application to the present occasion, uttered by one who was able to give much more forcible expression to his views than I can, and by one of much higher authority. The words are these—they were used in the House of Commons in the debate upon that very Abyssinian Vote—

“It is not any present danger I fear, as resulting from the present step; but, having regard to the future, I do not like India to be looked upon as an English barrack in the Oriental seas, from which we may draw any number of troops without paying for them. It is bad for England, because it is always bad for us not to have that check upon the temptation to engage in little wars”—

“Which can only be controlled by the necessity of paying for them. But it is bad, very bad, for India; because if there were a weak, or a timid, or too facile, a Governor General in that country at the time of any similar operation, you might have India seriously denuded of troops in order to suit the Imperial interest, while there would be this precedent to prevent you from censuring any officer who pursued such a course. I think that the precedent of the Persian War, which has been mentioned in this discussion, is applicable in more respects than one; because, if I am not mistaken, at the time the Mutiny broke out, part of the troops which should have been guarding India were absent on that war. Now, this is a warning which we ought to lay to heart. If this garrison which we keep in India is—as all Indian authorities assure us—necessary for maintaining that country in security and peace, that garrison ought not to be rashly diminished. If, on the other hand, it is too large, and India can for any length of time conveniently spare those troops, then the Indian population ought not to be so unnecessarily taxed.”—[3 Hansard, cxc. 406.]

My Lords, I am not sure what number of troops were employed in the Abyssinian Expedition, but I think they were not more than are now proposed to be removed from India. The Member who uttered these remarkable words in 1867 was a man of no small weight—it was Her Majesty's present Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

My Lords, I have now brought my remarks to a close, but I will say a few words in justification of the course I have taken in not concluding with a Motion. It is a difference between the practice of this House and that of the House of Commons, not unattended with some advantages, that we may raise discussions which they cannot, unless they conclude with a Motion. If, in the public interest, it seemed necessary to take the same course here, I should not be in the least afraid to undertake the task of putting my propositions in the form of a Motion. But, my Lords, on this occasion, it has appeared to me, and to the Friends with whom I act, that the public interest which we have in view may be effectually promoted without any Vote of this House; and, by adopting this course, I hope, in the first place, we shall avoid anything like controversies on mere matters of form or of words. This is a question about matters of substance, not of words. In the second place, from the nature of the question, from its very important bearing, not only at the present time, but it may be for all time, upon the interests of the country, I think there is much convenience in a form of proceeding which avoids imputations of personal censure or of Party attack; and I am the more satisfied with the course I have adopted because I infer, from what is passing elsewhere, that if I had put it in the form of an affirmative proposition, I should have been met, not by any negative issue, but by a very general reference to existing law and practice, informing me, at the same time, that Her Majesty's Government consider it to be

Well, I do not ask your Lordships to affirm any Resolution "tending to weaken Her Majesty's Government in the present state of foreign affairs;" but I have thought that the occasion was one which absolutely demanded, from those who had Constitutional law and principle at heart, protest and criticism. That protest I have made; that criticism I have offered; and I hope, and confidently believe, that they will not be unattended with some public advantage and utility, now and hereafter.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My noble and learned Friend (Lord Selborne) has called your Lordships' attention to a subject of much interest and importance; and I own I cannot but rejoice that a subject which has been so much misunderstood out-of-doors, and which, I am afraid, has been imperfectly considered, even by my noble and learned Friend, has been brought at once under the light of public discussion. In order that your Lordships may see that I am at one with the noble and learned Lord as to what is the point now to be examined, let me remind your Lordships of those views of the question, which he properly stated he did not mean to approach, and upon which I do not mean to make any observations. He said that he did not on this occasion challenge or propose to argue the policy or the expediency of the moving of any part of the Native Indian Army for employment out of India. My Lords, that is a subject of great interest. It is a question upon which different opinions may be entertained. When it is thought fit to raise that question in this House, Her Majesty's Government will be prepared to state the reasons, in point of policy and expediency, upon which they have acted; and they entertain a confident hope that they will have the full assent of your Lordships, as they believe they have the assent of the country, to the step they have taken. My Lords, another subject which my noble and learned Friend said he should not refer to, and to which I do not mean to refer, is the question of the provision to be made by the other House of Parliament for the maintenance of the troops which have been moved to Malta. Upon that subject, Her Majesty's Government have stated, and stated in the most emphatic manner, that their intention is to apply to Parliament—to lay before the other House the expenditure which would be incurred by the removal of these troops, and to ask the assent and support of the other House for that expenditure. There is no Government which, in any time of emergency or difficulty, has not over and over again had to face a question of this kind. There is no Government in this country which has not at times incurred an expenditure or made an expenditure of money which, in the first instance, is not authorized, and for which they have had to come to Parliament afterwards for assent to an expenditure already made or already incurred. My Lords, whether that expenditure is only incurred, or whether it is made, for temporary purposes, out of a fund which has afterwards to be recouped, the principle is the same—the Government have done the thing upon their own responsibility and risk—they have to come to Parliament and state what has been done, and they have to ask, retrospectively, the consent of Parliament to their act. Upon that point we have very high authority, beyond which I have no desire to go. In the course of the last financial year, Her Majesty's Government came down to the House of Commons for its sanction to an expenditure, beforehand, of a very considerable sum of money. That step of the Government was challenged by persons "elsewhere," who objected to what was done. It appeared to many to be a safe and judicious course to ask for the assent of Parliament to an expenditure which might become necessary on a sudden occasion with regard to which no delay could be brooked. An objection was, however, taken, and the Government was told that there was a higher and better principle upon which they ought to have acted. It was said in the debate, in the other House, on the 8th of February—

"He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) says a sudden emergency may arise, and he may want transports and other means to meet the emergency. If a sudden emergency did arise, the Government must know their duty too well to wait for a Vote of this House. No Government worthy of its place but would, upon a sudden emergency, give the orders which the circumstances of the time might demand, and then come down at the earliest moment in their power to ask the concurrence of the House in what they had done. Undoubtedly, that is the principle on which all Governments have acted in this country, a principle which has never been challenged."—[3 Hansard, ccxxxvii. 1370.]

That was the opinion as to the Constitutional course that ought to be taken given by the late Prime Minister (Mr. Gladstone), and that is the course we have taken.

My Lord, these questions being put out of the ambit of our discussion, I come to what, after all, is a dry and bare legal and Constitutional question, although it has taken two hours by the clock to call your Lordships' attention to it. I think it is a simple question; but, like every other question, it may be overlaid with matter—and, if it be, it is necessary to strip away and to put aside all the irrelevant and perverted matter by which a simple and plain question has been covered, and to ask your Lordships' judgment upon the question as it stands divested of all those irrelevancies. The Notice of my noble and learned Friend is a very simple one; it affirms or suggests one proposition which may be expressed in very few words. The proposition which the Notice expresses is this—that it is unconstitutional in time of peace to remove any part of the Native Army of India out of Her Majesty's Indian Possessions without the assent of Parliament. That is a very short proposition, and one which, once that all which is irrelevant has been explained and discarded, may be determined without any great length of argument on the one side or the other. That is the proposition of which my noble and learned Friend has given Notice.

But before I address myself to it, I must call attention to what I cannot but consider a remarkable occurrence which has come under our notice. It was about a week ago that the noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition in this House (Earl Granville) gave a Notice on behalf of my noble and learned Friend, who was then absent. The next evening my noble and learned Friend came down and said he had been given to understand there was a similar Motion coming on in the House of Commons, so that there would be a simultaneous discussion in both Houses of Parliament upon this subject, and it was the opinion of himself and of those who acted with him that it would be better to have it upon the same evening; and, accordingly, the debate here was fixed for this evening. I have no right to say what is being done at this moment in another House of Parliament; but I have in my hand a proposition which has attached to it the name of an eminent Leader of the Liberal Party; and this is stated to be the opinion which he is prepared to maintain—

"The Marquess of Hartington:—Military Forces of the Crown.—That by the Constitution of this Realm no Forces may be raised or kept by the Crown in time of peace, without the consent of Parliament, within any part of the Dominions of the Crown, excepting only such Forces as may be actually serving within Her Majesty's Indian Possessions."

Of course, the first observation which must occur to your Lordships is this—that if this is the proposition which is to be submitted to the other House of Parliament, it is entirely a different one from the proposition contained in the Notice before us. It is the first occasion in Parliamentary history on which a simultaneous discussion has been fixed for the two Houses to discuss upon the same evening two different questions. It is difficult to see what virtue there can be in having the discussions on the same night. One proposition may be right, or the other may be right, or they may both be wrong; but they are perfectly different propositions. The proposition of my noble and learned Friend relates to the employment of troops which are raised with the consent of Parliament. The proposition of Lord Hartington relates to the raising of troops without the consent of Parliament. The noble and learned Lord, having probably had his attention drawn to the great anomaly of Leaders of the Liberal Party advancing different propositions in the two Houses, has endeavoured to lead your Lordships up to two other propositions which he now puts forward as covering the whole ground. So they may do; but these were not the propositions of which he gave Notice. He gave Notice of a simple proposition implying the want of power to move Indian troops out of India without the consent of Parliament. A noble Lord is affirming "elsewhere" that, looking broadly over the whole of Her Majesty's Dominions in every part of the world, in no corner in any one of them can any troops be raised or kept which can be called troops of the Crown unless they are included in the number of men mentioned in the Mutiny Bill. I must, therefore, in the first place, say a few words about the proposition of the Marquess of Hartington—because the noble and learned Lord has shown more or less willingness to adopt it. Where is the authority for the proposition that the consent of the English Parliament must precede the raising of troops in any and every portion of the Dominions of the Crown, no matter how those troops are to be maintained? I say nothing about a time of peace or a time of war, for a separate discussion would be required to determine what is a time of peace or a time of war. The noble and learned Lord found great difficulty in explaining the exact meaning of the Bill of Rights, and I think there is very great difficulty from his point of view. It says that maintaining an Army in time of peace within the Kingdom without the consent of Parliament is illegal, and at that time "the Kingdom" was England. After the Union with Scotland, "the Kingdom" became Great Britain. After the Union with Scotland, and before the Union with Ireland, we know that throughout the last century Forces were kept up by the Crown in Ireland without the assent of the English Parliament. Does anyone say that that was a violation of the Bill of Rights? Since the Union with Ireland, the wording of the Mutiny Act has become "the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland;" and the understanding between the Parliament and the Crown has been declared to be that there is to be no standing Army kept up within the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in time of peace without the consent of Parliament. That is the interpretation which Parliament yearly puts upon the well-known clause of the Bill of Rights, as applied to the present state of affairs. Does the noble and learned Lord mean to say that Malta is part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland? Where, then, is the authority for that proposition of the Marquess of Hartington?

The Lord Chancellor

I do not stop there. I take the Mutiny Act, and in the 4th clause of the Act I find a most clear distinction drawn between troops in a Colony or Dependency of the Crown which cannot serve in the United Kingdom and those which can serve in the United Kingdom. The 4th clause provides that all officers and soldiers of any troops—of any "troops," observe—mustered and in pay, which shall be raised and serving in any of Her Majesty's Dominions abroad, or in places in the possession of, or occupied by, Her Majesty's subjects, and under the command of any officer having any commission immediately from Her Majesty shall be subject to the provisions of the Act and of the Articles of War. The troops may be raised in any Colony or Dependency. The clause does not stop there; but it says that if, having been made prisoners of war, they be sent to Great Britain or Ireland, although they are not to serve therein—because they would be in excess of the number sanctioned by Parliament—the clauses with regard to billeting are to be applicable to them. Therefore, it is assumed that there may be in all other parts of the Dominion of the Crown out of the United Kingdom, a raising of men which shall be Forces of the Crown, which may serve under the Queen's Commission, which shall be subject to the Articles of War, which may not come into this Kingdom to serve, but which, if made prisoners, may be billeted, although they may not serve.

But the Motion of the Marquess of Hartington is an impeachment against the whole system of procedure in our Colonies. There is scarcely one of them in which there have not been such Forces. The noble and learned Lord said he did not speak of local Forces which might be raised in the Colonies, whether as Militia or under any other name, but which could not be moved out of the places where they were raised. But what has the removability of troops to do with the Motion of the Marquess of Hartington?

VISCOUNT POWERSCOURT: This is the fifth time the noble and learned Lord has referred by name to a Member of the House of Commons. I should like to know whether he is in Order?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I am perfectly in Order.

EARL GRANVILLE: The Question should probably be, whether the noble and learned Lord is in Order in discussing a Motion which is to be made in the other House?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I do not in the least know what Motion is to be made in the other House of Parliament; but I said I had had before me what I understood to be Lord Hartington's opinion on the subject. If the noble Earl is prepared to say that this is not Lord Hartington's opinion on this subject, I am prepared to withdraw all my observations. What, then, is the fact as regards the Forces of the Crown serving under the Queen's Commission? I find that there are such Forces in Canada, New South Wales, Victoria, New Zealand, British Guiana, Jamaica, Honduras, St. Vincent, Grenada, Antigua, Dominica, Gambia, Sierra Leone, and St. Helena—and all of these are Forces of the Crown not included in the numbers mentioned in the Mutiny Act. They assume various forms. Sometimes they are in the form of a standing Army; sometimes in the form of a Militia. They are called out from time to time, and they are under the command of officers bearing Her Majesty's Commission. The service is compulsory; and with regard to one of the places mentioned—Canada—they number, I believe, in one year something like 45,000, and they are bound to serve either within or without the Dominion. With regard to some of these Colonies—those having Representative Institutions—it is possible that permission may have been given them by the Imperial Legislature to raise Forces of this kind; but I will take the Colonies to which the observation does not apply; and in these Colonies there are Forces of the Crown, without any authority of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, but also without any violation of the Bill of Rights or the Mutiny Act. I now come to the proposition of my noble and learned Friend. ["Hear, hear!"] Yes, but the noble Duke who cheers me appears to forget what has happened. The proposition of my noble and learned Friend is the proposition of which he has given Notice; but the noble Duke forgets that my noble and learned Friend adopted in his speech the other proposition, and it is for this reason that I passed aside to answer that other proposition.

LORD SELBORNE said, that the proposition he had laid down was expressed in its own terms, and if they were to be criticized, it would be better that those terms should be quoted than others.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My noble and learned Friend has placed a proposition on the Notice Paper, and we understand what that proposition means; but, in his speech to-night, he has expressed two propositions which are not on the Paper. If I understand one of those propositions rightly it is the same, in effect, as that of Lord Hartington—namely, that there cannot be maintained in the Colonies or Dependencies of the Crown any Forces of the Crown except those included in the Mutiny Act.

LORD SELBORNE said, he would repeat the words of his first proposition—

"That it is necessary to have the previous consent of Parliament before any Imperial Forces, in addition to the 135,475 troops voted for the year commencing the 1st of April, 1878, and included in the year's Mutiny Act, can be employed during the time of peace elsewhere than in Her Majesty's Indian possessions."

He had been careful to explain in what sense he used the word "Imperial," as excluding any local Force not moveable at the pleasure of the Crown.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Where is the authority of my noble and learned Friend for importing into his definition the word "Imperial," and for saying that "Imperial" troops cannot be maintained?—there is no such expression in the Mutiny Act as "Imperial." That expression has been introduced by my noble and learned Friend in order to found an argument upon it; and he knows that, without the introduction of that word, his argument could not be maintained. The expression is that no "standing Army" can be maintained, and my noble and learned Friend adroitly imports the word "Imperial," in order to get rid of the Colonial argument, which he feels is fatal to his contention.

My Lords, I now come to the Notice of my noble and learned Friend. I have no wish in this matter to gain a mere triumph of words. I am anxious to consider the Constitutional question fairly. I believe that in this House—however we may differ on other points—both sides are anxious to maintain the Constitution of the country. I believe I speak as much for one side as for the other—no one sitting on either side of the House would consent, knowingly, to what would be a violation of the Constitution; and, speaking for Her Majesty's Government, I will say that if they believed for one moment that what they have done—even if carelessly done—had been a violation or straining of the Constitution, they would come at once to Parliament and ask for its indemnity for the act they had committed. But I think I shall be able to show your Lordships to demonstration that there has been no departure from the Constitution. In one respect, and in one respect only, has the act which has been done by the Government transcended the powers they possess—that one respect being the expenditure of money, with reference to which they have expressed their intention to apply to the House of Commons for the purpose of obtaining its retrospective assent.

The transaction of 1775 has been referred to, but nothing could be more irrelevant to the question. There were three distinct features in that case, not one of which is now present. The three distinguishing features of the transaction of 1775 were these—The King garrisoned Gibraltar and one of the islands adjacent by a number of Hanoverian troops; and the question was not as to the movement or employment of troops which were the troops of the Crown, but as to the employment of troops which were not the troops of the Crown. They were the troops of the Elector of Hanover. It so happened that the Elector of Hanover was also King of England, but that did not alter the circumstances of the case. The employment of the troops of Hanover was as much the employment of the troops of a foreign Power as if they had been the troops of France; their employment, therefore, was an unconstitutional act. What was the second feature of that transaction? There was in what was done a violation of the Act of Settlement. It was a violation of the Act of Settlement that any office or place of trust should be placed in the hands of foreigners. These troops being foreign troops, and the garrison of Gibraltar being placed in their hands, there was a violation of the Act in placing an office of trust in the hands of those who were foreigners. But, in addition to that, the third feature in the transaction, which was very much insisted on in the debate, was that the Hanoverian troops were subject to no Mutiny Law. They had a Mutiny Law of their own, but they had left it behind them in Hanover, and when they went to the British Colonies they were a body of armed men subject to no discipline. They entered the employment of the British Crown, and the Crown trusted them with its fortresses. Yet, if they had risen in mutiny, they could not in any way have been controlled. But not one of these features applies to the present case. Beyond all doubt, the Government of that day had done what could not be justified. My noble and learned Friend says Lord Bathurst expressed an opinion that the provision in the Bill of Rights as to a standing Army extended to every part of the Kingdom. Now, it is well known that the debates of that time were very indifferently reported, and whatever observations Lord Bathurst made appear to have been made for the purpose of introducing a paradox. You say, said Lord Bathurst, that the Realms of England mean every part of the King's Dominions; well, suppose I admit that, the effect of it is, whenever there is war in any part of the King's Dominions, the Bill of Rights does not apply; this Kingdom, therefore, means America, and there is war in America, and that, therefore, these troops could be brought to Gibraltar. Now, is it possible that this is anything but a fanciful paradox of Lord Bathurst's?

My Lords, the question which your Lordships have to consider is not as to foreign troops, but as to the Forces of the Crown, duly raised under the sanction and authority of Parliament. Where and what is the limit placed on the authority of the Crown to use and to move its own troops? In the first place, I would remind your Lordships that the Native Indian Army is, since the Act of 1858, part of the Forces of the Crown; and, with regard to the Forces of the Crown, the general rule is that it is the Prerogative of the Crown to move them to whatever place it may think fit, and that it is for those who assert, that in any particular case that Prerogative is restrained, to show how that restriction presses upon the Prerogative. As to the Prerogative of the Crown, let me point out to your Lordships what the undoubted law on the subject is. The Prerogative of the Crown was defined so long ago as the reign of Charles II., in the Preamble of an Act, which Preamble has been kept alive, though the rest of the Act has been repealed. The Prerogative of the Crown is stated to be—

“Forasmuch as within all His Majesty’s Realms and Dominions, the sole supreme government, command, and disposition of the Militia, and of all Forces by sea and land, and of all forts and places of strength is, and by the laws of England ever was, the undoubted right of His Majesty, and his Royal predecessors, Kings and Queens of England, and that both or either of the Houses of Parliament cannot nor ought to pretend to the same. . . .”

That is the general rule with regard to the Prerogative of the Crown. I should like to fortify that position by reference to two eminent authorities to which I should think Members of the Liberal Party will attach weight. Mr. Fox, towards the close of the last century, was speaking on a subject which in the last century was of much interest—the right of the Crown to move the Irish Army. Mr. Fox, after remarking that the English and Irish Armies had different Mutiny Acts, which he thought inconvenient, then proceeded to make a proposal, the precise nature of which does not seem very clear. But he observed—

“Though he was an enemy to the dangerous influence of the Crown, he was a friend to the just Prerogative, and he considered the power vested in His Majesty, of sending troops to whatever place of His Dominions might require their assistance, as the most valuable Prerogative. It was on this ground that the Earl of Chatham said that retrenching the number of troops to be employed in Ireland was ‘tearing the master-feather from the eagle’s wing.’ He considered, therefore, this Bill, as containing different laws, to be dangerous to the Prerogative, because it might prevent the Crown from sending troops from any other place of His Dominions to Ireland, or from Ireland to any other part of His Dominions in cases of emergency.”

What was the opinion of Lord Grey’s Government as to the power of the Crown? Sir John Hobhouse, representing Lord Grey’s Government, said—

“No House of Commons, at the commencement of every Session, could fairly call upon the Government to state the manner in which the Army of the country was disposed of at home or abroad. That was certainly a matter which should be left to the discretion of the Crown, and the existing Government, according to the emergencies of the time, for there might be circumstances, with which the Government alone could be acquainted, to render it of the utmost importance that the mode in which the military Force was disposed of should be concealed. With the vast interests of our great Empire, with Colonies spread over the whole surface of the globe, it was apparent, looking to England, Ireland, and the West Indies, and, indeed, to all parts of the world, that no man could have a right to call upon the Government to proclaim how many troops were stationed in this place and how many regiments in that. It would not only be the grossest imprudence, it would be usurping the power delegated to the Government, and it would be exposing to those who might take advantage of such exposition what Force was to be stationed, in disciplined array, in different parts of the Empire.”

My Lords, this is the general and well-settled doctrine of the Constitution with regard to the power of the Crown over the disposition of its troops; and I repeat, it lies with those who desire to limit the Prerogative to show upon what principle they would limit it. If limited at all, it must be by some condition or limitation in the terms of the enlistment of the troops, or by some localization in the code of discipline for the troops, or by those precedents which, as my noble and learned Friend said, become, after a certain length of time, the law and custom of the case, or by some written statutory enactment. And now I proceed to the inquiry whether in any of these modes it has been limited? Remember, that this is not a question about raising or increasing an Army; it is a question of moving an Army which already exists—an Army which is undoubtedly the Army of the Crown. The inquiry is the simple one, whether that Army, like any other Army of the Crown, can be moved at the discretion of the Crown, or whether that discretion is limited by any of the modes to which I have referred? What is the case with regard to enlistment? What are the terms of enlistment of the Native Indian Army? The terms are these—

“I will be faithful to Her Majesty the Queen, Her heirs, and successors, and will go wherever I am ordered, by land or sea, and will obey all commands of the officers set over me even at the peril of my life.”

There is no doubt that there is no limit whatever imposed by the terms of enlistment. Well, then, is the Prerogative limited by the Code of Discipline? Has it been contemplated or not that the Indian Army may be employed out of India? I take the Act of 1834—an Imperial Act of Parliament, which gives power to the Governor General in Council to make Articles of War for the government of the Native Indian Army—and what do I find in it? I find these words—

“It shall be lawful for the said Governor General in Council from time to time to make Articles of War for the government of the Native officers and soldiers in the military service of the Company, and such Articles of War shall prevail and be in force, and shall be of exclusive authority over all the Native officers and soldiers in the said military service to whatever Presidency such officers and soldiers may belong, or wheresoever they may be serving.”

Well, is it the case that the Articles of War do apply to the Indian troops serving out of the Indian Dominions? I find that they contemplated this very case, for they say—

“74.—Every General Court-martial shall, if held in British India, consist of not less than nine commissioned officers; but may, if held out of British India, consist of not less than seven commissioned officers.

“142 (e).—In the case of a Detachment General Court-martial held beyond the limits of British India, and not within the Dominions of the Princes and States of India in alliance with Her Majesty, &c. . . . Provided that, in detached situations beyond sea, or out of British India, or on service in the field, &c.”

So much for the discipline. I now come to the precedent or custom. I will take, in the first place, one very instructive document. It was a Report of a Committee of the other House of Parliament upon the subject of the employment of the Native troops, not many years ago. It was appointed on the Motion of Major Anson, and made its Report in 1868. Of course, I have nothing to do with the recommendations of that Committee; but I go to that Report as a convenient historical statement. The Committee, after hearing evidence as to the practice with regard to the Native Indian troops in times past reported upon that point—

“The Madras, Bombay, and Bengal Armies have been employed beyond seas from the earliest period of our connection with India. The Madras Army has garrisoned Amboyna, Ceylon, Ava, Mauritius, the Straits Settlements, Malacca, Java, Burmah, and China. The Bombay Army has been employed in Aden, China, Scinde, and now in Abyssinia; and the Bengal Army in Egypt, Java, China, Ava, and now in Abyssinia. The Bengal Army, previous to 1856, had only six regiments recruited on the agreement of general service; but in that year, the Madras Army being overworked, the Supreme Government altered the conditions of recruiting, and, in the General Order, dated July 25, 1856, gave this reason for so doing.”

Now, this was the reason—

“It has become very inconvenient to Government, and it is also hurtful to the State, that a small portion only of the Bengal Army should be available for the service of the State beyond seas, and this inconvenience is not much diminished by the fact that the entire Native Armies of Madras and Bombay are enlisted without any limitation of their place of service.”

And, on this ground, the Order goes on to say—

“The Governor General will not henceforward accept the services of any Native recruit who does not at the time of enlistment distinctly undertake to serve beyond seas, whether within the territories of the Company or beyond them.”

There is, in this, no reference to a time of peace or a time of war; and no suggestion as to the consent of Parliament being required. Nor is it material that these movements of the troops were in the days of the East India Company. If the East India Company, who were the vicegerents of the Crown, could move the troops, a fortiori, the Crown could move them. The Committee continues—

“It seems difficult to believe that the Indian Government would have issued such an Order as this, if they thought that there were any real difficulties to overcome in the employment of Native troops beyond seas, or if they did not intend it to be a reality.”

Now, that is the Report of the Committee of the House of Commons. Was that Report challenged, or was it qualified, or in any way objected to from that day to this? Certainly not.

I will now go on to examine the specific instances in which the Native Indian troops have been used out of India. In deference to the noble and learned Lord, who seems to think it of some importance, I will take, in the first instance, the case in which Native Indian troops were ordered from India to the Cape of Good Hope. Notice was taken of the fact in the House of Commons, not on the ground of the unconstitutional or illegal character of the proceeding, but on the ground that if those troops were so used, the expense of moving them ought not to be charged upon the Indian Revenue. Lord Palmerston said he did not think the Indian Government should bear the expense out of their Revenue, or that it should be defrayed by contributions from the Colony, and that the House would be asked next Session to grant a Vote to defray this additional expenditure. It was never even hinted that there was any question as to the legality of the employment of those troops out of India—the only question being one of money, and of who was to pay. The noble and learned Lord has found that the order for the troops was countermanded, which was probably done to save the financial controversy which was threatened in the House of Commons.

Now, I pass to the precedent with which the name of General Peel has been connected. Your Lordships who have the leisure to investigate that case will find it an interesting one. General Peel, as the noble and learned Lord says, was one of the most skilful, accurate, and experienced statesmen that ever presided over the War Department of this country, and he had an eye for Estimates the sharpness of which was never exceeded. The objection that was taken in the House of Commons was, not that the Government had acted illegally or unconstitutionally in employing Native Indian troops out of India, but that, having so employed them, they went down to the House of Commons and asked for a lump sum to defray the cost. As many noble Lords will, perhaps, recollect, General Peel made it what I may call his hobby to ascertain how much each man in the Army cost, and he had worked out the problem with such accuracy as to say that every British soldier costs £100—though I fear the cost is now somewhat more. His complaint, on the occasion referred to, was not as to the illegality of the employment of the troops, but to the way in which the Estimates were framed—which prevented him from being able to ascertain the average cost of each man so employed. I find that in 1863—

“General Peel moved that this sum be reduced by £38,000, ‘repayment to the Indian Government for pay and clothing of two regiments of Native infantry employed in China.’ . . . He had great objection to the Government employing Native troops out of India, and he should therefore move to reduce the Vote by the sum which he had named. . . .

“Sir George Lewis found himself very much perplexed as to the mode in which he ought to deal with those Indian troops employed in China. He was told, when they were not introduced into the Estimates, that they ought to have been introduced, and that he was following an irregular course in making a transfer from one Vote to another when providing for those regiments out of the moneys voted for other services. In order to obviate that objection, he had introduced them into the Estimates this year, and had followed the precise practice which had been adopted with regard to the Force maintained at Labuan. If, therefore, the sum of £38,000 for those two regiments in China ought to be omitted, so ought also £4,500 for the troops at Labuan. . . .

“General Peel said the right hon. Gentleman had stated his wish to be the direct contrary of what he (General Peel) desired. His object was to prevent any Government from employing a Native Army in China at the charge of this country without the House knowing and having control over the expenditure. . . .

“Mr. W. Williams (an hon. Member who at that time scrutinized every Vote on the ground of economy) said, that the course taken by the Government was unconstitutional, and he should support the Amendment.

“Sir George Lewis (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) could not admit that there was the smallest force in what the hon. Member called the constitutional objection to passing the item. If he had attempted to procure payment for these two regiments without a Vote of Parliament, something might have been said as to the unconstitutionality of that course, though he believed there were precedents for it.”—
[3 Hansard, clxix.]

The contest of the noble and learned Lord to-night was reduced to the smallest possible point by the noble and learned Lord himself, when he said that the result of General Peel's Motion was, that from that time forward the men of the Indian Army employed out of India were included in the aggregate number of men voted in the Mutiny Act.

LORD SELBORNE: I did not say so. I said the exact contrary; but a Supplementary Numerical Vote was taken for them in each year; and I said that a Supplementary Vote would do just as well.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Then my noble and learned Friend relieves me from what I was about to do—to show your Lordships that these men were never included in the Mutiny Act, or in the numbers voted by Parliament, my noble and learned Friend says there was a Supplementary Estimate. Of course there was. The money required could not otherwise have been obtained. But the men were never treated as a portion of that standing Army which, in the Mutiny Act, was stated to have been voted by Parliament. So much, therefore, for the great precedent with which the name of General Peel was connected.

I must, however, beg to add to the precedents referred to by the noble and learned Lord, and I shall cite them for the noble and learned Lord's consideration. In 1867 the Straits Settlements were removed from the Government of India to the Government of the Crown, through the Colonial Department. From 1867 to 1871 the Madras Native Infantry garrisoned the Straits Settlements in time of peace, and no Constitutional objection was taken to their being so employed; and can the noble and learned Lord show that the consent of Parliament was either asked or given for their employment? The same course was taken with respect to Hong Kong. The case of Abyssinia has been mentioned. In that case, the Chancellor of the Exchequer went down to the House of Commons—as he will do in the present case—and asked the House of Commons to recoup the expenditure incurred on an emergency by the Indian Government on behalf of the Empire. Did any speaker in the House of Commons on that occasion say, or even suggest, that the removal of the Indian troops to Abyssinia was an illegal act? The question was treated simply as one of the money which had or had not to be paid, and no speaker dealt with the question as being one in connection with which the Government could be said to have committed an unconstitutional act.

I will now say a word as to the assent of Parliament. The assent of Parliament is not a matter upon which, as I regard the matter, there can be any argument, as I do not expect anyone will stand up in this House or elsewhere and assert that it does not require the assent of the Crown, of this House, and of the House of Commons. There have been occasions on which the question has arisen how the assent of Parliament should be manifested. One of these occasions—alluded to by the noble and learned Lord—was in 1734, in the time of Lord Hardwicke. Some Members of this House thought that the assent of Parliament required an Act of Parliament to express it; but Lord Hardwicke said that, in his opinion, when the Crown came down and asked for a Vote of men, and both Houses responded to that Address by agreeing to the Vote of men asked for, that was the assent of Parliament within the Bill of Rights. I adopt that view, and it has been adopted on several occasions. Indeed, I should have thought that no Government would either overlook or violate that rule, considering that it comes fresh before Parliament every year in the Mutiny Act. The Mutiny Act, in its recital, says that there must be no standing Army raised in time of peace within the United Kingdom without the consent of Parliament, and I should have thought the words so clear that they could not have been misunderstood; but they have been not merely misunderstood, but neglected, and actually violated—though only once. In the year 1870, which was a time of profound peace, as far as this country was concerned, and when Parliament was sitting, the Government of the day raised an addition to the numbers of the Army authorized by the Mutiny Act to the extent of 20,000 men; and I will venture to say that there is not a syllable on the records of your Lordships' House to show that your assent was asked to such increase in any shape or form. The men were raised on a Vote of the House of Commons, without an Address to the Crown—without any communication to this House, and without the assent of this House. The amount of the Vote of Credit of course found its way into the Appropriation Bill, and the Appropriation Bill came to this House. But the Appropriation Bill is the provision for the whole of the services of the year, and your Lordships' House has no power, as far as the Appropriation Bills is concerned, to do anything other than to accept or reject the whole. You cannot alter or modify it; and to say that in this way the assent of this House could be obtained to an increase of the standing Army, would be to reduce this Constitutional safeguard to a mockery.

So much for precedents. And now I would come to the question whether there is anything in the Statute Law to prevent the Government from removing those troops from India to any part of the Queen's Dominions without the consent of Parliament? I will just refer to a Statute which, although not now in force, was the governing Act for 40 years with respect to the Indian troops—I mean the Act of 4 Geo. IV. c. 81. That Act provided for the trial and punishment, if necessary, of officers or men in His Majesty's Indian Army who might be guilty of offences against the law in these words—

“Whenever any portion of such Native troops shall be serving in any country or place out of the possessions or territories which are, or may be, under the Government of the said United

Company, whether such be the Dominions of His Majesty or elsewhere, on the trial of all offences committed by any Native officer, or soldier, or follower, reference shall be had to the Articles of War framed by the Government of the Presidency to which such Native officer, soldier, or follower, shall belong."

This shows clearly that at the time the Act was passed, it was in the mind of the Legislature that the troops might be serving either in or out of India—not merely on foreign ground, but in other parts of the Dominions of Her Majesty.

But now let me take the Act of 1858, the Act for the Government of India. The 55th clause, as it now stands, provides that the Indian troops should not be paid out of the Revenues of India, except when they are serving in the country; and this shows that the possibility of their so serving out of the country under the orders of the Crown was in the mind of Parliament. Otherwise, if the assent of Parliament to their movement was necessary, it would have been time enough, when that consent was asked for, to have considered how the expense was to be borne. But, what was the history of this clause? When the Indian Government Bill was passing through the House of Commons in 1858, a clause was proposed by Mr. Gladstone on the Bill in these words—

"Except for repelling actual invasion, or other sudden and urgent necessity, Her Majesty's Forces in the East Indies shall not be employed in any military operation beyond the external frontier of Her Majesty's Indian Possessions, without the consent of Parliament to the purposes thereof."—[3 Hansard, cli. 1007.]

This proposal raised considerable discussion, and opinions concerning it were expressed by several leading statesmen. Sir George Cornewall Lewis said, in course of the debate, that—

"In his view of the matter, the general Prerogative of the Crown, in declaring war, was practically limited by the necessity of obtaining Votes of Supply from Parliament for the purpose of carrying on war. Beyond that constitutional necessity, the Prerogative of the Crown with regard to a declaration of war or concluding peace was unlimited. Suppose, however, the Governor General desired to make war, not for the purpose of repelling actual invasion or under other sudden and urgent necessity, he would have to communicate with the Home Government; and in what manner would the consent of Parliament be obtained? He presumed it would be necessary to obtain the consent of both Houses, and that it would be the duty of the Executive Government to introduce a Bill formally giving their consent to the Governor General's making war. That might be difficult to procure. Then the question might arise whether, Parliament having consented to the commencement of a war, it was competent for the Governor General to terminate such war without the assent of Parliament. If they sanctioned such a principle, it might be extended to other wars, and they might eventually adopt the doctrine that the British Parliament, like the American Senate, should give its consent to all wars in derogation of the existing Prerogative of the Crown. If this clause were to have a practical effect, these points would have to be considered."—[Ibid. 1012.]

"He entirely agreed with his right hon. Friend who last spoke, that the consent of Parliament was not necessary previous to a declaration of war, because it was a fundamental principle of the Constitution that the power of declaring war and concluding peace rested with the Crown, the Ministers of the Crown being responsible for the manner in which they advised the Crown to exercise that Prerogative. To maintain that the previous consent of Parliament was necessary, either to the commencement of a war or to the conclusion of a peace, would be to introduce a principle destructive of the British Constitution; and he was somewhat surprised that Her Majesty's Ministers, who were the guardians of the Prerogatives of the Crown and of the Constitution of the country, did not rise and protest against doctrines which in his opinion were most inconsistent with Prerogative and the Constitution. . . . He thought the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) would act somewhat hastily, if he adopted the clause in its present form."—[Ibid. 1013.]

The opinion of Lord John Russell, who followed Lord Palmerston on this occasion, was that—"He was disposed, however, to concur in the objections raised by his noble Friend (Viscount Palmerston) to the terms of the clause. 'Her Majesty's Forces in the East Indies,' it was said 'shall not be employed in any military operation' beyond the frontier of India without the consent of Parliament. Now, supposing we had a war with some European Power, and that, this war being supported by the House of Commons, it was considered desirable for the Indian Army to attack the Possessions of this enemy of the Crown, it appeared to him the clause would prevent the employment of those Forces without the consent of Parliament. Thus if, prior to the attack on Java, when we were at war with the Dutch, the Governor General had been obliged to send to the Home Government, and they had been obliged to apply to Parliament to obtain authority for this Expedition, it might have failed altogether, because, by making it known to the enemy, through a debate in Parliament, you would entirely defeat your object. He doubted also whether the language of the clause would not have prevented the Expedition to Egypt."—[Ibid. 1015-16.]

It was quite clear what the view of Lord Russell was. No doubt, he referred to a state of actual war; but his objection to the clause was that it would limit the power of the Crown in the case of war being imminent, or with a view to objects of great Imperial importance, and render the accomplishment of those objects difficult, if it was necessary to come to Parliament for its assent. On that ground was founded the objection of those eminent men to the clause proposed by Mr. Gladstone, which would have prevented the movement of the Indian troops from India. Well, my Lords, Mr. Gladstone's clause was inserted in the Bill with some verbal alterations, and the Bill came up to this House. When the Bill reached this House, the late Lord Derby drew attention on the occasion of the second reading to the 55th clause. The noble Earl said—

"There are, I believe, only two other subjects to which I need now direct your Lordships' attention, and I allude to them because I think that, as far as they are concerned, the principle and the object of the Bill have been somewhat misunderstood. One relates to the employment of the Indian Army, and the other relates to the admission to the Civil Service of India. The 55th clause deals with the first of those subjects; and it has been objected to that clause, that it appears to interfere with the Prerogative of the Crown, inasmuch as it provides that none of Her Majesty's Forces maintained out of the Revenues of India shall be taken, except in cases of urgent emergency, beyond the frontiers of that country without the previous consent of Parliament. Now, it has been thought—and I confess that the wording of the clause makes it open to a construction which was not intended by its framers—it has been thought that that would be an interference with the undoubted Prerogative of the Crown to make war or peace. . . . Our intention, however, is not to limit the Prerogative of the Crown, but to protect the Revenues of India; and, consequently, when we come to that clause, I mean to propose in it an Amendment which will, I think, remove all ambiguity upon this point. It will be to the effect that, except for the purpose of preventing or repelling actual invasion of Her Majesty's Indian Possessions, or in order to meet some sudden and urgent emergency, the Revenues of India shall not, without the consent of Parliament, be applicable to the expense of any military operation carried on beyond India by Her Majesty's Forces chargeable on such Revenues. That provision will impose a pecuniary check on the Prerogative of the Crown in regard to the Army of India such as already exists in the case of all other portions of Her Majesty's Forces."—[Ibid. 1458-9.]

And what said the noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition in this House (Earl Granville) on that occasion? He thus addressed your Lordships' House—

"The noble Earl has already alluded to the fifty-fifth clause. I have very often remarked that when anything not very wise is done by any person, it is done at the suggestion of some one else wiser than himself. He who offers the suggestion does not very carefully consider it, and the person to whom it is offered thinks he may adopt it, inasmuch as it has proceeded from a very sensible man, without that sifting to which he would subject his own proposition. Something of this sort seems to have taken place in the other House with regard to this clause. A very able man (Mr. Gladstone) in the other House suggested this clause, and the Government, to my great surprise, instantly adopted it. What is the clause? That, except in cases of great urgency, the Army in India shall not be employed beyond the frontier of Her Majesty's Indian Possessions without the consent of Parliament. That appears to me altogether unconstitutional. Then, how is the assent of Parliament to be signified? Is an Act of Parliament to be passed before any military operations can be executed? If so, I presume that it will be equally necessary to have an Act of Parliament declaring peace, and in this way you will entirely take out of the hands of the Crown one of its most important Prerogatives. I must say that if this clause be merely modified in the sense in which I understood the noble Earl to say he was willing to modify it, it will still be open to much objection, and I shall feel it my duty to ask your Lordships to reject it altogether."—[Ibid. 1470-71.]

Well, my Lords, Mr. Gladstone's clause was removed in your Lordships' House from the Bill, and the clause in its altered form became that which is now the 55th clause, and in this form the noble Earl did not ask your Lordships' House to reject the clause; and he must, therefore, have subsequently satisfied himself that when it took its present form it was free from the Constitutional objection which he had pointed out—namely, that in the matter of the movement of Native Indian troops beyond the boundaries of India, it would limit the Prerogative of the Crown. My Lords, I entirely agree with the view expressed by the noble Earl. I believe that the clause, as it now stands, in no way limits, or professes to limit, the Constitutional or legal right of the Crown with regard to the movement of Native Indian troops. It does this, and this only—it protects the Revenues of India from bearing the cost of the movement of those troops. But the argument of my noble and learned Friend is this—that whatever the Act of 1858 does, the annual Mutiny Act by its wording prevents Indian troops being made available out of India without the assent of Parliament. But, in 1858, the Mutiny Act was just the same as it is now, and if any of those eminent statesmen, to whom I have referred, were of opinion that it prohibited such movement of the Native Indian troops, would they on that very ground have opposed the clause proposed by Mr. Gladstone?

It would be absurd to have had the discussions to which I have alluded if that were so. Well, my Lords, that being the history of this clause and its wording, I confess I am surprised that at this time of day, 20 years after it has passed, it should be gravely maintained that all the care and pains taken to alter and modify the 55th clause in its original form went for nothing, and that the clause in its present form produces just the same effect which would have been produced by the clause which was removed from the Bill.

My noble and learned Friend endeavoured to produce in the minds of your Lordships the impression that there was something in the Mutiny Act which in some way affected the Native Army of India. The fact is, that the words to which my noble and learned Friend alluded do not refer to the Native Indian Army in any way. They refer to Her Majesty's European Army—the White Army—serving in India, and there is nothing in the Act which refers to the Native Indian Army. The argument from the Mutiny Act requires a very short examination, and it will turn out to be as baseless as that founded on the Indian Government Act. But first, let me remind your Lordships of the point in the discussion at which we have arrived. I have shown your Lordships that the Native Indian Army are Forces of the Queen, and being so the Crown, prima facie, has an absolute right to move them wherever the Sovereign may think fit. Those who say that that right is limited must show that it is so. I have shown to your Lordships that it is not limited by the terms of enlistment or by Code of Discipline; that, so far as precedents are concerned, there are numerous precedents for the employment of those troops out of India without any objection having been taken as to the legality of that step. I have shown that an Act in force for 40 years up to 1848 contemplated the employment of Native Indian troops out of India; and now the only question is, whether the whole of this body of evidence and proof is to be contravened by a few words of recital in the commencement of the Mutiny Act.

My Lords, in order to understand the effect and object of this recital, I would ask your Lordships to remember what was the position of the various Armies in India before and since 1858.

Before 1858 there were three different classes of Forces in India—the Regular Army of the Queen—next, the European troops kept up by the East India Company—and there were, thirdly, the Native troops of the East Indian Company. There were these three sets of Forces. How were those Forces dealt with by the Mutiny Acts? With regard to the Queen's regiments serving in India, they were subject to the annual British Mutiny Act just as much as if they served in England. With regard to the European White troops of the East Indian Company, they were subject to a Mutiny Act of their own. That was not annual, it was perpetual, and it was passed by the Imperial Parliament. With regard to the Native Indian Forces, they were subject to an Act of the Indian Legislature, made under the Imperial authority, as I have already pointed out. There were, then, three different sets of Forces, and three different Mutiny Acts. Now, the Act of 1858 provided that the two sets of Indian Forces should become the Forces of the Queen; and the consequence was, since the Act of 1858, we had, at first, three separate Forces belonging to the Crown—the British regiments, the White troops formerly belonging to the East India Company, and the Native troops. That state of things continued until 1863, and then an Act was passed bringing the European Forces, formerly belonging to the East India Company, under the annual Mutiny Act. That Act, in the Preamble stated—

“It is expedient that Her Majesty's European Forces in India should from henceforth be subject to the Acts for the punishment of Mutiny and Desertion, from time to time, passed for the government of Her Majesty's General Forces.”

But that Act expressly declared that it was not in any way to affect the Native troops of the Crown in India. They were to continue under their own Mutiny Act and Articles of War. The European Forces, therefore, and the European Forces only, in India, are within the Annual Mutiny Act.

Now, my noble and learned Friend takes out of the Preamble of the Mutiny Act these words, “exclusive of the numbers actually serving in Her Majesty's Indian Possessions,” and he first assumes that these words refer to the Native Indian troops, and he then founds on this assumption the argument that the Native Indian troops must serve within

India and nowhere else; and that if they go beyond that it is a departure from the Mutiny Act. Well, that depends on the great question—what troops are meant by the words “exclusive of the numbers actually serving?” for if those words do not refer to the Native Indian troops, the argument of my noble and learned Friend falls to the ground.

My Lords, the words which my noble and learned Friend relies do not touch, and are not meant to touch, the Native troops. The Native troops are not brought within our Mutiny Act in any way. That is made clear from the clause which enacts—

“Nothing in this Act contained shall in any manner prejudice or affect any Articles of War or other matters made, enacted, or in force, or which may hereafter be made, enacted, or in force, under the authority of the Government of India, respecting officers or soldiers or followers in Her Majesty’s Indian Army, being natives of India.”

On the other hand, the European Forces in India are within the Act, but the men are not to be reckoned numerically, unless they are at the depôts in the United Kingdom. If your Lordships will read the Preamble with this key to its meaning, all difficulty will at once disappear. The Preamble runs—

“Whereas it is adjudged necessary that a body of Forces should be continued for the safety of the United Kingdom, and the defence of the Possessions of Her Majesty’s Crown, and that the whole number of such Forces should consist of 135,452 men, including those to be employed at the depôts in the United Kingdom for the training of recruits for service at home and abroad, but exclusive of the numbers actually serving within Her Majesty’s Indian Possessions.”

Therefore, the meaning of the words which have caused my noble and learned Friend difficulty is perfectly clear. The Act is not to apply to the Native Indian regiments—the recital is to include those officers and men of the European Army of India who are employed in depôts in England and Ireland, and to exclude the number actually employed within Her Majesty’s Indian Possessions.

But that this is the meaning of the meaning of the recital can be shown to demonstration. The noble and learned Lord has, in his Motion, properly spoken of the Vote recited in the Preamble to the Mutiny Act. I turn in the Estimates to the Vote, and you will find on one side it runs thus:—“The number of men, Regular Army, exclusive of India;” and, on the other side,

The Lord Chancellor

“the number of men of the Regular Army serving in India.” Of course, therefore, “exclusive of India” means “exclusive of the number of men of the Regular Army serving in India,” and the Regular Army throughout the Estimates means the Queen’s European Army. The number of the European Army serving in India at the present time is about 62,000, and of the Native Army 125,000. It is a case of one-third and two-thirds. We have a Vote for the number of men, 135,452—that is the exact number provided for in the Mutiny Act; and then you have those serving in India set down as 62,650, which is the number of the White European Army, and not the number of the Native Army. Therefore, those who are excluded, and by the very word of your own Vote are excluded, from the enumeration of the Mutiny Act, are the 62,650, and are not the Native Army. My Lords, the case is thus brought to this simple point. Nothing can be shown which in any way fetters the legal and Constitutional power of the Crown to move the Indian Army anywhere except it may be the United Kingdom. The expense must, of course, be provided by Parliament, and this, which is the Constitutional check, is, at the same time, the only check on the Constitutional right of the Crown. How can that right be affected by the recital in the Mutiny Act, which does not relate to the Indian Army at all? This is the whole of this case.

My Lords, I agree with my noble and learned Friend that there is a very great difference between questions of substance and questions of form. But, my Lords, if the action of a Government cannot be challenged on a matter of substance, I think great care should be taken that misapprehension is not produced by challenging it on a question of form. If the noble and learned Lord had entertained the opinion that Her Majesty’s Government had been chargeable with any error of judgment, with pursuing an erroneous and mistaken policy, as a matter of policy, in moving these Indian troops to Malta, under all the circumstances of the case, that question might have been raised before this House by a proper Motion on the subject. Nay, more, if it had been the opinion of the Opposition that the policy of the Government was erroneous, I maintain it was their duty, as I understand the duty of public men, to have challenged that policy and to have asked the House to condemn, in substance and not in form, what the Government had done. But, my Lords, I also maintain that where, in the present state of Foreign affairs, arguments in the English Parliament on questions of form may easily be mistaken abroad for arguments on questions of substance, you ought, before you challenge on a question of form, to be quite clear that your form is right. I maintain there is no foundation whatever for the proposition which my noble and learned Friend has placed on the Paper to-night. I believe that, as to the substance of the case, Parliament will justify the policy of the Government; I am quite satisfied it is justified by the country at large. The question of form I leave to your Lordships' decision; without fear or apprehension I maintain that criticism on the form is entirely misplaced.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL said, he certainly understood the noble and learned Lord who introduced the Motion to make a substantial charge against the Government, when he said that they violated the express terms of the Act of 1858 when they moved Indian troops out of India without the assent of Parliament, and without having made any provision out of the Imperial Revenue for meeting that expenditure. The Act of 1858 prohibited the application of the Revenues of India to the expenses of any military operation beyond the frontiers of India without the consent of both Houses of Parliament; and the argument of his noble and learned Friend was that the action of the Government in ordering the Indian troops beyond the frontiers of India without having obtained any authority from Parliament for the application either of European or of Indian money for the expenditure, was either a violation of that Act, or an infringement of the Constitutional principles of our own Government. But the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack had discovered what he described in grandiloquent terms as a most serious, a most unprecedented breach of all Constitutional propriety on the part of the late Administration—of that Department of it for which he (Viscount Cardwell) was especially responsible. His noble and learned Friend imagined he had discovered that, although he (Viscount Cardwell) had obtained from the House of Commons, in the regular manner, a Vote for 20,000 men, and a separate Vote for the money, on the outbreak of the Franco-German War, yet the consent of Parliament had never been given, inasmuch as no communication had been made to their Lordships—not even in the Appropriation Act.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the Appropriation Bill sanctioned the Vote of Credit for £2,000,000, but it did not say that the money was for the purpose of raising 20,000 additional troops. The only reference to the purpose of the Vote was in the Schedule.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL said, that the reference in the Schedule of the Appropriation Act was of the utmost importance, and since this charge was so serious and so specific, their Lordships would excuse him if he read to them the words of the Schedule from the volume of the Statutes, which he found in the Library of the House. The words he found were these—

“Towards defraying the expenses beyond the ordinary grants of Parliament which may be incurred in maintaining the Naval and Military Services of this Kingdom, including the cost of a further number of Land Forces of 20,000 men during the war in Europe.”

He had asked for the Votes in the House of Commons on the 1st of August, 1870, and the Bill, with their Lordships' consent, had received the Royal Assent upon the 10th. While he was vindicating himself in this matter, he might do so in another—the exercise of the Royal Prerogative in the abolition of Purchase—which he had been privately informed it was probable he might hear of in the course of the debate. He had been charged with having transgressed the law and Constitution when he advised the use of the Royal Prerogative in the case of the abolition of Purchase in the Army. But the facts were these. On going to the War Office at the end of 1868, he found that his Predecessor had obtained the sanction of Her Majesty to the abolition of the rank of cornet and ensign in the Army, without making any provision for the cost of so doing; and, therefore, he (Viscount Cardwell) submitted to the House of Commons an Estimate for the money necessary to furnish the regulation price of the commissions. He could not offer more than the regulation price, traffic in commissions being forbidden by the Act of 1809. There was great alarm at the proposal, as involving the whole principle of the over-regulation prices, and a great deal more than the regulation price was demanded. He therefore referred the whole subject to a Commission composed of very eminent men. The Commission reported in substance that the sale of commissions had obtained such general sanction that the prohibition could not rightly be enforced without full compensation; and that while regulation prices were permitted, it was impossible that the statutory prohibition of over-regulation prices should be obeyed. He then asked Parliament for money to indemnify the officers and abolish the whole system of Purchase. The House of Commons adopted his proposal; but their Lordships delayed the Bill. He was therefore obliged to recognize the continuance of the system which a most stringent Statute had prohibited and the other House had provided the means to abolish, or to resort to the exercise of the Royal power, so far as to put an end to the regulations permitting Purchase on the specified terms; but, in adopting the latter course, he had no notion of enlarging the Prerogative of the Crown, or of showing any disrespect to their Lordships' House. He was surprised to hear his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack begin his speech by replying, not to the able speech by which the debate had been opened by his noble and learned Friend near him, but by replying to a speech which he supposed to have been made by a noble Marquess in the other House. The opening speech of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Selborne), to which he had listened with admiration, was described by the noble and learned Lord as "overloaded" and "irrelevant," and as dealing with matters that were either "misapprehended" or "perverted;" but no attempt had been made to justify that description. He thought, indeed, that he would have found it difficult to have replied to the speech of his noble and learned Friend, who did not question the policy of moving troops from India, but treated the mode by which the Government had done it as a question of Constitutional law of the first magnitude. He (Viscount Cardwell) thought it most desirable to keep the question of Constitutional law and right, which was one of the greatest magnitude and importance, entirely separate from those of mere personal or Party interest. His noble and learned Friend, in keeping apart the great Constitutional question from all the small and unworthy interests which were capable of being associated with it, had performed one of the greatest services he could have rendered to the country. The question of Constitutional policy had been entirely lost sight of by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. Reference had been made to what had taken place in 1775, and a large portion of the noble and learned Lord's observations were in answer to arguments that might have been used in 1775, but which had not been used at the present time. He hoped, after what had been said by his noble and learned Friend (Lord Selborne) on that subject, they would hear no more of it. With reference to the Report of the Committee of 1867, he thought the long list of precedents which had been read by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack contained scarcely one that happened while the Indian Army was under the Crown—his criticism, therefore, was entirely irrelevant. He agreed with the doctrine laid down by General Peel. What he understood was this, that the limitation of the number of men was necessary to the efficient control of Parliament; but that it was not sufficient to take merely a subsequent power of repaying the money. Every year both the men and the money must be voted. Vote A accordingly was the general Vote, and Vote B included the numbers of Indian troops; but these did not go into the Mutiny Act. Now, if these Indian troops had been voted under Vote B, and the Vote of Credit placed in the Appropriation Act, the old Constitutional practice would have been restored; but under the course pursued by the Government, the number of men would not have the sanction of Parliament at all. The question now was not a question of policy, but a question of whether the prior consent of Parliament was necessary or not. He understood that was not disputed by the Government. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack quoted the doctrine of emergency, and cited the authority of Mr. Gladstone, that the Government which did not take on itself the responsibility of acting in an emergency independent of Parliament, applying afterwards for indemnity from Parliament, would not be worthy of the country. He quite agreed with that sentiment of Mr. Gladstone's. The Government admitted that they could not employ troops without the previous sanction of Parliament, if it were possible to obtain it, and that whenever they were compelled to employ them without the previous sanction of Parliament the solemn obligation lay on them to obtain that sanction at as early a moment as possible. After such an acknowledgment, he must say the object of his noble and learned Friend in initiating this discussion had been obtained.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK said, it was to be regretted that upon a question involving an important and interesting point of Constitutional law, two of the greatest legal authorities in that House should entertain diametrically opposite opinions. The discussion had taken the aspect of a mere intellectual contest, in which the two noble and learned Lords contended for the mastery in technical learning. If this question was to be raised at all, it should have been with some prospect of producing some deep and clear impression upon public opinion, and of exercising some salutary influence upon the policy of Her Majesty's Government. From the beginning, however, it had seemed to him, there was very little prospect of such a result being attained. The noble and learned Lord seemed to have overlooked that it was in the highest degree improbable that Her Majesty's Government would have taken such a step without having obtained from the highest authorities the assurance that it was in accordance with Constitutional law. Had it been otherwise, would not the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack have employed all his legal knowledge and learning to prevent it? And was it not likely that the public would attach the greater weight to an opinion given with all the responsibility of official position? There was another consideration. They were all aware that, on several occasions, the authorities in India had sanctioned the employment of Indian troops in the Colonies of the Crown, and the legality of that course had never, so far as he was aware, been seriously questioned, either in England or India. Within his recollection, and within the period of his official employment in India, the Madras troops were regularly employed out of India, under the sanction of the Government of India, with the assent of the Local Government, and, it must be assumed, of the Government at home. A Madras regiment was despatched to Hong Kong in 1867-8, and some Madras regiments had been stationed in the Straits Settlements for many years; and after the Settlement was transferred to the Colonial Office in 1867, one Madras regiment still continued to garrison it. He had not gathered from the discussion a single argument to show that the employment of Indian troops, being legal in the East, would be illegal in Europe. He thought it a most lamentable thing that at a time when the people of India were animated by the most loyal and devoted sentiments to the Crown—when the Indian troops were burning with a desire to consummate their reconciliation and union with their British fellow-subjects—and when the people of Malta were about to give a most kindly and confiding welcome to their strange guests and new defenders—a noble and learned Lord, adorned with every ornament of learning and eloquence, should have suggested to the Indian soldier that he might possibly commit, and to the Colonial subjects of Her Majesty that they might possibly suffer, an illegal act.

THE DUKE OF RUTLAND said, that though he could not offer a single observation on the Constitutional and legal aspect of the question, he might be allowed to express his deep and unfeigned regret that their Lordships' House and the House of Commons should have received at the hands of the Government what seemed to be a very great slight. Her Majesty's Government, on the 27th of March, came to the conclusion that Indian troops were to be utilized; on the 28th of March, his noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) resigned; on the 12th of April, Her Majesty's Government telegraphed that transports should be sent to India to bring Indian troops to Malta; on the 16th of April, the Governor General announced the number of troops that would be sent; and on the 16th of April, also, Parliament was adjourned. Now, it seemed to him that if ever there was a question which, independent of its Constitutional aspect, ought to have been submitted to Parliament, this was that question. It was a totally new question. Indian troops had never before been sent from India to Malta. Not only was the question a new one, but it was raised in a time of peace, and the step taken was a threatening of war. He wanted to know why Parliament was called together three weeks before the usual time—to the great inconvenience of the Members of their Lordships' House, as he knew, and to the great inconvenience of many Members of the other House—if it were to be kept in the dark upon this important matter? What was the reason?—what the object?—what the excuse? Why did not the Government, in the case of a great emergency—at a great crisis—resort to the advice and assistance of Parliament? He could answer that question, and if he was wrong, the Government would contradict him. It was because, if it had been known before the Recess that these troops were to be sent to Malta, the movement of troops might have been arrested, all the doubts pointed out, serious difficulties might have arisen, and the hands of the Government might have been impeded. Yes; but why was Parliament called together, except to discuss a question of this nature? The noble Viscount, who lately addressed the House, alluded to the Abolition of Purchase Bill. That Bill they were invited in the Queen's Speech of 1871 to consider. They did consider it for three nights, and at 2 o'clock of the morning of the third night, they decided to send it before a Royal Commission by a majority of 25. The next day their decision was overridden by Royal Proclamation. He was quite sure the noble Viscount meant no slight to their Lordships' House; but it added to his alarm at the encroachment, in the present case, of the Executive upon the functions of Parliament. He protested against this conduct of the Government, as an encroachment by the Executive upon the functions of Parliament.

LORD DENMAN said, that he could not be persuaded that the previous consent of Parliament was needed for the step which the Government had taken. He would apply to the present Members of it words used by an eminent diplomatist, in 1775, in a letter—

"There is an old French author, the Duc de Rohan, who writes about the principles of government, and says of that of England—'La constitution d'Angleterre est une grande bête qui ne saurait mourir si elle ne se tue pas elle-même.' Now, that is precisely what I could have said in six sheets of paper, and not more clearly. England will not be felo de se now. I trust in Providence, and in the manly principles

It had been said by a great authority—as was truly or falsely reported—that England was like a great whale, which could only fight on sea; and it was necessary, in the present emergency, that troops should be ready in case, unfortunately, "force" should be needed instead of "diplomacy."

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, before the debate closes, I must express my surprise that no one Member of the Government should have thought it necessary to say one word on the appeal made to them by the noble Duke behind them, who is one of the most consistent Conservatives in the House. The noble Duke, with great clearness, appealed to the Bench below him to give an explanation as to why it was that the proposed movement of troops had been kept secret from Parliament. So far as my experience goes, I do not remember an occasion on which Parliament has been treated so cavalierly as both Houses have been treated on the present occasion. It is perfectly true that on the day fixed for the Adjournment, I said I was quite sure Her Majesty's Government would inform the House whether it had any further information to communicate to Parliament on the subject of the Eastern Question; and we know that in "another place" a still more important Question was put; yet we know that not the slightest information was imparted on this most important subject. I do trust that the Government will condescend to give us some information on this particular point. We have to thank the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack for the very interesting sermon or lecture he has given us this evening. He complained very much of my Friend the noble and learned Lord—who, on this great Constitutional point, has given us one of the most complete and exhaustive speeches I ever heard in this House—for the great length at which he had addressed your Lordships, and then the noble and learned Lord himself proceeded to speak at still greater length than my noble and learned Friend; but he did not touch upon some of the most important precedents and arguments which have been brought forward, and without attempting to answer some of his most cogent arguments. The noble and learned Lord admonished my noble and learned Friend to be more accurate in his historical references—an admonition which I should think the noble and learned Lord was the last to require. The noble and learned Lord himself committed an error in the information he has given us respecting the Appropriation Act; but when he came to the debate of 1775, referred to by my noble and learned Friend, and whose reference to it he pooh-poohed, he certainly in what he said bears out my recollection of what was said by Lord Chancellor Bathurst, who, according to the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, was only talking paradoxically. He concluded in this manner—that the King had no right to maintain in any part of the Possessions of the British Crown any other than the troops agreed to by Parliament, both as to the number and also as to nations. The previous consent of Parliament is one of the most important points of Constitutional law, and I cannot conceive why Her Majesty's Government did not come to Parliament and state what they had decided upon. The whole character of the demonstrations made by the Government appear to me to have been of an ostentatious character. The bringing of these men to Malta is an act of that kind, and the secrecy with which the movement was shrouded seems to have been confined only to this country, and especially to Parliament, as it appears to have been known in India. If there had been any immediate probability of war, and that the Russian Government might have been able to prevent moving these troops to the spot, there might have been some excuse for this policy of secrecy; but nothing of the kind existed. It has been said that if the intention of the Government to bring these troops to Malta had been known in India, the rates of freight would have been enormously increased; but I have been told that if the wants of the Government had been known, the competition which would have ensued would have made the freights much cheaper. Therefore, I am still at a loss to know why the information was not given. And I must say that I utterly object to the way the noble and learned Lord has laid down as a fundamental Constitutional principle, that it does not signify what is kept from Parliament if the Government afterwards explains the course it has taken, and obtains its sanction—a sanction which, in 99 cases out of 100, Parliament could not refuse. I do not deny that there may be cases in which a Government would be perfectly right to take a certain course without consulting Parliament, and in keeping it secret if it were necessary to do so; but no such necessity existed in this case. We are not in a state of war; and it would have been not only Constitutional but a wise and prudent thing for Government to take Parliament into its confidence, and in a Constitutional manner obtain its consent beforehand. The clause moved by the late Lord Derby in the Government of India Act, to prevent the Revenues of India being employed for the movement of troops outside the boundaries of India, was not intended to authorize the Revenues to be so employed, provided the Indian Exchequer was recouped. In fact, you break the law, when you make the Indian Revenue supply the means of moving troops on the chance of getting Parliament to repay the money. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, instead of answering the precedents of my noble and learned Friend, gave us precedents of his own. My noble and learned Friend, at the opening of his speech, stated distinctly that his propositions and illustrations would be entirely separate from cases in which we were in a state of war, or when Parliament was not sitting; but nearly the whole of the precedents quoted by the noble and learned Lord were connected with a state of war, and referred not to the Imperial Army, but to that of the Company—which is a perfectly different thing. The noble and learned Lord, at the beginning of his speech, said the subject was a very fit one to bring before the House; but, at its conclusion, he made it a reproach against my noble and learned Friend, that he should bring forward what he described to be a mere question of form, instead of proposing a direct Vote of Censure. We are continually challenged to bring forward Votes of Censure, and to divide upon them. It is one of the advantages of this House that we can discuss questions without Motions of a character hostile to the Government; but these continual challenges remind me of the old quotation—“Fas est et ab hoste doceri,” and I think that the meaning of the poet was not so much that we should follow the advice of our opponents, but copy their example. Noble Lords in this House and right hon. Gentlemen in the other House, when they were in Opposition, made perpetual attacks upon the Government; but they abstained, and very wisely abstained, from Motions or divisions, and I prefer now to follow their example than their advice in this matter. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack spoke somewhat disparagingly of forms, and there is an opinion prevalent in some quarters that these Constitutional checks are obsolete things; but I think it most unwise to allow unconstitutional precedents to be created without some sort of remonstrance against what might prove mischievous, or even disastrous, if evil days should come. Such checks ought not, in this House, to be treated as mere forms. I remember hearing the late Lord Derby say—

“We live not in times when Lords and Commons have to protect themselves against the arbitrary power of the Crown—those days have long passed, and the Prerogative of doing that which is beside and beyond the law is not now vested in the person of the Sovereign, but in the responsible Advisers of the Crown. It was their duty now to see, therefore, that the power should not only be legally exercised, but also that it should not be stretched to an unconstitutional extent.”

That I think sound and Constitutional doctrine, and much safer than that put forward by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. I am glad this discussion has taken place. I hope that its result may be to make Her Majesty's Ministers more thoughtful in matters of this sort, and then the discussion of to-night will not have been without value and importance.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: My Lords, the noble Earl who has just spoken (Earl Granville) has rebuked us for not having answered a Question put by the noble Duke who sits behind me. The Question is one which everyone has been asking for a considerable time. If a Question which is frequently put is not answered, it may be taken that there is some good reason for silence on the part of those to whom the Question is addressed. I shall not take refuge in any technical reasons that I might give for the silence which has been complained of; but will say at once, that I do not think it would be for the advantage of the public service that the Question suggested by the noble Duke and referred to by the noble Earl, should be answered. As to not making communications to Parliament, this House, I think, was not sitting when the resolution of the Government was arrived at, and the resolution of the Government, I think, was only arrived at four days before the other House adjourned for the Recess.

EARL GRANVILLE: This House adjourned on the same day.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: However that may be, my answer to the noble Duke and the noble Earl is, that I did not think it was for the public advantage that that communication should be made. Unfortunately, we are obliged on this subject to speak with a seal upon our lips. I shall not enter upon the legal and technical discussion which has been raised this evening. If a debate had been commenced, in which the general policy of the Government was challenged, we should have been ready to enter upon the discussion with perfect fulness—in that case, we should have been quite prepared to vindicate the course we had adopted—though, possibly, we must have spoken under some disadvantage. We found, however, that the question to be raised was of a very different character, and that noble Lords opposite were to studiously avoid expressing any opinion of their own, or asking any from your Lordships' House upon the proceedings of Her Majesty's Government. I must decline, in these circumstances, to explain the conduct of Her Majesty's Government with respect to the movement of the Native Forces of Her Majesty from India to Malta. I shall be ready, my Lords, at the right time, and so also will my Colleagues be ready, and that without hesitation, to enter upon any discussion your Lordships' House may require on this matter; and I have sufficient confidence in the patriotism of this House to feel no doubt that the result of any such discussion will not be to the disadvantage of Her Majesty's Government. The noble Earl who has just addressed your Lordships (Earl Granville) has sketched the more important parts of the speeches delivered by the noble and learned Lord who introduced this discussion, and of my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack. I myself listened to both those speeches with instruction, and certainly with pleasure.

Earl Granville

At the same time, I have a right to form an opinion as to those speeches as well as the noble Earl, and I must say that the shield was on one side silver, and on the other golden; but it seems to me that our side was the more precious metal. It appeared to me that the noble and learned Lord who introduced the question (Lord Selborne) most ingeniously treated a variety of subjects which have for a long time now been under public discussion. I must, with all humility, observe, that there was nothing very novel in the noble and learned Lord's materials, nor was there anything eminently felicitous in his treatment of them. My noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack met the charge of the noble and learned Lord in a bold and complete manner, and demonstrated that the batteries which the noble and learned Lord had attempted to raise against the Government were powerless, and that for the attack he made there was really no foundation whatever. It appeared to me that the noble and learned Lord, in a most laboured manner, discovered—if I may use so unclassical a word in this Assembly—only a mare's nest. What were the only arguments used in a speech of two hours, and which was answered in a speech of equal length?—not longer, for I particularly watched the time of each—it showed a great knowledge of each other's powers that the orations should have balanced so exactly. Two arguments were urged by the noble and learned Lord, which I must say have been urged before, but urged to-night, of course, with the greatest ability of which they were susceptible. The first was this—You have no right whatever to move Her Majesty's Native Forces from India to Malta; the second was, you have not only no right to do that, but you have no right to call upon India to bear the expense of such movement. These were the two great points—one point for each hour. Now, my Lords, let us see how the matter stands. We entirely dispute the first proposition. The noble Earl who has just sat down says—"I object to your conduct, and I object to it on this broad ground, that you had no right to move those troops from India without the consent of Parliament." In fact, the noble Earl recommended to our consideration to-night that very unfortunate Amendment of Mr. Gladstone's which has been referred to, and which, at the time it was submitted, he opposed with so much energy and dignity in this House. Well, the noble and learned Lord bases this first point upon the Mutiny Act. My Lords, we entirely dispute his interpretation. We maintain that there is no reference whatever to Native Indian troops in the Mutiny Act. The Mutiny Act does not refer to Native Indian troops, and, therefore, the charge against the Government is one which cannot hold. On the other hand, we say that we have a perfect right to advise Her Majesty to exercise Her undoubted Prerogative, and that, under that advice, She may command Her Native Indian Army to occupy Malta or any other place to which Her responsible Ministers advise Her that, owing to public necessity and for the public advantage, they should go. Well, my Lords, what is the next point of the noble and learned Lord. He says—"You have no right to fasten this expenditure upon the Revenues of India." Well, we are not going to fasten this expenditure upon the Revenues of India. The noble and learned Lord admits that, virtually speaking, we do not intend it; but, practically speaking, he says there is an expenditure immediately incurred in transactions of this kind, and it is to the Indian Treasury that you look—it is the Indian Treasury that you have already drawn upon and appealed to in order to carry on the expenditure, and you have no right to get out of the difficulty by saying that it is your intention to introduce a Supplementary Estimate into the other House of Parliament at the first convenient opportunity. I ask, in what way can we really comply with our engagements to this country and to the Indian Treasury, but in the manner which is now proposed to be followed by the Government? The noble and learned Lord, who has been a Minister of the Crown, must know very well that the accounts between England and India are of a very considerable character. They have this peculiarity, I believe—namely that the Debt of the Indian Treasury to the Treasury of England is generally very large, and thus far, if even for two or three months, the Supplementary Estimates were not carried in Parliament, still the Indian Treasury would be perfectly safe, because it would probably owe that of England a much larger sum. The noble and learned Lord, in working his two points, dwelt very much upon one precedent—the Abyssinian Expedition—and, although he treated that precedent with dexterity, I do not think he did so with that ingenuousness which distinguishes his character. The noble and learned Lord showed by various documents—by researches which no one disputes—that there were considerable advances made at that time by the Indian Treasury, and says that those advances were illegal; but the noble and learned Lord chose to forget that at the time no one in the other House of Parliament, where, from its financial character, the question must have been brought forward, nor in this House, so far as my knowledge or recollection guides me, disputed the authority of the Crown to employ the Native Indian troops of Her Majesty on that Expedition. The question which was raised was of a financial character; but the noble and learned Lord avoided reminding your Lordships that the question as to the movement of the Indian troops beyond the boundaries of India was not in the course of those discussions for a moment referred to. That, my Lords, is my answer to the two great points of the speech of the noble and learned Lord. I maintain, and those who act with me maintain, that there is no allusion to the Native Indian Army in the Mutiny Act—that that Act refers to the European—the White troops—of Her Majesty, and not to the Native Indian Army. I cannot believe that anyone who has listened to my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack can have a doubt that the opposite conclusion could not be successfully asserted. There, then, is an end of one of the great bases on which the question urged by the noble and learned Lord was founded. And, with regard to the other—namely, the illegality of the Indian Treasury bearing for the moment certain expenditure, I think your Lordships must feel that, under the circumstances, that was really trifling with the question. The noble and learned Lord could not have flattered himself that he was establishing the fact as against Her Majesty's Government that they did not intend that the expenditure should be repaid to the Indian Treasury. We have heard the noble and learned Lord opposite, and my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack indulge in a great gladiatorial duel. We have had the pleasure of witnessing that between two of our most eminent Members. I can only say we are perfectly satisfied with the discussion—except that we would have preferred either silence, or a fair outspoken issue. I do not think that discussions like the present at this moment are to the public advantage. If the noble and learned Lord who introduced this question (Lord Selborne) believed that we have acted contrary to the Constitution, he ought to act up to his tall phrases—he should have come forward and declared his belief that our action was unconstitutional, and that it was his duty to ask the opinion of Parliament upon it. The noble Earl who last spoke said they did not do that because they would not like being in a minority. But you will never be in a majority if your nerves are so delicate. You must assert your opinions without fear; and, if they are just, and true, and right, you will ultimately be supported by the country. But at this moment I do not think they are just, or true, or right; or, rather, I would say—although it has been said so often it may be repeated—that what is true is not new, and what is new is not true. That is my general view of the speech of the noble and learned Lord. It has given us an opportunity of hearing my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack make a completely exhaustive discourse on this subject, and I hope to-morrow the moral and beneficial effects of this discussion will be felt not only in this House, but in the country. I must for a moment revert to what I can assure the House I would like to have passed—for I wish to regard matters of this kind with not too serious a feeling. I have expressed my regret that this discussion should have arisen at this particular moment. My lips are shut. I should like, of course—and all my Colleagues would, I am sure, like—if we could come forward and do that which we should be prepared and glad to do—to vindicate our policy and give our reasons, which I hope would be satisfactory to the country, for all the measures that we have recommended and introduced. We have been animated by one feeling throughout this business, which sustains and, I hope, inspires us at present, and that is to secure the blessings of peace, and to maintain the freedom of Europe and the just position of this country. We are striving at this moment to attain those results. But it is impossible at this particular moment to meet discussions and attacks of this kind, and vindicate our conduct, without our having to make statements and enter into arguments and details which might be prejudicial to those great objects which not only ourselves, but I am sure equally the noble Lords opposite, must desire to accomplish and achieve. I would willingly take no part in the discussion to-night, but the noble Earl opposite challenged me to rise, and he is a knight to whom one owes every courtesy. Therefore it is that I make these few remarks in this discussion; and, in answer to the noble Duke who spoke behind me (the Duke of Rutland), he may urge the question again and again in this House, but until the time arrives when we can enter into a complete vindication of our policy, all I shall answer is—what we have done we have done with the belief that it was done for the public service; and, though you may condemn us, we will remain silent under the accusation, sooner than vindicate our conduct by injuring the public we are bound to serve.

House adjourned at half past Ten o'clock,
till To-morrow, half past
Ten o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

MILITARY AND NAVAL EXPENDITURE.

QUESTION.

MR. RYLANDS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, What is the estimated monthly charge at the present time for Army and Navy Services in excess of the provision in the Army and Navy Estimates, taking into account the cost of calling up the Reserves, of the additional ships in commission, of the war at the Cape, &c., but exclusive of the cost of the troops on their way from India to Malta, for which an Estimate is to be presented; and, when Supplementary Estimates for this excess will be laid before the House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I understand the hon. Member to ask what is the estimated monthly charge for Army and Navy Services, exclusive of the cost of troops coming from India to Malta? The Supplementary Estimate, with regard to those troops, will, I hope, in the course of a few days, be laid on the Table. With respect to the other Question, it is a little difficult to form, at the present moment, any very clear estimate; but I have endeavoured to obtain from my two right hon. Friends the best information they can give me. I find that from the War Office it is said that the cost of calling out the Reserves may be taken at about £140,000 per month, including the separation allowances. As to the war at the Cape, the Imperial cost is £5,000, and the Colonial cost about £20,000 a-month. These amounts can only be approximate. Many of the charges will be terminable and will not continue at so much per month. It would be difficult to take a Supplementary Estimate other than for the Indian Force until somewhat later in the financial year, when we can see what our position is. With regard to the Naval Services, my right hon. Friend gives me a calculation showing a monthly expenditure on extra ships in commission, the cost of pensioners, wages in the Dockyards, the cost of stores, the coals for the Mediterranean, extra freight, and so forth, running up to a total of somewhat less than £50,000 per month, which, with about £10,000 for contingencies, will make, perhaps, £60,000 per month. That is the information as we have it at present; but it would hardly be desirable to lay on the Table Supplementary Estimates for these expenses until a little later—perhaps at Whitsuntide—when we can see what our position is. The Indian Estimate, as I have stated, will be laid on the Table in the course of a few days.

CRETE.—QUESTION.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether Her Majesty's Government will use their good offices to secure an armistice between the Turkish forces and the insurgents in Crete, in view of the fact that otherwise the forces liberated by the armistice just concluded in Thessaly, owing to the efforts of the British Government, will be employed to crush the Cretans?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Yes, Sir; Her Majesty's Government have been, and are now, using their good offices for that object.

CHARGE OF ARSON.—QUESTION.

MR. ISAAC asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true that eight boys, of thirteen, twelve, and ten years of age, were arrested by the Police between midnight and the morning of Wednesday last at Moulton, Mid-Cheshire, and lodged in the lock-up of Northwich on a charge of arson; whether the case was adjourned, bail refused, and these children locked up for the night; whether, on the case being heard, the Magistrates, without hearing the solicitor for the defence, discharged the boys, saying—

“He did not think there was any case. He did not see any evidence to bring the charge home to the boys. It was not even proved that they were in the building;”

if it is true that five of the boys attended the National School at Davenham, and, consequent on this arrest, were absent from the Government inspection, one of the boys having to receive a prize for good conduct; and, whether he will direct measures to be taken to prevent the Police in this district in future from taking young children from their beds during the night without sufficient evidence to warrant such action?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he thought the facts were truly stated in the Question. He had no control over the county police; but the matter had already been taken in hand by the local authorities, and the police cautioned to be more careful in future. At the same time, he was bound to say that when those boys were brought before the magistrates, evidence was given that they had been seen playing about the building together with a match-box in their possession.

ORDNANCE SURVEY.—QUESTION.

MR. WILLIAMS WYNN asked the First Commissioner of Works, If he is aware that there is no more recent Ordnance Survey of the county of Montgomery than that on the original 1-inch scale, published nearly 50 years ago, and now quite incorrect as to roads, &c.; if he would state why the 6-inch survey of Denbighshire, the triangulations for which actually extended into Montgomeryshire, was not continued over the whole of the latter county; and, if he can hold out any hopes of its being so extended; and, what prospect he can hold out of the publication of the portions of the 6-inch survey of the counties of Denbigh and Flint, which it is understood are already completed?

MR. GERARD NOEL, in reply, said, there was no more recent Ordnance Survey of the county of Montgomery than that which was made about 45 years ago, and it could hardly now be so accurate as might be desired. It had been decided to survey the counties of Denbigh and Flint because of their rich mineral products, and in order to carry that out a portion of Montgomeryshire was to be surveyed.

CONTRACTS FOR WATERING THE STREETS.—QUESTION.

MR. BECKETT-DENISON asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, If he will lay upon the Table of the House Copies of the Contracts for Watering and Scavengering the streets for 1878, entered into by the under-mentioned Vestries and District Boards—1. Saint James, Westminster; 2. Westminster District; 3. Strand District; 4. Saint Giles District; 5. Holborn District; 6. Saint George, Hanover Square; 7. Saint Marylebone; 8. Paddington; 9. Kensington; 10. Fulham; 11. Chelsea?

SIR JAMES M'GAREL - HOGG: I should be very glad to comply with the wishes of the hon. Member if it were in my power; but I have no exclusive information, in virtue of the office which I hold, respecting the contracts entered into by the vestries and district boards, and I must refer him to the vestry clerks of the parishes mentioned in his Question. If I can render him any assistance in obtaining the information from those gentlemen, I shall be happy to do so.

LOCOMOTIVE ACCIDENT NEAR LEEDS. QUESTION.

MR. BARRAN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to a serious injury that was done on the 11th instant to an old woman, seventy-five years of age, by a locomotive engine on Hunslet Moor, near Leeds, whilst walking on the footpath alongside a tramway which is laid down across the Moor from the Middleton Collieries; whether he is aware that the tramway in question is traversed by locomotives without Parliamentary sanction, and is so unguarded and uncontrolled as to be dangerous to the numerous persons crossing the Moor; and, whether he would direct an official inquiry to be made with a view to protect the public against similar accidents?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that the accounts he had received represented the case to be absolutely hopeless. As, therefore, there would probably be a coroner's inquest held on the case in a few days, he did not think it necessary to institute any official inquiry into the circumstances.

SOUTH AFRICA.—QUESTION.

MR. ALEXANDER M'ARTHUR asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether his attention has been directed to the following statement, which appeared in the "Times" of May 3rd:—

"The chiefs of two tribes situate south of Pongola (Magnami and Job) have expressed their opinion, in presence of an Englishman and some of their inounas, that they would be pleased to see the Zulu country in the hands of the English, as it would relieve them from the present slavery they are in with regard to the Zulus. The Aborigines' Protection Society may not be aware that some few months ago 1,000 Caffirs were drafted from these two chiefs to work in Natal by Cetywayo, the Zulu chief, and that the money they earned was not paid to them but to the Zulu king; and the whole thing has left such a bad impression that it is almost impossible to get a single native from them to go to Natal;"

and, whether, if this statement is true, he will take steps to free the immigration of native labourers to Natal from the abuses complained of?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that he had no information whatever respecting the statement that had been read; but he would direct the Lieutenant Governor to make inquiries into the subject.

RETIREMENT FROM THE ARMY. QUESTION.

COLONEL NAGHTEN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, having regard to the Order in Council of the 15th January 1878, which allows officers of the Royal Marines who entered the Service before April 1, 1870, to count their services from eighteen to twenty years of age towards retirement or pension, he will consider the advisability of allowing officers of the Army who joined it before the abolition of purchase to enjoy the same privilege?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, that, as the decision with respect to the Royal Warrant last year had been arrived at after careful consideration between the War Office and the Treasury, he was not prepared to consider the advisability of altering it.

GRAY'S INN ROAD.—QUESTION.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been directed to the dangerous insalubrity of some dwellings in Gray's Inn Road; and, whether he can explain why apparently no steps are being taken for the reconstruction of the adjacent district, although a scheme for that purpose was the very earliest among those which were suggested in pursuance of the provisions of the Artizans' Dwellings Act?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that it was quite true that the part of London referred to had been reported upon by the medical authorities, and he could not conceive any worse place in the whole of London. The scheme that was originally presented by the officers of the Metropolitan Board of Works was a large and comprehensive one; but, unfortunately, the Metropolitan Board of Works cut down that scheme, and presented to him such a mutilated scheme that he thought it utterly unworthy of its being passed into law, and he repudiated it. He had been told that during the last Session the Metropolitan Board, under one of their Improvement Acts, but not under the Artizans' Dwellings Act, obtained power to pull down one side of the Gray's Inn Road, which would remove some of the worst descriptions of the dwellings, and he understood that power was being exercised as speedily as possible. If the right hon. Gentleman wished to obtain any further information as to the action and intention of the Metropolitan Board of Works, he would refer him to the Chairman of that Board (Sir James M'Garel Hogg).

EVANGELICAL DISSENTERS IN RUSSIA.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If his attention has been called to an article in the "Globe" of the 8th instant, describing the sufferings and persecutions to which the Stundisli or Evangelical Dissenters are now subjected in Russia, and pointing out—

"That they had commenced operations in 1870, first by holding a prayer meeting in secret and then extending their influence openly, until at last whole parishes had joined the heterodox faith. For doing this and persisting in weaning the peasants from their orthodox belief in the holy images, saints, and candles, the prosecutor demanded that the three offenders should be exiled to the Mines of Siberia,"

although they had already suffered three years' imprisonment without trial; and, whether Her Majesty's Government would use their good offices to ameliorate the condition of these Christians so that their condition might in some degree be assimilated to that of their non-conformist brethren in this country?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I regret to say that my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs is still prevented by indisposition from being present. He has, however, enabled me to answer this Question, and I have to say that no information has been received at the Foreign Office respecting the persecution in Russia of the sect referred to, and it would not appear to be a matter in which Her Majesty's Government can use their good offices.

THE CHEFOO CONVENTION.

QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN W. M'ARTHUR asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Chefoo Convention, made by Sir Thomas Wade with the Chinese Government in September 1876, has been ratified by Her Majesty's Government; and, if so, why the Papers relating thereto have not been laid before Parliament; whether China has fulfilled in good faith her part of the Treaty, and opened the several ports promised therein; and, whether he is aware that great dissatisfaction prevails in China in consequence of the delay in carrying out the stipulations agreed upon by Her Majesty's Plenipotentiary?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am informed that Her Majesty's Government have not yet formally approved of the whole of the arrangements concluded by Sir Thomas Wade. Some of its stipulations cannot come into operation without the concurrence of the other Treaty Powers. The Report of the Indian Government on the clauses relating to the opium trade are still under consideration by Her Majesty's Government, and they hope shortly to be able to announce the decision they have arrived at. The Chinese Government have opened the new trading ports in accordance with the terms of the Treaty, although the stipulations as to the posting of the Proclamations have not been fulfilled in some parts of the country. Her Majesty's Government are not aware that any great dissatisfaction prevails in China on the ground that the Convention has not been ratified.

GROCERS' LICENCES IN SCOTLAND.

QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Government are prepared to bring in any measure to carry out the recent recommendation of the Commission which reported upon the question of Grocers' Licences in Scotland?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he saw no prospect, in the present state of Public Business, of being able to deal with the question of grocers' licences in Scotland by any legislation this Session.

MADAGASCAR.—QUESTION.

MR. ALEXANDER M'ARTHUR asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, having regard to the injurious effects of the cheap importation of spirits, and especially of Mauritius rum, into Madagascar, Her Majesty's Government has had under consideration the expediency of consenting to a revision of the duties of those commodities by the Home authorities; and, whether any, and, if so, what steps, with the above object in view, have been taken by Her Majesty's consent in Madagascar?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, in the opinion of Lord Salisbury no object would be gained by altering the duties on the commodity, and that it was manufactured in small quantities in Madagascar itself.

THE RESERVES.—QUESTION.

MR. PELL asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, in order to anticipate an inconsiderate addition to the number of paupers on the application of wives of men in the Reserve Forces, he will circulate a statement of the sums of money their husbands may have been entitled to receive per annum in respect of their contract with the State, their estimated equivalent weekly wages, as well as the separation allowances to which the wives and children are entitled at the cost of the State, and such other information on the subject as may be of service to Guardians in considering these applications?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: A Return is in preparation at the War Office, on the Motion, I believe, of my hon. Friend, which will give, as I understand, most of the information to which his Question refers. I have been in communication with the War Office on the subject, and propose to embody the particulars of that information in a letter which will be sent by the Local Government Board to an important Union in the Midland Counties, and I will take care that due publicity is given to the terms of that letter.

THE SOLWAY COMMISSIONERS.

QUESTION.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he would authorise the Solway Commissioners to make a Report; and, if he would lay such Report upon the Table of the House?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that the Commissioners had not yet finished their sittings; but he would lay on the Table any Papers respecting their inquiry with which he might be furnished.

DISTURBANCES IN IRELAND.

QUESTION.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether his attention has been given to the inquest held in the city of Cork on the body of Richard Andrews, who was killed by a shot fired by sub-constable John Roche on the 5th instant; and, if so, whether, having regard to the statement of the jury that they had agreed to a verdict finding the said John Roche and constable Guerin guilty of manslaughter, upon which the said constables were taken into custody, and to the fact that the said jury subsequently handed to the coroner a verdict of justifiable homicide, on which the said constables were released from custody, he will cause to be made a further investigation by the proper authorities?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON): I should say that the matter was fully inquired into by the coroner, judging from the lengthened newspaper reports of the inquest referred to by the hon. Gentleman. However, I have given instructions that copies of the depositions taken before the coroner shall be furnished to me.

MALTA.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, What information has been received regarding recent manifestations of public feeling in Malta; and, what steps have been or are about to be taken in consequence thereof?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: On May 15 the Governor of Malta telegraphed that there was great popular excitement and a demonstration against a Vote of £7,000 which he had proposed to the Council for drainage works which have for some time been in course of construction and against any alteration of the taxation, and added that a deputation had waited on him asking for suspension of action pending a reply to the Petition to the House of Commons. He was reminded, in reply, that with regard to the taxation question all that had been at present desired was public discussion, and that any proposals for a change in the law should stand over until his successor assumed the government next month, but that means must be provided to meet such portion of the cost of the drainage works now in progress as would be required during the present year. These works were undertaken because they were considered essential to the health both of the garrison and the civilian inhabitants. A large portion of their cost will fall on Imperial funds, and it is only right that the locality should bear its share. I may add that I do not gather from the Governor's telegram that any disturbance has occurred; but, of course, he will take all necessary measures for the preservation of the peace.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Ordered, That the Orders of the Day be postponed until after the Notice of Motion relating to the Military Forces of the Crown.—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MOTIONS.

THE MILITARY FORCES OF THE CROWN. RESOLUTION.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in rising to move—

"That, by the Constitution of this Realm, no Forces may be raised or kept by the Crown in time of peace, without the consent of Parliament, within any part of the Dominions of the Crown, excepting only such Forces as may be actually serving within Her Majesty's Indian Possessions,"

said: Mr. Speaker, it is, of course, impossible for me, even if it were my desire, to attempt to fix any limit to the scope of the debate which may arise on the Motion which I am about to submit to the House. The measure of the Government to which I shall have to advert, and which is the cause of my Motion, is one, no doubt, of the most important character. It is one not only important in itself, but it is one of a series of measures which form part of a policy which has already engaged, to a certain extent, the attention of the House, which has already received discussion from the House, and which will probably, at some future time, receive still further consideration. But the measure, taken by itself, irrespective of its being part of the policy of the Government, is of a most grave nature. It is a measure which raises totally new questions concerning the relations between this country and our Indian Empire—which raises, probably, some of the most difficult questions connected with the problem of government in India. Compared with these considerations, I must admit that the issue to which I am now about to ask the attention of the House is an extremely narrow one; and I confess I have purposely and intentionally thus narrowed its scope, partly because we have reason to believe that negotiations are at present going on of an extremely delicate character, and because we have very recently been informed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that, in his opinion, a general discussion of the state of affairs in the East would not be for the interest of the public service; and that, after that intimation, I do not wish to be a party to raising such a discussion. I will also admit that I have endeavoured to narrow the scope of my Motion, because I think that the issue itself which is raised in the Resolution is one of sufficient importance to merit full consideration and discussion upon its own merits, irrespective of any other consideration. Well, Sir, I need not detain the House at any length in vindicating the necessity for the Resolution I have brought before the House. It will not, I think, be denied that the claim put forward by the Government is very novel. I do not think it will be disputed that that claim, and the issue raised by my Resolution, are not simply issues of a technical character. It will, on the contrary, be admitted that they involve considerations of the greatest importance as affecting the relations hitherto existing between the Crown, Parliament, and the Army, and also the principles of financial control which Parliament has always maintained over every branch of the Administration. It will not be denied, I think, that, whatever may be the merits of the case, it is the duty of the Opposition, if the Opposition has any duties whatever—it is the first duty of the Opposition fully to examine and call in question any novel claims of this description which may be put forward, so that if they are to be admitted and to become part of our Parliamentary system, they may become so only after full and sufficient consideration. The claim of the Government is understood to be that, by the Prerogative of the Crown, they are entitled to transfer troops raised in India, and not voted by Parliament, to be made use of in time of peace, in other Dominions of the Crown. Lest there should be any mistake upon this point, I may, perhaps, be allowed to read what was stated on the subject by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In answer to a Question from me, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said—

“I can only say that the decision of Her Majesty's Government to order a certain number of Indian troops to Malta was one arrived at some time ago, but that it was not thought necessary, nor is it according to practice, that such a decision should be communicated to Parliament.”—[3 Hansard, ccxxxix. 1421.]

That appears to me to bear out the statement I made that they claim to employ these troops without the consent of Parliament as a Prerogative of the Crown. The Chancellor of the Exchequer made this still more clear the same evening, when he said—

“But, under any circumstances, I may frankly say that we should not have thought it our duty, even if we had foreseen that the matter would become public within so short a time, to have made a communication to Parliament with respect to it until the arrangements had been completed.”—[Ibid. 1436.]

Further, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said—

“There is no doubt whatever that this is a very important step; but it is, at the same time, a step which, after all, when you come to regard what it is, is neither more nor less than a direction given by Her Majesty for the moving of a portion of Her Forces from one part of the Empire to the other. And though it is a movement which will undoubtedly come under the notice of Parliament, and over which Parliament holds the control which it holds over all movements of British Forces—that of the right of withholding or challenging the Supplies asked for the purpose—yet, so far as the order given to Her Majesty's troops is concerned, it is an order strictly within the proper Constitutional Prerogative of the Crown, and one which Her Majesty has as much right to give as to order any portion of British troops now in England to proceed to Gibraltar or Malta, or anywhere else.”—[Ibid. 1435.]

That is what I understand to be the claim of the Government, and it is that claim which we deny. We contend, on the other hand, that it is in India, and in India only, that Forces can be raised and maintained without the authority annually given by Parliament; and that when such Forces are transferred to any part of Her Majesty's Dominions, they would come under those conditions which govern and regulate the other Regular Forces of the Crown. I will have to ask the House to consider—and I will do it as briefly as I can—the general principles which govern the relations between the Crown, Parliament, and the Army; and I will ask them to consider, further, the exceptions to those general principles which are made in the case of India, and which conditions ought to govern the transfer of Indian Forces when they are removed to other Possessions of Her Majesty outside that country. There is no Member of this House who is ignorant that, since the Revolution, Parliament has always claimed a special control over the Regular Forces of the Crown, altogether separate from that financial control which it exercises over every branch of the Administration. That control has been asserted by three distinct guarantees. It has been asserted by the annual voting by this House of the number of men to be maintained,

by the annual voting of the Supplies for their maintenance, and by the enactment for one year only of the Act for securing their proper discipline. The Bill of Rights did not specially enact these or any other guarantees. It was not an enacting Statute; it did not prescribe or lay down penalties; what it did was to lay down general principles. It was a Statute declaratory of the ancient liberties of the Kingdom which had been infringed, and declaratory of the principles which, in the opinion of Parliament, were then necessary for the maintenance and continuance of those liberties. The principles thus laid down in the Bill of Rights have been carried into force and into effect, not so much by special enactment as by a constant course of practice, precedent, and usage, which have shown what was the intention of Parliament, and what are the guarantees which Parliament thought necessary for the proper regulation and control of the Army. I wish it, I may add, to be clearly understood that I am not saying that the numbers of the Regular Army are to be limited to the exact number stated in the Preamble of the Mutiny Act. What I say is, that such number cannot be exceeded except with the consent of Parliament, and that the consent of Parliament must be obtained, if not by a Supplementary Statute, at least by a Supplementary Vote; and by a Vote, not only for the cost of the additional number of men, but by a Vote of the precise and actual number of the men themselves. Such was the doctrine laid down by Lord Hardwicke in 1734. Lord Hardwicke said—

“As to the giving His Majesty a power by an address or a vote to raise land forces, there is certainly nothing illegal in it: for though the King cannot by law raise or keep up a standing Army in this nation in time of peace without consent of Parliament, yet, my Lords, I know of no law that directs how that consent is to be obtained; it may, in my opinion, be had by a vote or an address from each House of Parliament, as well as by an Act regularly passed in Parliament.”—[Parl. History, vol. 9, p. 539.]

Even at the risk of repetition, what I say and maintain is, not that it is necessary that a Supplementary Statute should be passed, but that any increase to the number of the Regular Army to be raised or kept in any of the Dominions of the Crown must be obtained, if not by legislation, yet by the special consent of Parliament, and that that consent

must be given not merely to the cost but to the number of the men. To illustrate what I mean, I may say that I hold—and I hardly think the Government will dispute the proposition—that it would not be within the competence of the Crown to increase the numbers of the Regular Army, even if, by some means or other, they could maintain the Regular Forces more cheaply than they had estimated. Again, I maintain that it would not be within the competence of the Crown to increase the numbers of the Regular Army, if, by means of reference to some other resource—private contributions or otherwise—it was found to be not necessary to seek the assistance of Parliament for their maintenance. The principle which I maintain, and which has invariably been asserted by Parliament is, that the consent of Parliament must be obtained to the increase in the number of men. I understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer the other night to say that by the Bill of Rights it was only from the United Kingdom that Indian or other troops were excluded. I do not know whether the Government is prepared to maintain that construction of the Bill of Rights; but it is one which was entirely repudiated more than 100 years ago. In 1775, an important debate occurred in both Houses of Parliament on the occasion of the garrisoning of Gibraltar and Port Mahon by Hanoverian troops during the American War. One defence of the Government of that day was that the prohibition in the Bill of Rights was confined to the United Kingdom; but that construction was finally repudiated by all sides in the debate. “Lord Camden,” according to the records of the debate—

“Elucidated in the most satisfactory manner the literal and obvious meaning of the clause in the Bill of Rights; adverted to the spirit of that law, as applying to the grievance which was then to be remedied; pointed out the true construction of the letter and spirit united, as interpreted for a series of almost 90 years, and during the reigns of four Princes, besides the present, three of whom were foreigners, no slight matter of consideration, and then drew this obvious conclusion—that no foreign troops could be brought into the Dominions of the Crown of Great Britain, without the previous consent of Parliament.”—[Parl. History, vol. 18, p. 811.]

It was true that the word “foreigners” was not mentioned in the law; but would anyone infer from that, that though it was not permitted to keep a standing Army of Natives, it might be

wise, constitutional, and legal, to keep on foot a standing Army of Foreigners? Lord Chancellor Bathurst spoke for the Government—

“Deserting what he called the quibbles of Westminster Hall, and the subtle distinctions of lawyers, he allowed that the fortresses of Gibraltar and Port Mahon were fairly within the spirit and meaning of the paragraph of the Act of Settlement.”—[Ibid. 815.]

Finally, the Earl of Shelburne said—

“The Bill of Rights is declaratory: it supposes a law which can be found in no written book or statute whatever. It can only be looked for by recurring to its principle. The only principle that can be suggested is the danger to be apprehended by keeping a standing Force without the consent of Parliament. To do this within the limits of the Kingdom, and in time of peace, is more dangerous, and carries with it less colour of necessity. To do the same in Ireland, Gibraltar, or any of the dependencies of the Kingdom, may be less dangerous; but will any man say, there is no danger?”—[Ibid. 816.]

The hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. A. Mills), whose constituents appear to take a good deal of interest in this question, the other night put aside this debate as altogether beside the question; because, he said, the subject in dispute at that time was whether foreign troops might be admitted within the Dominions of the Crown without the consent of Parliament?—but that appears to me to be a total misapprehension of the argument. What was then laid down and assented to by all parties was that no troops of any kind, whether Native or Foreign, could be raised or maintained in any of the Dominions of the Crown without the consent of Parliament having been previously procured. It may be said that the Bill of Indemnity which was brought in at that time was not passed. That, no doubt, is true; but the very fact that Lord North thought it necessary, if only out of regard for the scruples of some of his supporters—who appear to have been more ticklish on these Constitutional points than some hon. Gentlemen who sit opposite now—to introduce a Bill of Indemnity, went to show that he thought it at any rate an open question, that ought to be in this case reserved; and the House, perhaps, will remember on what ground the indemnity was thrown out. It was thrown out in the House of Lords because it recited—what? It recited that there were doubts about the matter. The House of Lords declined to assert that there were any doubts at all about the matter, and rather than admit those doubts the Bill was rejected altogether. I do not think that the fact of the Bill not having been passed, and of Lord North having still kept his head upon his shoulders, can be cited as a proof that his conduct at that time was constitutional or correct, or that it received the consent of Parliament. The question is, what was asserted and admitted by Constitutional authorities at that time and the continuous course of practice since. If the House will reflect for a moment, it cannot fail to see that the limited construction of the Bill of Rights to which I have referred is not consistent with, I might say, common sense. What are the words of the Mutiny Act?

“Whereas the raising or keeping a standing army within the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in time of peace, unless it be with the consent of Parliament, is against law: and whereas it is adjudged necessary by Her Majesty and this present Parliament that a body of forces should be continued for the safety of the United Kingdom, and the defence of the possessions of Her Majesty's Crown,” &c.

Then it goes on to say—“The whole number of such force” shall be such and such. What is the meaning of the recital of the whole number of Forces? When Parliament voted this year the number of troops to be maintained, Parliament was perfectly aware that only a certain portion of these troops were to be maintained within the United Kingdom. Parliament knew perfectly well that a large number of them would be maintained in the Colonies and in the Colonial garrisons. If the view of the Government is correct, that a large number of Native troops may be brought over to fill these garrisons and these posts without the consent of Parliament, why, then, it is obvious that a very much larger number of troops may be withdrawn from the Colonies, and concentrated in the United Kingdom, than was ever contemplated by Parliament at the time when it voted the Estimates and when it passed the Mutiny Act. I am quite aware that at a later time—in 1794—Mr. Pitt held very high language as to the power of the Crown to introduce troops into the United Kingdom without the sanction of Parliament; but I hardly think that right hon. Gentlemen opposite will make use of the authority of Mr. Pitt at that time, if they recollect that Mr. Pitt himself, at a later

time, was obliged, or thought it necessary to bring in and pass the Bills of 1800 and 1806, giving the express authority of Parliament to such an increase of the Forces as he had hitherto made as being within the Prerogative of the Crown, and limiting the number of the troops which might be so introduced. I assert in general terms—not resting upon any special interpretation of the Bill of Rights, and not taking my stand upon any particular precedent, or any obiter dictum of any statesman, however eminent an authority he may be on the Constitution, but resting on what I believe to have been the constant usage and practice of Parliament—I assert that, in the words of my Resolution—

When I use the term “Forces of the Crown,” I believe I am using a strictly correct and technical description. I wish it to be understood that my Resolution applies solely to Regular Forces of the nature of a standing Army, and that it applies in no way—I do not wish or intend that it should apply—to the Militia Forces raised either in this country or in any of the Colonies. The latter Forces have always been regarded as being under different conditions and as not requiring any guarantees for security similar to those which have been insisted upon in the case of the Regular Forces or the standing Army. I come now to the exception which has been made in the case of India. I need not detain the House by reminding them that in almost every respect India has been, and still is, an exception to our general Constitutional system. There is no parallel in our own history, or, as far as I know, in the history of the world, to the record of our Dominion in India—originally begun by a Trading Company, and eventually becoming a great Eastern Power. When that anomaly was finally terminated, in 1858, India still remained an exception to our Constitutional system. Parliament decided—wisely I think, and of necessity—that a system more nearly approaching a despotic and absolute system of government should be applied to India, where we ruled over such vast numbers of subject-races, and where we were surrounded by a still larger number of semi-barbarous people. Parliament decided that the system of Constitutional checks and guarantees which we maintain at home and in all our Colonies and Dependencies was not suited to the government of India; and accordingly Parliament established, and still retains, a different system of government there. The Indian Army was transferred to the Crown under substantially the same conditions which it had previously existed under. Parliament did not insist in 1858 on the same Constitutional checks and guarantees in the case of the Army which was maintained for the defence of our Indian Possessions as it had always maintained in the case of the standing Army at home and in our other Dependencies. The Indian Army is not limited in numbers by an annual Vote of Parliament. It is not voted by Parliament at all; its numbers are not enumerated in the Mutiny Act; and the Native portion of the Indian Army is not even subject to the Mutiny Act. In fact, it may be described as a non-Parliamentary Army, as compared with the Army which is maintained at home and in the other Dependencies of the Crown. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has already stated that this is simply a case of moving one part of Her Majesty’s Forces from one part of Her Majesty’s Dominions to another. That, in my opinion, is a fallacy. It is perfectly true that Her Majesty has power; at all events, there is nothing to restrain the Crown from moving one part of the Parliamentary Army from one part of Her Majesty’s Dominions to another; but what we maintain is, that when they are brought into the Dominion of the Crown outside India, those troops I have described as a non-Parliamentary Army must come under the same regulations as a Parliamentary Force. That has been partially provided for by the Act of 1858. The 55th section of that Statute enacts that the Indian Army should not be used for military operations out of India except in certain specified cases of emergency, and that they should not be made use of at the charge of the Revenues of India without the consent previously obtained of both Houses of Parliament. If that provision had been literally and strictly observed, this question could never have arisen at all. These troops have now been moved—temporarily, at any rate—on the charge of the Revenues of India. If the Act of Parliament had been literally and strictly obeyed, they would never have come for a moment on the charge of the Indian Revenues; and the Imperial Revenues could not, legally, at all events, have been charged without the previous assent of Parliament. I am not going to contend that the 55th section of the Government of India Act was mainly intended to prevent such an operation as this. It was mainly intended, no doubt, to protect the Revenues of India. That point is one to which I will come by-and-by; but I contend that one of the effects of this 55th section, if strictly obeyed, would have been to prevent any violation of Parliamentary practice. The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated the other day, in reply to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James), that—

“The Native Indian troops of Her Majesty are not, and never have been, reckoned in the numbers mentioned in the Mutiny Act. The Native Indian troops recently ordered to Malta are not, and ought not to be, reckoned in the number mentioned in the Mutiny Act of the present year.”

That is perfectly true; but I fail to see what argument the right hon. Gentleman derives from it. I fail to see that that absolves the Government from the necessity of coming to Parliament for authority to remove these troops. It is altogether, in my opinion, beside the question. The relations of the troops employed in India under the Mutiny Act are extremely peculiar. The British troops employed in India are under the Mutiny Act; but, nevertheless, they are not enumerated in the Preamble of the Act. The Native troops of India when employed out of India are not under the Mutiny Act; but I will show the House immediately that when they are employed out of India they have been, and ought to be, voted distinctly and directly by Parliament. My contention, therefore, is, that in time of peace, both in accordance with general principle and by the Act of 1858, Native troops cannot be moved to Dominions outside India without the consent of Parliament. I say in time of peace; because it is very well known that Indian troops have been employed frequently in time of war outside the limits of India. I have nothing to say about the Prerogative of the Crown to use these troops in time of war. I should not be prepared to admit that, even in time of war, the Crown has an unlimited power of ordering troops to be moved from India without the consent of Parliament. But we are not at war, and it is not necessary to discuss that matter now. As far as I know, the only case of employment of Indian troops in a time of peace outside India, is that of the sending of Indian troops to China after the China War. General Peel, who had been Secretary for War in a Conservative Government, and who took a great interest in all military matters in this House, called the attention of the Committee of Supply to the employment of those Indian troops in China, and remonstrated against their employment without their being voted by Parliament. General Peel said, in March, 1864—

“Certainly, if the control of the House was necessary in any case, it must be in the case of the Indian Native troops. If any part of the Indian Native Army could be employed without a Vote of that House, those troops were altogether removed from Parliamentary control. In the case of ordinary troops there were two checks—the Mutiny Act, and the money voted by Parliament for the pay of the troops. But neither of these checks applied to Indian troops. Native Indian troops were not liable to the Mutiny Act, being expressly excluded from the operations of that measure, and were ruled by Articles of War expressly framed for India; and the House had no control over Native troops through its privilege as to money Votes, because these troops were paid, in the first instance, by the Indian Government, and the expenditure never came under the notice of the British Parliament till long after it had been incurred.”—[3 Hansard clxxiii. 1436-7.]

That was what General Peel said in criticizing the action of the Government of the day—the Government of Lord Palmerston—and it appeared so sound to that Government that, in the subsequent year, a Vote was taken for the Indian troops employed at that time at Hong Kong; and, from that time up to 1870, so long as the troops remained there, a Vote, distinguished from Vote “A,” was taken for the Native troops who were employed in the Dominions of Her Majesty outside India. That is precisely what we ask the Government to do now. General Peel, being a military authority on the other side of the House, called upon the Government in 1864 to comply with Constitutional practice, and to vote the men, wherever they might be and whoever they might be, employed upon

the service of the Crown outside of India. We make precisely the same demand. If the Government intend, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer has declared, to take a Vote for the men, the case will no doubt, be greatly altered. So far, I have referred to what is the Constitutional aspect of this question; and, before I conclude, I wish to say one or two words about the financial aspect. The conduct of the Government appears to have violated both the Rules which have been made for the protection of the Indian Exchequer and the English Exchequer. As I have pointed out, I am unable to say how far the 55th section of the Government of India Act has been broken. In the year 1867, in a case somewhat similar, but not entirely so—because it was a case of war and not of peace in—1867, Indian troops were removed from India, and the assent of Parliament had not been previously obtained, Parliament not being then assembled. When Parliament met, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer was then extremely humble. He was not then supported by quite so large a majority as he now finds behind him, though I do not know that that has anything to do with the difference between his action then and his action now. The Chancellor of the Exchequer then said the point had been raised as to whether the conduct of the Government had been strictly within the law, and he was rather inclined to doubt whether, on a strictly technical interpretation of the Act, they had kept within the limits of the law. He said—

“The point on which we are challenged, so far as I understand, is this—in the application of the Revenues of India to the purposes of the Abyssinian Expedition, as far as it has hitherto gone, we have been proceeding upon the view, not to their ultimate application without the consent of Parliament, but only to their advance for the purposes of an Expedition, which advance will be repaid by subsequent payments from the Imperial Revenue. I am inclined to think that the wording of the clause would, strictly speaking, prohibit that proceeding.”—[3 Hansard, cxc. 360.]

The right hon. Gentleman, then, seems to have thought that he had so far violated the law, or, at all events, he regarded it as extremely doubtful, that he came to Parliament and moved a Resolution which had the effect of obtaining the consent of Parliament. Well, those scruples do not appear to trouble the Government now. We have heard nothing of any violation of the 55th section of the Government of India Act. I admit I am curious to know what explanation will be offered on the point by the Government. Well, now, has the British Exchequer received better treatment at the hands of the Government of the day than the Indian? If the cost of this movement is not to be paid out of Indian Revenue, it must be paid out of British Revenue. But the Government have obtained no authority either by a specific Vote for the purpose, or by a Vote of Credit. So far, in effect, they have pledged the credit of the country to an expenditure which it would be impossible for this House to refuse to sanction, even if it should consider the movement of troops which occasioned it impolitic. I want to know what is the justification for this course on the part of the Government? I am perfectly aware that there are occasions upon which it is necessary for the Government to take responsibility upon themselves and come to Parliament afterwards for an indemnity. But I want to know what is the justification, not of taking responsibility upon themselves, but of keeping Parliament in the dark? Parliament was sitting, according to the admission of the right hon. Gentleman, at the moment when the order was given for the movement of Indian troops. If, as was alleged the other day, it was impossible for the Government to lay upon the Table of the House an Estimate of the cost, it is perfectly well known that, according to Parliamentary practice, there are other means by which that consent might have been obtained. If the precise cost of this movement could not have been communicated, there was nothing easier than for the Government to have asked for a Vote of Credit. That is the ordinary Parliamentary proceeding in a case of unforeseen emergency of this description. A Vote of Credit, we know, was resorted to by the Government for other purposes; but the authority conferred upon them by that Vote of Credit had expired, and nothing was easier, if the Government wished to remain within the ordinary Constitutional practice, than to communicate with Parliament, who were sitting at the time, and ask for their approval at once and for a Vote of Credit. It was said, the other day, it was extremely desirable that the arrangements as to the despatch of Indian troops should not be made known. Why was it extremely desirable? That has not been explained. I can understand perfectly well that, when we are engaged in war, it may be desirable that all the arrangements of an Expedition should remain a profound secret as long as possible. We are not at war. It has been represented by the Government, over and over again, that it was not even a menace of war, but only one of a series of preparations. I should be rather inclined to call this, not in an invidious sense, a series of military demonstrations. But what is the object of that in a time of peace? To preserve peace, we are told. But how is that object to be accomplished, if the military demonstration is to be kept an absolute secret? If a demonstration is to produce any effect at all, the sooner and the more widely it is known the better. If a demonstration of the military power of this country was required, surely the demonstration would not have had a less, but a greater effect, if it had been looked upon, as it might and would have been, with the overwhelming approval of the House? I cannot see that the concealment of this movement by the Government from the House can have been intended for any other object than a deliberate assertion of the right of the Government, by the use of the Prerogative of the Crown, to make a use of our Indian Forces which has never before been attempted. Something was said about the difficulty that would have been placed in the way of making the arrangements by publicity. I should be glad to know whether the Government are still prepared to maintain that it was necessary to keep this secret from the House and from the public up to the very rising of the House of Commons, in order to facilitate the arrangements which would have to be taken? I have no desire to obstruct this operation of the Government, or this movement of Indian troops if, after deliberation, Parliament should consider it to have been a wise and well-considered step. I am not going to discuss the merits of the question now; but I do say that the House has a right, before expressing its approval of this proceeding, to consider well the grounds on which all information regarding it has been withheld from it. Now, I have only one or two words to say as to the Amendment to my Motion, which is to be moved by the Secretary of State for the Colonies. That Amendment asserts that the Constitutional control of Parliament is amply secured in two ways. It asserts that it is maintained by the provisions of the law, and by the undoubted power of this House to grant or refuse the Supplies. As to the provisions of the law, I do not know exactly to what provision the right hon. Gentleman refers. I have endeavoured to show that the Constitutional control of Parliament over the Army is rather the result of practice and of precedent than of any special enactment. I have endeavoured to show, also, that, in my opinion, the claim of the Government in this case is inconsistent with the Declaration contained in the Bill of Rights. Well, if that is so, then either the provisions of the law referred to in the Amendment are insufficient, or, if they are sufficient, they must have been violated. I do not know to what provision precisely the right hon. Gentleman refers. If he refers to the Act of 1858, to which I have alluded before, then I admit, with the right hon. Gentleman, that the provisions of the law would have been sufficient if they were observed. But, unfortunately, they have not been observed; and, I suppose, the Government would say, with good reason. But it is impossible to maintain that those provisions are sufficient, and also, at the same time, to maintain that they are such as, whenever an emergency arises, they must necessarily be broken. Then, as to the undoubted right of the House to grant or to refuse the Supplies, I have already endeavoured to prove—I think not altogether unsuccessfully—that Parliament has always required in the matter of the Army something more than the financial check for securing the control over it. Parliament possesses a financial control, undoubtedly, over every branch of the Administration. In the case of the Army, I have endeavoured to show that Parliament has required something more than that. But what does the financial control, to which the right hon. Gentleman refers, amount to? What is the question which will be put to this House, and which this House will have to answer, when the Estimate of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is submitted to us? That question will be, whether the House will recoup—whether it will provide for an expenditure which has already been incurred temporarily and illegally out of the Indian Revenues, and which, if this House refuses to make it good, must continue to be paid illegally and unjustly out of those Indian Revenues? Sir, that is the sole question which will be put to the House when the Estimate is submitted; and how can it be maintained for a moment, when the discretion of the House is limited to answering "Aye" or "No" to such a question as this, that a control of that sort enables us to exercise any real or substantial control over a proceeding of this kind? There is no doubt that the financial control possessed by Parliament is a very substantial one when it is previously asked for. But when, as in this case, it is asked for only subsequently to the expenditure, and when no power of Parliament can prevent its being incurred, and it has only to pay the bill, then I say, if the Government which has taken on itself a responsibility of that character appeals to Party, and turns the question into a Vote of Confidence, Parliament has no check whatever. Well, the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman, not depending altogether on its argumentative part, concludes with something which is extremely like a Vote of Confidence in Her Majesty's Administration. I think it is a very unusual course for a Member of a Government to move a Vote of Confidence in his own Administration. That is a point on which I do not wish to dwell. But it appears to me that the effect of the conclusion of the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment—I do not know whether that is its intention—would be to widen the scope of this discussion. I have stated, at the outset of my remarks, why I thought it was desirable on many grounds—and mainly on consideration of what has been said by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—that a wide scope should not be given on this occasion to the discussion. If the Government now think that a different course should be taken, we shall know how to judge on a future occasion how much value is to be attached to representations such as those made to us a very short time ago by the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and we shall also be able to form some sort of an opinion on the relative value which is placed by Her Majesty's Government on the public interests and on Party convenience. No doubt, if Her Majesty's Government choose to put the question that I have raised aside by bringing forward a Vote of Confidence in themselves, it is perfectly within their competence to do so; and I have no doubt,

also, that it is within their competence to carry it. But I must say, in the interests of fair and free Parliamentary discussion, I think I have a right to protest against such a course as this, which, it seems to me, might be employed to cover or evade any breach whatever of the Constitution. These are all the remarks which I think it necessary to make with respect to the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman. I have endeavoured as well as I am able—and, I am afraid, most imperfectly—to lay before the House the great Constitutional issues which, I think, are raised by the proceedings of the Government in relation to the Constitution of this country; and I submit, with confidence, the Resolution of which I have given Notice to the judgment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, by the Constitution of this Realm, no Forces may be raised or kept by the Crown in time of peace, without the consent of Parliament, within any part of the Dominions of the Crown, excepting only such Forces as may be actually serving within Her Majesty's Indian Possessions."—(The Marquess of Hartington.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in rising to move the following Amendment:—

"That this House, being of opinion that the constitutional control of Parliament over the raising and employment of the Military Forces of the Crown is fully secured by the provisions of the Law, and by the undoubted power of this House to grant or refuse Supplies, considers it to be unnecessary and inexpedient to affirm any Resolution tending to weaken the hands of Her Majesty's Government in the present state of Foreign affairs,"

said: Sir, the last thing that I should wish to do would be to object to the raising and the full discussion of a Constitutional question, however inopportune the time, or however small the leisure at the disposal of this House. To us, at any rate, if to any Party in this House, the Constitution of our country should be dear; and all that I would say with regard to the action of the noble Marquess is, that I think it is a subject of congratulation for the present, and of happy augury for the future, that so strict and careful a jealousy for the English Constitution in matters relating to the control of the Army should be shown by those who are responsible for the Royal Warrant for the Abolition of Purchase. Now, the noble Marquess has raised this as a Constitutional question, and has complained, to some extent, that his Motion should be treated by us as a Vote of Censure. I have, Sir, but to refer to the mode in which that Motion has been received by some of his own Followers, to the Notices which have been withdrawn in its favour, and the support which has been given to it by certain obscure sections of people in the country, to justify us in regarding it as something more than an abstract discussion of Constitutional questions, and as being accepted, if not intended, as a Vote of Censure on Her Majesty's Government. Now, on our behalf, I have to say that we do not admit the accuracy of the statement of Constitutional or legal doctrines contained in this Resolution. We do not accept the argument of the noble Marquess as to our position in connection with the question; but we maintain that we have acted in this matter for the best interest of the Empire, and that in that action we have not in one tittle violated either the Constitution or the law of the Realm. And I must add that, to some extent, the circumstances in which this Motion has been proposed, carry with them its refutation. For what has happened in "another place?" There, if anywhere, both Parties in the State can muster their leading Constitutional authorities. There, if anywhere, a violation of the Constitution—had any occurred—would be discussed and voted upon with perfect freedom, independence, and absence of Party feeling; yet there it is that no one has ventured to propose a Motion that, in this matter, Her Majesty's Government have acted in violation of the law and Constitution of the country; and the action of the noble Marquess himself is, I think, an additional proof of the weakness of his case—for I have that belief in the straightforwardness of his character, that I am confident that if he had really believed that we had violated either the Constitution or the law, he would put that issue plainly to the House, and would not have contented himself with a Resolution of the character of a Constitutional truism. Now, what are we accused of having done? In the first place, there is no question whatever of the movement of foreign troops. The noble Marquess referred to debates on this subject a century old—debates of which the results were scarcely favourable to his view; because, whether in 1775 or 1794, both Houses of Parliament, by large majorities, approved the course of the Ministers of the day; and, when a Bill of Indemnity was proposed, perhaps under circumstances somewhat similar to those of the present Motion, by a noble Lord who was acting rather on account of the demands of his Followers than on his own view of the merits of the question, it was rejected by the House of Lords, not on account of the Preamble, but because it was inconsistent with the Vote they had come to, and no need whatever existed for the passing of such a Bill. I do not propose further to refer to those debates. The question now before the House is not a question of the movement of foreign troops, nor even of troops that can be separated from the other Forces of the Queen. What was the use of passing the India Act of 1858, if it did not assimilate and unite the East India Forces, whether European or Native, to the other Forces of the Crown? After having united these Forces into one Army, are we to be unable to use them? The argument of the noble Marquess, if carried to its full logical extent, would not merely hinder us from using the Native Indian Army, but must lead to its entire abolition; for what is the good of a Force that cannot be used by this country in the time, perhaps, of its greatest need? The Native Indian Army is as much a part of the Forces of the Crown as any other part of Her Majesty's Army; but we are told that the undoubted Prerogative of the Crown, under which the Army can be moved from one portion of the Empire to another, is limited in the case of these Indian Forces. Now, it rests with those who assert the existence of such a limitation to prove it; and I have failed to find, in the speech of the noble Marquess, any proof of the kind. I do not admit that there is anything in the Constitution or in the law which prohibits their movement to any part of Her Majesty's Dominions, unless it be to the United Kingdom. And, in connection with this subject, I must demur to the statement with which the Motion of the noble Marquess concludes, that the Forces actually serving within Her Majesty's Indian Dominions are excepted from the consent of Parliament. In the first place, I would remind the noble Marquess that the consent of Parliament implies something more than a Vote by this House in Committee of Supply; it implies some-

by the annual voting of the Supplies for their maintenance, and by the enactment for one year only of the Act for securing their proper discipline. The Bill of Rights did not specially enact these or any other guarantees. It was not an enacting Statute; it did not prescribe or lay down penalties; what it did was to lay down general principles. It was a Statute declaratory of the ancient liberties of the Kingdom which had been infringed, and declaratory of the principles which, in the opinion of Parliament, were then necessary for the maintenance and continuance of those liberties. The principles thus laid down in the Bill of Rights have been carried into force and into effect, not so much by special enactment as by a constant course of practice, precedent, and usage, which have shown what was the intention of Parliament, and what are the guarantees which Parliament thought necessary for the proper regulation and control of the Army. I wish it, I may add, to be clearly understood that I am not saying that the numbers of the Regular Army are to be limited to the exact number stated in the Preamble of the Mutiny Act. What I say is, that such number cannot be exceeded except with the consent of Parliament, and that the consent of Parliament must be obtained, if not by a Supplementary Statute, at least by a Supplementary Vote; and by a Vote, not only for the cost of the additional number of men, but by a Vote of the precise and actual number of the men themselves. Such was the doctrine laid down by Lord Hardwicke in 1734. Lord Hardwicke said—

“As to the giving His Majesty a power by an address or a vote to raise land forces, there is certainly nothing illegal in it; for though the King cannot by law raise or keep up a standing Army in this nation in time of peace without consent of Parliament, yet, my Lords, I know of no law that directs how that consent is to be obtained; it may, in my opinion, be had by a vote or an address from each House of Parliament, as well as by an Act regularly passed in Parliament.”—[Parl. History, vol. 9, p. 539.]

Even at the risk of repetition, what I say and maintain is, not that it is necessary that a Supplementary Statute should be passed, but that any increase to the number of the Regular Army to be raised or kept in any of the Dominions of the Crown must be obtained, if not by legislation, yet by the special consent of Parliament, and that that consent

must be given not merely to the cost but to the number of the men. To illustrate what I mean, I may say that I hold—and I hardly think the Government will dispute the proposition—that it would not be within the competence of the Crown to increase the numbers of the Regular Army, even if, by some means or other, they could maintain the Regular Forces more cheaply than they had estimated. Again, I maintain that it would not be within the competence of the Crown to increase the numbers of the Regular Army, if, by means of reference to some other resource—private contributions or otherwise—it was found to be not necessary to seek the assistance of Parliament for their maintenance. The principle which I maintain, and which has invariably been asserted by Parliament is, that the consent of Parliament must be obtained to the increase in the number of men. I understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer the other night to say that by the Bill of Rights it was only from the United Kingdom that Indian or other troops were excluded. I do not know whether the Government is prepared to maintain that construction of the Bill of Rights; but it is one which was entirely repudiated more than 100 years ago. In 1775, an important debate occurred in both Houses of Parliament on the occasion of the garrisoning of Gibraltar and Port Mahon by Hanoverian troops during the American War. One defence of the Government of that day was that the prohibition in the Bill of Rights was confined to the United Kingdom; but that construction was finally repudiated by all sides in the debate. “Lord Camden,” according to the records of the debate—

“Elucidated in the most satisfactory manner the literal and obvious meaning of the clause in the Bill of Rights; adverted to the spirit of that law, as applying to the grievance which was then to be remedied; pointed out the true construction of the letter and spirit united, as interpreted for a series of almost 90 years, and during the reigns of four Princes, besides the present, three of whom were foreigners, no slight matter of consideration, and then drew this obvious conclusion—that no foreign troops could be brought into the Dominions of the Crown of Great Britain, without the previous consent of Parliament.”—[Parl. History, vol. 18, p. 811.]

It was true that the word “foreigners” was not mentioned in the law; but would anyone infer from that, that though it was not permitted to keep a standing Army of Natives, it might be

wise, constitutional, and legal, to keep on foot a standing Army of Foreigners? Lord Chancellor Bathurst spoke for the Government—

“Deserting what he called the quibbles of Westminster Hall, and the subtle distinctions of lawyers, he allowed that the fortresses of Gibraltar and Port Mahon were fairly within the spirit and meaning of the paragraph of the Act of Settlement.”—[Ibid. 815.]

Finally, the Earl of Shelburne said—

“The Bill of Rights is declaratory: it supposes a law which can be found in no written book or statute whatever. It can only be looked for by recurring to its principle. The only principle that can be suggested is the danger to be apprehended by keeping a standing Force without the consent of Parliament. To do this within the limits of the Kingdom, and in time of peace, is more dangerous, and carries with it less colour of necessity. To do the same in Ireland, Gibraltar, or any of the dependencies of the Kingdom, may be less dangerous; but will any man say, there is no danger?”—[Ibid. 816.]

The hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. A. Mills), whose constituents appear to take a good deal of interest in this question, the other night put aside this debate as altogether beside the question; because, he said, the subject in dispute at that time was whether foreign troops might be admitted within the Dominions of the Crown without the consent of Parliament?—but that appears to me to be a total misapprehension of the argument. What was then laid down and assented to by all parties was that no troops of any kind, whether Native or Foreign, could be raised or maintained in any of the Dominions of the Crown without the consent of Parliament having been previously procured. It may be said that the Bill of Indemnity which was brought in at that time was not passed. That, no doubt, is true; but the very fact that Lord North thought it necessary, if only out of regard for the scruples of some of his supporters—who appear to have been more ticklish on these Constitutional points than some hon. Gentlemen who sit opposite now—to introduce a Bill of Indemnity, went to show that he thought it at any rate an open question, that ought to be in this case reserved; and the House, perhaps, will remember on what ground the indemnity was thrown out. It was thrown out in the House of Lords because it recited—what? It recited that there were doubts about the matter. The House of Lords declined to assert that there were any doubts at all about the matter, and rather than admit those doubts the Bill was rejected altogether. I do not think that the fact of the Bill not having been passed, and of Lord North having still kept his head upon his shoulders, can be cited as a proof that his conduct at that time was constitutional or correct, or that it received the consent of Parliament. The question is, what was asserted and admitted by Constitutional authorities at that time and the continuous course of practice since. If the House will reflect for a moment, it cannot fail to see that the limited construction of the Bill of Rights to which I have referred is not consistent with, I might say, common sense. What are the words of the Mutiny Act?

“Whereas the raising or keeping a standing army within the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in time of peace, unless it be with the consent of Parliament, is against law: and whereas it is adjudged necessary by Her Majesty and this present Parliament that a body of forces should be continued for the safety of the United Kingdom, and the defence of the possessions of Her Majesty's Crown,” &c.

Then it goes on to say—“The whole number of such force” shall be such and such. What is the meaning of the recital of the whole number of Forces? When Parliament voted this year the number of troops to be maintained, Parliament was perfectly aware that only a certain portion of these troops were to be maintained within the United Kingdom. Parliament knew perfectly well that a large number of them would be maintained in the Colonies and in the Colonial garrisons. If the view of the Government is correct, that a large number of Native troops may be brought over to fill these garrisons and these posts without the consent of Parliament, why, then, it is obvious that a very much larger number of troops may be withdrawn from the Colonies, and concentrated in the United Kingdom, than was ever contemplated by Parliament at the time when it voted the Estimates and when it passed the Mutiny Act. I am quite aware that at a later time—in 1794—Mr. Pitt held very high language as to the power of the Crown to introduce troops into the United Kingdom without the sanction of Parliament; but I hardly think that right hon. Gentlemen opposite will make use of the authority of Mr. Pitt at that time, if they recollect that Mr. Pitt himself, at a later

time, was obliged, or thought it necessary to bring in and pass the Bills of 1800 and 1806, giving the express authority of Parliament to such an increase of the Forces as he had hitherto made as being within the Prerogative of the Crown, and limiting the number of the troops which might be so introduced. I assert in general terms—not resting upon any special interpretation of the Bill of Rights, and not taking my stand upon any particular precedent, or any obiter dictum of any statesman, however eminent an authority he may be on the Constitution, but resting on what I believe to have been the constant usage and practice of Parliament—I assert that, in the words of my Resolution—

When I use the term “Forces of the Crown,” I believe I am using a strictly correct and technical description. I wish it to be understood that my Resolution applies solely to Regular Forces of the nature of a standing Army, and that it applies in no way—I do not wish or intend that it should apply—to the Militia Forces raised either in this country or in any of the Colonies. The latter Forces have always been regarded as being under different conditions and as not requiring any guarantees for security similar to those which have been insisted upon in the case of the Regular Forces or the standing Army. I come now to the exception which has been made in the case of India. I need not detain the House by reminding them that in almost every respect India has been, and still is, an exception to our general Constitutional system. There is no parallel in our own history, or, as far as I know, in the history of the world, to the record of our Dominion in India—originally begun by a Trading Company, and eventually becoming a great Eastern Power. When that anomaly was finally terminated, in 1858, India still remained an exception to our Constitutional system. Parliament decided—wisely I think, and of necessity—that a system more nearly approaching a despotic and absolute system of government should be applied to India, where we ruled over such vast numbers of subject-races, and where we were surrounded by a still larger number of semi-barbarous people. Parliament decided that the system of Constitutional checks and guarantees which we maintain at home and in all our Colonies and Dependencies was not suited to the government of India; and accordingly Parliament established, and still retains, a different system of government there. The Indian Army was transferred to the Crown under substantially the same conditions which it had previously existed under. Parliament did not insist in 1858 on the same Constitutional checks and guarantees in the case of the Army which was maintained for the defence of our Indian Possessions as it had always maintained in the case of the standing Army at home and in our other Dependencies. The Indian Army is not limited in numbers by an annual Vote of Parliament. It is not voted by Parliament at all; its numbers are not enumerated in the Mutiny Act; and the Native portion of the Indian Army is not even subject to the Mutiny Act. In fact, it may be described as a non-Parliamentary Army, as compared with the Army which is maintained at home and in the other Dependencies of the Crown. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has already stated that this is simply a case of moving one part of Her Majesty's Forces from one part of Her Majesty's Dominions to another. That, in my opinion, is a fallacy. It is perfectly true that Her Majesty has power; at all events, there is nothing to restrain the Crown from moving one part of the Parliamentary Army from one part of Her Majesty's Dominions to another; but what we maintain is, that when they are brought into the Dominion of the Crown outside India, those troops I have described as a non-Parliamentary Army must come under the same regulations as a Parliamentary Force. That has been partially provided for by the Act of 1858. The 55th section of that Statute enacts that the Indian Army should not be used for military operations out of India except in certain specified cases of emergency, and that they should not be made use of at the charge of the Revenues of India without the consent previously obtained of both Houses of Parliament. If that provision had been literally and strictly observed, this question could never have arisen at all. These troops have now been moved—temporarily, at any rate—on the charge of the Revenues of India. If the Act of Parliament had been literally and strictly obeyed, they would never have come for a moment on the charge of the Indian Revenues; and the Imperial Revenues could not, legally, at all events, have been charged without the previous assent of Parliament. I am not going to contend that the 55th section of the Government of India Act was mainly intended to prevent such an operation as this. It was mainly intended, no doubt, to protect the Revenues of India. That point is one to which I will come by-and-by; but I contend that one of the effects of this 55th section, if strictly obeyed, would have been to prevent any violation of Parliamentary practice. The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated the other day, in reply to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James), that—

“The Native Indian troops of Her Majesty are not, and never have been, reckoned in the numbers mentioned in the Mutiny Acts. The Native Indian troops recently ordered to Malta are not, and ought not to be, reckoned in the number mentioned in the Mutiny Act of the present year.”

That is perfectly true; but I fail to see what argument the right hon. Gentleman derives from it. I fail to see that that absolves the Government from the necessity of coming to Parliament for authority to remove these troops. It is altogether, in my opinion, beside the question. The relations of the troops employed in India under the Mutiny Act are extremely peculiar. The British troops employed in India are under the Mutiny Act; but, nevertheless, they are not enumerated in the Preamble of the Act. The Native troops of India when employed out of India are not under the Mutiny Act; but I will show the House immediately that when they are employed out of India they have been, and ought to be, voted distinctly and directly by Parliament. My contention, therefore, is, that in time of peace, both in accordance with general principle and by the Act of 1858, Native troops cannot be moved to Dominions outside India without the consent of Parliament. I say in time of peace; because it is very well known that Indian troops have been employed frequently in time of war outside the limits of India. I have nothing to say about the Prerogative of the Crown to use these troops in time of war. I should not be prepared to admit that, even in time of war, the Crown has an unlimited power of ordering troops to be moved from India without the consent of Parliament. But we are not at war, and it is not necessary to discuss that matter now. As far as I know, the only case of employment of Indian troops in a time of peace outside India, is that of the sending of Indian troops to China after the China War. General Peel, who had been Secretary for War in a Conservative Government, and who took a great interest in all military matters in this House, called the attention of the Committee of Supply to the employment of those Indian troops in China, and remonstrated against their employment without their being voted by Parliament. General Peel said, in March, 1864—

“Certainly, if the control of the House was necessary in any case, it must be in the case of the Indian Native troops. If any part of the Indian Native Army could be employed without a Vote of that House, those troops were altogether removed from Parliamentary control. In the case of ordinary troops there were two checks—the Mutiny Act, and the money voted by Parliament for the pay of the troops. But neither of these checks applied to Indian troops. Native Indian troops were not liable to the Mutiny Act, being expressly excluded from the operations of that measure, and were ruled by Articles of War expressly framed for India; and the House had no control over Native troops through its privilege as to money Votes, because these troops were paid, in the first instance, by the Indian Government, and the expenditure never came under the notice of the British Parliament till long after it had been incurred.”—[3 Hansard clxxiii. 1436-7.]

That was what General Peel said in criticizing the action of the Government of the day—the Government of Lord Palmerston—and it appeared so sound to that Government that, in the subsequent year, a Vote was taken for the Indian troops employed at that time at Hong Kong; and, from that time up to 1870, so long as the troops remained there, a Vote, distinguished from Vote “A,” was taken for the Native troops who were employed in the Dominions of Her Majesty outside India. That is precisely what we ask the Government to do now. General Peel, being a military authority on the other side of the House, called upon the Government in 1864 to comply with Constitutional practice, and to vote the men, wherever they might be and whoever they might be, employed upon

the service of the Crown outside of India. We make precisely the same demand. If the Government intend, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer has declared, to take a Vote for the men, the case will no doubt, be greatly altered. So far, I have referred to what is the Constitutional aspect of this question; and, before I conclude, I wish to say one or two words about the financial aspect. The conduct of the Government appears to have violated both the Rules which have been made for the protection of the Indian Exchequer and the English Exchequer. As I have pointed out, I am unable to say how far the 55th section of the Government of India Act has been broken. In the year 1867, in a case somewhat similar, but not entirely so—because it was a case of war and not of peace in—1867, Indian troops were removed from India, and the assent of Parliament had not been previously obtained, Parliament not being then assembled. When Parliament met, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer was then extremely humble. He was not then supported by quite so large a majority as he now finds behind him, though I do not know that that has anything to do with the difference between his action then and his action now. The Chancellor of the Exchequer then said the point had been raised as to whether the conduct of the Government had been strictly within the law, and he was rather inclined to doubt whether, on a strictly technical interpretation of the Act, they had kept within the limits of the law. He said—

“The point on which we are challenged, so far as I understand, is this—in the application of the Revenues of India to the purposes of the Abyssinian Expedition, as far as it has hitherto gone, we have been proceeding upon the view, not to their ultimate application without the consent of Parliament, but only to their advance for the purposes of an Expedition, which advance will be repaid by subsequent payments from the Imperial Revenue. I am inclined to think that the wording of the clause would, strictly speaking, prohibit that proceeding.”—[3 Hansard, cxc. 360.]

The right hon. Gentleman, then, seems to have thought that he had so far violated the law, or, at all events, he regarded it as extremely doubtful, that he came to Parliament and moved a Resolution which had the effect of obtaining the consent of Parliament. Well, those scruples do not appear to trouble the Government now. We have heard nothing of any violation of the 55th section of the Government of India Act. I admit I am curious to know what explanation will be offered on the point by the Government. Well, now, has the British Exchequer received better treatment at the hands of the Government of the day than the Indian? If the cost of this movement is not to be paid out of Indian Revenue, it must be paid out of British Revenue. But the Government have obtained no authority either by a specific Vote for the purpose, or by a Vote of Credit. So far, in effect, they have pledged the credit of the country to an expenditure which it would be impossible for this House to refuse to sanction, even if it should consider the movement of troops which occasioned it impolitic. I want to know what is the justification for this course on the part of the Government? I am perfectly aware that there are occasions upon which it is necessary for the Government to take responsibility upon themselves and come to Parliament afterwards for an indemnity. But I want to know what is the justification, not of taking responsibility upon themselves, but of keeping Parliament in the dark? Parliament was sitting, according to the admission of the right hon. Gentleman, at the moment when the order was given for the movement of Indian troops. If, as was alleged the other day, it was impossible for the Government to lay upon the Table of the House an Estimate of the cost, it is perfectly well known that, according to Parliamentary practice, there are other means by which that consent might have been obtained. If the precise cost of this movement could not have been communicated, there was nothing easier than for the Government to have asked for a Vote of Credit. That is the ordinary Parliamentary proceeding in a case of unforeseen emergency of this description. A Vote of Credit, we know, was resorted to by the Government for other purposes; but the authority conferred upon them by that Vote of Credit had expired, and nothing was easier, if the Government wished to remain within the ordinary Constitutional practice, than to communicate with Parliament, who were sitting at the time, and ask for their approval at once and for a Vote of Credit. It was said, the other day, it was extremely desirable that the arrangements as to the despatch of Indian troops should not be made known. Why was it extremely desirable? That has not been explained. I can understand perfectly well that, when we are engaged in war, it may be desirable that all the arrangements of an Expedition should remain a profound secret as long as possible. We are not at war. It has been represented by the Government, over and over again, that it was not even a menace of war, but only one of a series of preparations. I should be rather inclined to call this, not in an invidious sense, a series of military demonstrations. But what is the object of that in a time of peace? To preserve peace, we are told. But how is that object to be accomplished, if the military demonstration is to be kept an absolute secret? If a demonstration is to produce any effect at all, the sooner and the more widely it is known the better. If a demonstration of the military power of this country was required, surely the demonstration would not have had a less, but a greater effect, if it had been looked upon, as it might and would have been, with the overwhelming approval of the House? I cannot see that the concealment of this movement by the Government from the House can have been intended for any other object than a deliberate assertion of the right of the Government, by the use of the Prerogative of the Crown, to make a use of our Indian Forces which has never before been attempted. Something was said about the difficulty that would have been placed in the way of making the arrangements by publicity. I should be glad to know whether the Government are still prepared to maintain that it was necessary to keep this secret from the House and from the public up to the very rising of the House of Commons, in order to facilitate the arrangements which would have to be taken? I have no desire to obstruct this operation of the Government, or this movement of Indian troops if, after deliberation, Parliament should consider it to have been a wise and well-considered step. I am not going to discuss the merits of the question now; but I do say that the House has a right, before expressing its approval of this proceeding, to consider well the grounds on which all information regarding it has been withheld from it. Now, I have only one or two words to say as to the Amendment to my Motion, which is to be moved by the Secretary of State for the Colonies. That Amendment asserts that the Constitutional control of Parliament is amply secured in two ways. It asserts that it is maintained by the provisions of the law, and by the undoubted power of this House to grant or refuse the Supplies. As to the provisions of the law, I do not know exactly to what provision the right hon. Gentleman refers. I have endeavoured to show that the Constitutional control of Parliament over the Army is rather the result of practice and of precedent than of any special enactment. I have endeavoured to show, also, that, in my opinion, the claim of the Government in this case is inconsistent with the Declaration contained in the Bill of Rights. Well, if that is so, then either the provisions of the law referred to in the Amendment are insufficient, or, if they are sufficient, they must have been violated. I do not know to what provision precisely the right hon. Gentleman refers. If he refers to the Act of 1858, to which I have alluded before, then I admit, with the right hon. Gentleman, that the provisions of the law would have been sufficient if they were observed. But, unfortunately, they have not been observed; and, I suppose, the Government would say, with good reason. But it is impossible to maintain that those provisions are sufficient, and also, at the same time, to maintain that they are such as, whenever an emergency arises, they must necessarily be broken. Then, as to the undoubted right of the House to grant or to refuse the Supplies, I have already endeavoured to prove—I think not altogether unsuccessfully—that Parliament has always required in the matter of the Army something more than the financial check for securing the control over it. Parliament possesses a financial control, undoubtedly, over every branch of the Administration. In the case of the Army, I have endeavoured to show that Parliament has required something more than that. But what does the financial control, to which the right hon. Gentleman refers, amount to? What is the question which will be put to this House, and which this House will have to answer, when the Estimate of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is submitted to us? That question will be, whether the House will recoup—whether it will provide for an expenditure which has already been incurred temporarily and illegally out of the Indian Revenues, and which, if this House refuses to make it good, must continue to be paid illegally

and unjustly out of those Indian Revenues? Sir, that is the sole question which will be put to the House when the Estimate is submitted; and how can it be maintained for a moment, when the discretion of the House is limited to answering "Aye" or "No" to such a question as this, that a control of that sort enables us to exercise any real or substantial control over a proceeding of this kind? There is no doubt that the financial control possessed by Parliament is a very substantial one when it is previously asked for. But when, as in this case, it is asked for only subsequently to the expenditure, and when no power of Parliament can prevent its being incurred, and it has only to pay the bill, then I say, if the Government which has taken on itself a responsibility of that character appeals to Party, and turns the question into a Vote of Confidence, Parliament has no check whatever. Well, the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman, not depending altogether on its argumentative part, concludes with something which is extremely like a Vote of Confidence in Her Majesty's Administration. I think it is a very unusual course for a Member of a Government to move a Vote of Confidence in his own Administration. That is a point on which I do not wish to dwell. But it appears to me that the effect of the conclusion of the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment—I do not know whether that is its intention—would be to widen the scope of this discussion. I have stated, at the outset of my remarks, why I thought it was desirable on many grounds—and mainly on consideration of what has been said by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—that a wide scope should not be given on this occasion to the discussion. If the Government now think that a different course should be taken, we shall know how to judge on a future occasion how much value is to be attached to representations such as those made to us a very short time ago by the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and we shall also be able to form some sort of an opinion on the relative value which is placed by Her Majesty's Government on the public interests and on Party convenience. No doubt, if Her Majesty's Government choose to put the question that I have raised aside by bringing forward a Vote of Confidence in themselves, it is perfectly within their competence to do so; and I have no doubt,

also, that it is within their competence to carry it. But I must say, in the interests of fair and free Parliamentary discussion, I think I have a right to protest against such a course as this, which, it seems to me, might be employed to cover or evade any breach whatever of the Constitution. These are all the remarks which I think it necessary to make with respect to the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman. I have endeavoured as well as I am able—and, I am afraid, most imperfectly—to lay before the House the great Constitutional issues which, I think, are raised by the proceedings of the Government in relation to the Constitution of this country; and I submit, with confidence, the Resolution of which I have given Notice to the judgment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, by the Constitution of this Realm, no Forces may be raised or kept by the Crown in time of peace, without the consent of Parliament, within any part of the Dominions of the Crown, excepting only such Forces as may be actually serving within Her Majesty's Indian Possessions."—(The Marquess of Hartington.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in rising to move the following Amendment:—

"That this House, being of opinion that the constitutional control of Parliament over the raising and employment of the Military Forces of the Crown is fully secured by the provisions of the Law, and by the undoubted power of this House to grant or refuse Supplies, considers it to be unnecessary and inexpedient to affirm any Resolution tending to weaken the hands of Her Majesty's Government in the present state of Foreign affairs,"

said: Sir, the last thing that I should wish to do would be to object to the raising and the full discussion of a Constitutional question, however inopportune the time, or however small the leisure at the disposal of this House. To us, at any rate, if to any Party in this House, the Constitution of our country should be dear; and all that I would say with regard to the action of the noble Marquess is, that I think it is a subject of congratulation for the present, and of happy augury for the future, that so strict and careful a jealousy for the English Constitution in matters relating to the control of the Army should be shown by those who are responsible for the Royal Warrant for the Abolition of Purchase. Now, the noble Marquess has raised this as a Constitutional question, and has complained, to some extent, that his Motion should be treated by us as a Vote of Censure. I have, Sir, but to refer to the mode in which that Motion has been received by some of his own Followers, to the Notices which have been withdrawn in its favour, and the support which has been given to it by certain obscure sections of people in the country, to justify us in regarding it as something more than an abstract discussion of Constitutional questions, and as being accepted, if not intended, as a Vote of Censure on Her Majesty's Government. Now, on our behalf, I have to say that we do not admit the accuracy of the statement of Constitutional or legal doctrines contained in this Resolution. We do not accept the argument of the noble Marquess as to our position in connection with the question; but we maintain that we have acted in this matter for the best interest of the Empire, and that in that action we have not in one tittle violated either the Constitution or the law of the Realm. And I must add that, to some extent, the circumstances in which this Motion has been proposed, carry with them its refutation. For what has happened in "another place?" There, if anywhere, both Parties in the State can muster their leading Constitutional authorities. There, if anywhere, a violation of the Constitution—had any occurred—would be discussed and voted upon with perfect freedom, independence, and absence of Party feeling; yet there it is that no one has ventured to propose a Motion that, in this matter, Her Majesty's Government have acted in violation of the law and Constitution of the country; and the action of the noble Marquess himself is, I think, an additional proof of the weakness of his case—for I have that belief in the straightforwardness of his character, that I am confident that if he had really believed that we had violated either the Constitution or the law, he would put that issue plainly to the House, and would not have contented himself with a Resolution of the character of a Constitutional truism. Now, what are we accused of having done? In the first place, there is no question whatever of the movement of foreign troops. The noble Marquess referred to debates on this subject a century old—debates of which the results were scarcely favourable to his view; because, whether in 1775 or 1794, both Houses of Parliament, by large majorities, approved the course of the Ministers of the day; and, when a Bill of Indemnity was proposed, perhaps under circumstances somewhat similar to those of the present Motion, by a noble Lord who was acting rather on account of the demands of his Followers than on his own view of the merits of the question, it was rejected by the House of Lords, not on account of the Preamble, but because it was inconsistent with the Vote they had come to, and no need whatever existed for the passing of such a Bill. I do not propose further to refer to those debates. The question now before the House is not a question of the movement of foreign troops, nor even of troops that can be separated from the other Forces of the Queen. What was the use of passing the India Act of 1858, if it did not assimilate and unite the East India Forces, whether European or Native, to the other Forces of the Crown? After having united these Forces into one Army, are we to be unable to use them? The argument of the noble Marquess, if carried to its full logical extent, would not merely hinder us from using the Native Indian Army, but must lead to its entire abolition; for what is the good of a Force that cannot be used by this country in the time, perhaps, of its greatest need? The Native Indian Army is as much a part of the Forces of the Crown as any other part of Her Majesty's Army; but we are told that the undoubted Prerogative of the Crown, under which the Army can be moved from one portion of the Empire to another, is limited in the case of these Indian Forces. Now, it rests with those who assert the existence of such a limitation to prove it; and I have failed to find, in the speech of the noble Marquess, any proof of the kind. I do not admit that there is anything in the Constitution or in the law which prohibits their movement to any part of Her Majesty's Dominions, unless it be to the United Kingdom. And, in connection with this subject, I must demur to the statement with which the Motion of the noble Marquess concludes, that the Forces actually serving within Her Majesty's Indian Dominions are excepted from the consent of Parliament. In the first place, I would remind the noble Marquess that the consent of Parliament implies something more than a Vote by this House in Committee of Supply; it implies something more than the mere recital of the numbers in the Preamble of the Mutiny Act; it implies an Act of Parliament; or, at any rate, a solemn Resolution arrived at by both Houses of Parliament. The noble Marquess admitted that it was not necessary to adhere strictly to the number of the Forces serving in this Kingdom enumerated in the Mutiny Act; but he added, that no increase to those numbers could be made without the consent of Parliament. Now, it is easy to prove that this enumeration in the Preamble of the Mutiny Act is really, so to speak, not an essential part of that Act, but a recitation of the Vote already arrived at by the House in Committee of Supply. Until 1717, the numbers were seldom mentioned in the Preamble of the Mutiny Act. From 1713 to 1812, the men serving in the Colonies, India, and the Peninsular, were not included. In later times, the numbers mentioned have not been invariably adhered to even in the United Kingdom. In 1820, many thousand men were raised beyond those mentioned in the Preamble of the Mutiny Act, Lord Palmerston defending it on the plea of urgency. In 1858, there were 15,000 men raised in excess of the numbers stated in the Preamble. And what happened in 1870? The Mutiny Act of that year was, as usual, passed early in the Session, and towards the close of the Session, in consequence of the state of foreign affairs, the right hon. Gentleman then Prime Minister, came down to the House of Commons and proposed, not a Vote of men, but a Vote of £2,000,000 to pay 20,000 men in addition to those already voted by the House. That Vote was passed by this House; but it cannot really be argued from that circumstance that the consent of Parliament was obtained to that increase of the Army, because a Vote of the House in Committee of Supply, as the hon. and learned Member for Oxford knows full well, is not the consent of Parliament. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: The Appropriation Act.] Does the hon. and learned Gentleman mean to say that the inclusion of the £2,000,000 to pay these men in the Appropriation Act is the consent of Parliament?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: As the right hon. Gentleman has appealed to me, I must say, that in the Appropriation Act of 1870, the number of men was mentioned as well as the money.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I am unable to refer to the Act at present; but my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer says, to the best of his recollection, that the numbers were not mentioned at all. But even if they were, are we to be told that the scruples of the noble Marquess are sufficiently met by the mere mention of the numbers in a Schedule of the Appropriation Act, an Act which deals with all the annual expenditure voted by Parliament, and which the House of Lords cannot amend. However, that is a point which the hon. and learned Gentleman can take up when he addresses the House. It is not material to the point I am arguing—namely, that the numbers named in the Preamble of the Mutiny Act have, on several occasions, not been taken as limiting the strength of the Army in the United Kingdom. And, further, if we are to consider the actual wording of the noble Marquess's Resolution, and include within the Forces of the Crown all those that can properly be included in that designation, it is notorious that the Army Reserve, the Militia, the Volunteers, and the Indo-European Forces, never have been included in the numbers mentioned in the Preamble of the Mutiny Act. Therefore, it by no means follows that, because any part of Her Majesty's Forces is not included in the numbers named in the Preamble of the Mutiny Act, that it is not raised with the consent of Parliament. There can be no question whatever that the Indian Army, though not mentioned in the Mutiny Act, is raised with the full consent of Parliament. The Native Indian Army was raised at first by virtue of the Charter of the East India Company. That Charter was confirmed by a series of Acts of Parliament which empowered them to make laws and regulations for the discipline of the Army. I think the first Act giving that power was the 53 Geo. III., c. 153; but the next is one to which I would call the special attention of the House, because it is very material to a branch of the question we are discussing—that is, the 4 Geo. IV., c. 81. That Act confirmed the previous Acts by which power was given to the East India Company to make regulations for the government of their Native Indian Forces—

“Whenever any portion of such Native troops shall be serving in any country or place out of the possessions or territories which are, or may be, under the government of the East India Company, whether such be the Dominions of His Majesty or elsewhere."

I think that clearly proves that the possible service of the Native Indian Army outside the possessions of the Company, and within the Dominions of His Majesty, was absolutely recognized by Parliament. The Act 3 & 4 Will. IV., c. 85, gave power to the Government of India to make Articles of War, and provided for courts martial wherever the troops might be serving; and, under the Articles of War framed under that Act, the Native troops are to go wheresoever they may be ordered, by land or by sea, and are to obey all the commands of the officers set over them, and courts martial might be held outside the limits of India. And now, Sir, I come to the last Act dealing with the subject—the Government of India Act. By that Act, the Forces of the Company were transferred to Her Majesty the Queen, and the 55th section of that Act, to which the noble Marquess has referred, clearly contemplates the service of those troops without the Indian Possessions of Her Majesty, and without the consent of Parliament. ["No, no!"] The words are—

That clearly implies, that in certain cases, these troops may be used beyond the limits of those Possessions without the special consent of Parliament. ["No, no!"] All that the section does is to provide that, except in such cases, the Revenues of India shall not be charged with the expense of using them, without the consent of Parliament. It does not hinder such use at any time, if the expense is otherwise borne; and anyone who will look at the debates on this section will see that it was carefully altered so as to meet objections which were made that, in its original shape, it interfered with the Prerogative of the Crown in moving these troops. But, if I turn from the law to the facts of the case, what do I find? I find that these Native Indian troops have frequently been so moved and used beyond the limits of Her Majesty's Indian Empire. It is not necessary to refer to cases in which they have been used in time of war. I will simply mention cases in which they have been moved to other places in Her Majesty's Dominions in time of peace. There are two special instances of that having been done—in the first place, a regiment of Madras Native Infantry garrisoned Singapore, after it was transferred to the Colonial Department, from April 1867 to 1871; and Hong Kong was similarly garrisoned from 1868 to 1871. I do not know whether it will be argued that those places are within the old limits of Her Majesty's Indian Possessions. I am glad the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) is not going to raise that, because it is a technicality unworthy of him. These places were recognized at the time as within the Dominions of Her Majesty, but not within Her Majesty's Indian Possessions; for, in the Estimates of the respective years in which they were employed, these Forces are referred to as "maintained beyond the limits of the Indian Empire." Therefore, I say, as a matter of fact, it has been held to be absolutely legal and Constitutional, in time of peace, for the Crown to employ these Native Indian Forces within Her Majesty's Dominions outside the Indian Empire, provided always that they are paid for by Parliament. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: They were voted.] I will come to the question of financial control later on. But more than this—I will venture to say that this Constitutional and legal objection raised by the Motion of the noble Marquess, has never been really accepted by any Party in this House till to-day; for what happened in 1868? A Committee was appointed by this House on the Motion of Major Anson, to inquire, amongst other matters, how far it might be desirable to employ certain portions of Her Majesty's Native Indian Army in our Colonial and Military Dependencies. I find it stated in the Report that the inquiries of the Committee were chiefly limited to the expediency of such employment. It then discussed questions of health, cost, and efficiency, and referred to a scheme of Sir Richard Temple for a partial substitution of Indian for English troops in certain places, including Malta and Gibraltar; and, finally, it came to a conclusion against making any considerable

change in the proposed direction, mainly on the ground of adverse military opinions and doubts as to the financial value of the measure. But, in the Report of that Committee, which appears to have been agreed to by the noble Marquess, who was himself a Member of it, there is not a word which points to any Constitutional or legal objection. Now, perhaps, it may be said that the facts I have endeavoured to lay before the House, if they prove anything, prove too much, and that if there is this complete power in the Crown of employing these Indian troops within Her Majesty's Dominions outside the limits of Her Indian Possessions, they may be brought into the United Kingdom. The question now before us is not the question of their employment within the United Kingdom at all. Whatever Constitutional doctrine may be laid down on that point by no means necessarily applies to the case before us. The noble Marquess appeared to object to any possible difference from the interpretation which he was pleased to put upon the word "Kingdom" in the Bill of Rights. He argued that any common-sense interpretation of that term must be held to extend to all the Dominions of the Queen with the exception of India. I believe that such an interpretation is unwarranted in law, and inaccurate in fact; and I think I have a higher authority to appeal to on the subject than even the great authorities quoted by the noble Marquess. The provisions of the Bill of Rights, as they originally stood, and as they were quoted in many successive Mutiny Acts, use these words, and these only—namely, "this Kingdom;" and when Great Britain and Ireland were united, Parliament itself supplied a definite interpretation of the term; because, from the year 1801, you will find that in substitution for the words "this Kingdom" in the Preamble of the Mutiny Act, these words occur—"the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland;" and, therefore, I say, that the view put forward by the noble Marquess, with regard to all the Dominions of the Crown being comprehended in the words of the Bill of Rights, is entirely unwarranted in point of law. But, further, there has been since the authoritative interpretation to which I have alluded, an actual occurrence which, I think, shows how the country and Parliament viewed the matter. At the time of the Crimean War, a German Legion was raised. In the Act authorizing that Legion to be raised, it was distinctly laid down that it should not serve within the United Kingdom. It did not serve within the United Kingdom; but it did serve in Malta, and it did serve at the Cape. In this instance, therefore, a clear distinction was purposely drawn between service in the United Kingdom and in other parts of Her Majesty's Dominions. But, besides being unwarranted in law, the view adopted by the noble Marquess is also inaccurate in fact; he asks this House to declare that—

Now, if we are to read these words literally, they must be subject to an interpretation which in his speech the noble Marquess repudiated. I cannot help thinking, that when he gave Notice of this Resolution, he had forgotten the existence of Forces which throughout our Colonies are raised for the service of the Crown—the existence of those Colonial Forces which may at some day play so important a part in the defence of our United Empire. He says that he does not mean to include the Colonial Militia; but there are Colonies in which not only a Militia, but a Force is raised in form the same as our standing Army, under the powers of the Colonial Parliaments and the Prerogative of the Crown. No doubt such Forces are at present small in numbers; but they are likely greatly to extend, with the increasing desire of the Colonies to take measures for their defence against any possible attack by an enemy of the Empire. In New South Wales and Victoria Forces are permanently maintained—mainly artillery—under the Colonial Acts, without the consent of the Imperial Parliament, for the defence of the Colonial harbours and towns liable not only for service in the Colony, but to embark and serve according to regulations to be made by the Governor; and, according to the words of the Resolution, it would be contrary to the Constitution of this Realm that these Forces should be raised and maintained. Now, I listened with great attention to the speech of the noble Marquess to ascertain precisely where it was that this great Constitutional crime which he imagines us to have committed was to be found. I fail to detect exactly what that crime is; but it appears to me, from his speech, that the whole question at issue is one of the financial control of this House. I do not gather that he disputes that the movement of those troops was within the Prerogative of the Crown. I do not think he disputed that we were justified in advising that movement. I do not think he disputed—I believe he agreed—that we should be performing our duty if we proposed a Vote to the House to defray the expense of that movement. The whole point of his speech, it seems to me, turns upon this—that the Vote was not moved before these Forces were actually ordered to be sent to Malta. It is usual, I admit, and in every way proper and convenient, that, before expenditure is incurred, this House should be asked to sanction that expenditure. There have, however, been numerous cases in which that salutary doctrine has been departed from, on account of the special circumstances of the time, and we maintain that the special circumstances of the present case were such as to warrant our taking this action on our own responsibility before proposing a Vote to the House of Commons. We may, in this matter, have been somewhat to blame for having done that which, I am bound to say, we have very rarely felt disposed to do—for having accepted the advice of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. I find that the right hon. Gentleman, not very long ago, used the following words with reference to our action in proposing a Vote of Credit to this House:—

“If a sudden emergency did arise, the Government must know their duty too well to wait for a Vote of this House. No Government worthy of its place but would, on a sudden emergency, give the orders which the circumstances of the time might demand, and then come down at the earliest moment in their power to ask the concurrence of the House in what they had done. Undoubtedly, that is the principle on which all Governments have acted in this country: a principle which has never been challenged.”

Now, that is precisely the course which we have adopted. The real difference between us and those who sit upon the other side of the House is this—that they disbelieve in the reality of the present crisis. I admit that we are not at this moment—and I hope we may not be—in a state of war. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] I have not asked the House to consider the precedents under which, in a state of war, expenditure has been incurred by Governments before the sanction of this House was obtained. I may, however, be allowed to refer to one instance—that of the Abyssinian Expedition—in which an Expeditionary Force was sent out without a state of war existing, composed of Native Indian troops. That Force arrived in Abyssinia on the 26th of September, 1867, but the Vote of Credit was not moved until the 26th of November in the same year; yet I am not aware that Parliament at the time considered that any Constitutional or legal rule had been broken, or even infringed, by that course of proceeding. But, again, I say we differ from the noble Marquess and many of his Followers in our appreciation of the circumstances of the present crisis. It is not a time of war; but is it a time of peace, in the real meaning of that term? This House has sanctioned the Declaration on the part of Her Majesty that the present is a time of emergency; and it was because we believed that it was a time of emergency that we thought it necessary to show quickly and decisively to the world that we were able, if need be, to wield the Forces of an united Empire. The time that elapsed from the date when the decision was arrived at, to the date at which local circumstances in India rendered it necessary that the Expedition should sail, was but very short for the purpose of settling all the practical difficulties that had to be arranged; and that might, perhaps, have prevented the departure of the Expedition within the time allotted. What would have been said of us if we had come down to this House and announced to the world that this policy was to be adopted, and it had been afterwards found that the practical difficulties to which I have just referred had prevented its execution? We believed, that, in order to insure the successful carrying out of that policy, it was necessary that until the actual movement of the troops occurred, the sanction given by the Government should be kept secret; and, so far as we were concerned, we were anxious that that secrecy should be maintained longer than turned out to be actually possible. We took this course, because we knew that, in spite of the attacks of those who have long been endeavouring to mislead foreign nations as to the real feeling of this country, and who now would seek to minimize her power and depreciate the valour and the loyalty of their fellow-subjects in India—our policy would receive the approbation of a patriotic Parliament. We knew this, because that policy was but the natural if not the necessary complement of what Parliament had already approved as the only one which was really likely to secure an honourable and a permanent peace. If the noble Marquess the Leader of the Opposition differs from the course which we have felt it our duty to pursue, I would venture to suggest that he might more properly meet it with an alternative policy than with a Constitutional Motion, which, after all, is but a shelter for all kinds of objectors to the policy of the Government. If he approves the course we have taken, surely we have a right to ask for his support. We have, at any rate, a right to ask the House if they mistrust us, to relieve us from those onerous and difficult duties which, for more than two years past, we have been endeavouring to perform. But if, in their opinion, we are to be maintained in the position which we have the honour to hold, then let them, by their votes, support us against the petty cavils, the ceaseless misrepresentations, and the vulgar personalities of those who appear to believe everything that is good of foreign Ministers, and nothing but what is bad of their own countrymen.

MR. FAWCETT: Mr. Speaker, I rise to Order. I ask you, as a matter of Order, whether it is usual for a Member of this House, without specifying names, to charge a section of this House with vulgar personalities?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH rose to continue his speech, but—

MR. FAWCETT again appealed to the Speaker to say whether the right hon. Baronet was in Order in using the words which he had just mentioned?

MR. SPEAKER: I understood the right hon. Baronet was about to make an explanation of the words he used. The House will hear his explanation.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH: I am bound to say that when I used those words I had in my mind not the statement of any hon. Member made in this House or out of it, but personal attacks on the Government, and mainly on the Prime Minister, such as those which were made by members of a certain deputation who waited on a Member of the late Government—I forget who it was—and whose expressions I think fully deserved the application to them of the words which I employed. I appeal to this House to support the Government against attacks of this nature made out-of-doors, not so much because we who now sit here happen to be the existing Government of the day, as because I believe it to be the true English principle that in a time of national difficulty the Ministers of the Crown, as such, irrespective of differences in domestic politics, are entitled to the support of all patriotic citizens. Sir, I trust that this House, by rejecting the Motion of the noble Marquess, and adopting in lieu of it the Amendment which I have placed upon the Paper, will not only declare that, in its opinion, the hands of Her Majesty's Government ought not to be weakened in the present state of foreign affairs, but will also say, with no uncertain voice, that the policy we have ventured to adopt, while consistent with the Law and Constitution of England, is calculated to prove to the world that when danger threatens us the ties of our Empire will be drawn but closer and closer still; and that in defence of the cause, as we believe it to be, of right and freedom and of civilization, we can, if necessary, marshal, not only the inhabitants of the small Islands within these narrow seas, but the peoples of distant shores and varied climes, united by those ocean waves which are at once the symbol and the bond of the world-wide Dominions of our Queen.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House, being of opinion that the constitutional control of Parliament over the raising and employment of the Military Forces of the Crown is fully secured by the provisions of the Law, and by the undoubted power of this House to grant or refuse Supplies, considers it to be unnecessary and inexpedient to affirm any Resolution tending to weaken the hands of Her Majesty's Government in the present state of Foreign affairs,"—(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)—instead thereof.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that the right hon. Baronet who had just sat down (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had spoken of the strength of England; but there was something which was even more peculiar to her than her strength, and something, therefore, of which Britons were more proud—and that was that freedom which had been expressed in the maxims in which the ancient Constitutional liberties of the Realm were stated. It was to be regretted that the right hon. Baronet should have replied to the noble Marquess in a tone and manner so different from his, and that he should have ventured to have complained of the importation of personality into the question; when it had been imported into the debate, indeed, but only by himself. The right hon. Baronet had begun his speech by a tu quoque argument, and had attacked the occupants of the front Opposition bench for having strained the Prerogative some years ago in the issue of the Purchase Warrant. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had protested against their action at the time, and had spoken against it frequently; and when the present Government denounced, and, as he thought, rightly, Lord Granville's conduct, in not proposing to take a division in the Lords, it should be borne in mind that in the Purchase Warrant case the present Prime Minister had not ventured to divide the Commons. But when the right hon. Baronet was defending the conduct of the present Government in the present case, he should have seen that that conduct had to be defended, not to their Predecessors, but to the House of Commons as a whole. The acts of the late Ministry had nothing to do with the question now before the House; and if it were important that England should make a show of her strength, it was still more important, and far more likely to impress foreign nations, that she should stand forth as the champion of Constitutional freedom. What was the case presented by the right hon. Baronet against the terms of the Resolution of the noble Marquess? Almost in the same breath he said—"I do not admit the accuracy of the Constitutional doctrine contained in the Motion of the noble Marquess," and "the Resolution is a Constitutional truism!" Which did he mean? If it were constitutionally inaccurate, it hardly could be a Constitutional truism; and if it were a Constitutional truism, it could hardly be constitutionally inaccurate. The right hon. Baronet then went on to allude to the so-called precedent of 1775. Now, the events of 1775 had no bearing whatever on the present case, although the debates of 1775 had a most important connection with it, as he would show. What was done in 1775 had no importance, because it was done in time of war, as both Parties in that day allowed; but what was said in 1775 was of the highest moment. The right hon. Baronet, with commendable ingenuity, had taken note of what was done, and had made no reference to what was said. The right hon. Baronet had completely misrepresented the scope of the Motion of the noble Marquess, when he had declared that it might "prevent a Government from using the Indian Army in the time of our greatest need." Not at all. No one wished to prevent a Government from using the Indian Army in a time of need. That our Indian troops might be employed in time of war was perfectly admitted by hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House, and even their employment in time of peace was not objected to, provided only that the previous consent of Parliament was asked. The right hon. Baronet had then gone on to contend that there was nothing in the Bill of Rights to prevent the use of Indian troops in any portion of the Dominions of the Crown, except only in the United Kingdom, and upon this point he must be reminded, not of what had been done in 1775, but of what had in that year been said. The speeches, from which he would quote, were the speeches of two legal Peers of the highest name and fame, one of whom was, indeed, Lord Chancellor at the time. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had some respect for the legal dicta of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Colonies; but he had even higher respect for the direct opinion of the Lord Chancellor of the day, directly given by way of admission against his own case when arguing in support of the Prerogative; given amid general assent, and in terms the accuracy of the report of which could not be impeached, inasmuch as the words were over and over again quoted and referred to in the course of the debates. Lord Chancellor Bathurst [Parl. History, vol. xviii. p. 815] distinctly admitted that the words "within the Kingdom" applied to Gibraltar and

Malta, and that there was in 1775 "a rebellious war" also "within the Kingdom"—that is to say, in the Colonies in America. The right hon. Baronet next came to the so-called precedent of 1870, and displayed his utter inability to grasp the question that was at issue, by failing to see that the case of 1870 told altogether against his view. Why, in 1870, the number of men—20,000—was voted by the House, and, after being voted, was distinctly referred to in an Appropriation Act. He would make a fair offer to the Government—let them now place the number of men distinctly in the Estimates; let them refer to it again in the Appropriation Act, and not another word should be said upon the question of legality, although there would remain much to be said upon the Constitutional aspect of their policy, and upon the discourtesy with which they had treated Parliament. The right hon. Baronet had next taken up a different line of defence, and one inconsistent with that which he had adopted in the previous portion of his speech. He seemed to have tried a number of arguments which answered one another, in the hope that, if all but one should be upset, some single one might yet remain which would hold good. After arguing that the Bill of Rights did not prevent the Crown from raising an Army in time of peace anywhere in the Realm outside of the United Kingdom, he proceeded, a little later, to contend that even the Indian Army itself was raised with the consent of Parliament. That contention was utterly untrue. Parliament neither voted the number of men nor paid them. But, said the right hon. Baronet, their service outside of India was always contemplated. No doubt it was in time of war, but the present was a time of peace. The right hon. Baronet further contended that the words "other sudden and urgent necessity" covered the point. In the first place, he would reply, without going into the question of whether any "sudden and urgent necessity" existed in Europe at the present time, that the word "other," taken in connection with the word "invasion," which preceded it, and which, undoubtedly, applied to India alone, showed that the meaning of the words "other sudden and urgent necessity," was a sudden and urgent necessity applying directly to India. What was the clause? A clause, declaring that the troops when employed outside of India should not be paid by India except in certain cases. Those cases, of course, must be cases which referred to India. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] He was glad to see that the right hon. Gentleman, who, in 1858, had first brought before Parliament the necessity for such a clause, expressed his full assent to that view. Moreover, if it should be again contended that the words "sudden and urgent necessity" applied to the needs of the Empire in general, he would further reply that Parliament was sitting when Government decided to use these troops, and that to Parliament the question should have been referred. The right hon. Baronet then came to certain cases of the use outside of India of Indian troops. He first named the case of a Madras regiment which served at Singapore from 1867 to 1871. Those troops, he would point out, were left in Singapore, which had been part of India. It would be found that they were mentioned in the Estimates voted by that House. The right hon. Baronet then alluded to the case of some troops who served at Hong Kong at the same time. They also were mentioned in the Estimates. The Amendment of the right hon. Baronet said that the control of Parliament over these troops was secured by the provisions of the law, and by the power of the House to refuse Supplies. What law? No law but the Bill of Rights, which the Government had broken. What power to refuse Supplies? On the 3rd of March, 1864, that eminent Conservative Minister, General Peel, had, by anticipation, directly answered the eminent, but less eminent, Conservative Minister who had just spoken—

and by these words they would see directly that General Peel had meant a previous Vote—

"of this House, those troops are altogether removed from Parliamentary control. In the case of ordinary troops there are two checks—the Mutiny Act, and the money voted by Parliament for the pay of the troops. Neither of these checks apply to Indian troops. Native Indian troops are not liable to the Mutiny Act, being expressly excluded from the operation of that measure; and the House has no control over Native troops through its privilege as to money Votes, because those troops are paid in the first instance by the Indian Government, and the expenditure never comes under the notice of the British Parliament until long after it has been incurred."

The right hon. Baronet had next referred to the Report of a Committee which had inquired, in 1867, into the employment of Indian troops outside of India. His noble Friend the Leader of the Opposition and his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) had both of them been Members of that Committee, and had been present at the discussion of its Report. They would correct him if he were wrong; but he had read the Report of that Committee, and the evidence submitted to it, and it was obvious that the Committee had all along assumed that Parliament should be consulted in any arrangement which might be made. [Mr. CHILDERS: Hear, hear!] It had never occurred to that Committee that any sane Minister would ever suggest a contrary course. The right hon. Baronet had then referred to the so-called precedent of the German Legion. Now, most of the "precedents" of the right hon. Baronet failed only in a single point. It was true that that point was invariably essential; but, in the dearth of precedents, he could not afford to be too particular. This German Legion precedent failed in every point, and the right hon. Baronet ought to be fairly ashamed of himself for having mentioned it. It was raised in time of war, the number of men were specified and voted, not one single step was taken without previous communication to Parliament, and the whole of the conditions of the service of the Legion were laid down in an Act of Parliament which was passed before it had been raised. At last, however, the right hon. Baronet thought that he had found a precedent which really did apply. There was "a small Artillery Force in Victoria and in New South Wales." He was not in a position to impugn the accuracy of that statement. How many of them were there? Did the right hon. Baronet think that there were 100? Would he swear that there were 50? He was Colonial Secretary, and he ought to know. Was it not the case that this Colonial Artillery Force was a local Force, serving under a Colonial Act, which would prevent their being employed outside the Colony, not only in time of peace but even in time of war itself, without the consent of the Colonial Parliament? After concluding his argument with regard to the Colonial Force, the right hon. Baronet turned to the case of Abyssinia. Abyssinia was not "within the Realm," and the times were times of war. The Abyssinian case was certainly not a case of increasing the standing Army within the Realm in time of peace. It should be observed, that at the very same moment Indian troops were being employed at Hong Kong, and that these, so employed in British Territory, were being voted by the House. Moreover—[Hansard, vol. cxc. p. 359]—the present Leader of the House came down to the House and apologized, over and over again, for the illegality which he had committed in the Abyssinian case, and threw himself upon the hands of the House, supplicating Parliament in the most humble terms. The point upon which the Opposition were now insisting was this legal and Constitutional point—that, never in time of peace, and not even in time of war if Parliament were sitting, and a fortiori never in time of peace when Parliament was sitting, ought the standing Army, authorized with special regard to the state of our foreign relations and to the needs of our Colonies and fortresses, to be increased without the previous consent of Parliament. The right hon. Baronet, who had first denied "the accuracy of the Constitutional doctrine contained in the Motion of the noble Marquess," and had then proceeded to call it "a Constitutional truism," had left the House in the dark as to how far he really contested the Constitutional principle for which the Opposition were contending. The works of those great authorities, Hallam and De Lolme, clearly showed that the Resolution of the noble Marquess exactly expressed the Constitutional doctrine applicable to the present case. These were the words of De Lolme—

"The King cannot raise Land Forces without consent of Parliament. In these times, however, when it is become a custom with Princes, . . . Parliament has thought proper to establish a standing body of troops. . . . But this Army is only established for one year; and at the end of that term it is (unless re-established) ipso facto disbanded; and as the question which then lies before Parliament is not whether the Army shall be dissolved, but whether it shall be established anew as if it had never existed, any one of the three branches of the Legislature may, by its dissent, hinder its continuance."

ment, spoke first of law, and next of the Votes of Supply. As had been pointed out, it was impossible to discern from his speech what law he could mean, except it were the Bill of Rights, the provisions of which had been infringed. But the contention of his speech appeared to be that the real control of Parliament lay in its power to refuse Supply. Now, it must be remembered, that this power, if unaccompanied by other forms of control, could be evaded—for instance, by private subscription, such as that proposed by Pitt in 1794, by supply granted by a Colony, by subsidy from an Ally, or by requisitions upon an occupied country. Let them suppose, for instance, that the Indian troops were to be detained in Egypt, and paid by the Khedive in return for a guarantee of the Sovereignty of Egypt to himself and heirs—such an employment of Indian troops, according to the right hon. Baronet, would be Constitutional, although no Estimate would be laid, no Supply would be asked, and no control of Parliament would exist. It was clear that, even in a fuller sense than had been argued by General Peel, the voting of Supply was an illusory manner of exercising the control of the House of Commons over the numbers of the Indian troops. In 1816, when a Treaty was signed between the Crown of England and the Crown of France, by which an English garrison in Paris and in Northern France was to be maintained at the expense of France, the English House of Commons insisted that the number of men to be so employed in France and paid by France should be voted by that House. The dangers which lay in the contrary course, dangers not probable but possible, conceivable, against which it was the duty of the House to guard, could only be effectively prevented by compelling Government, in all cases, to ask the previous consent of Parliament to any augmentation of the Forces of the Crown. If such a step were taken suddenly, on a great emergency—a really great one—Government must come for a Bill of Indemnity, which, if their action had been defensible, would be freely granted by the House. If the King were to be allowed to increase the standing Army within the Realm in time of peace, without previous reference to Parliament, he was thus permitted to impose charges upon his people without the assent of Parliament. For Parliament could not refuse to pay the soldiers who, in obedience to military commands, had been brought within the Realm. The Government had no kind of right to pre-assume the approval of that House, to take a novel step which could not be undone without punishing innocent persons and destroying the credit of the Realm. There was behind the present case this fact—that if the House refused to supply money for the payment of these troops, the expense would illegally be charged upon the Revenues of India—a starving country, which had been suffering from famine within the year, and the finances of which were in a condition of decay. If there were put before the House the alternative of either condemning the illegal action which the Ministers had committed, or of illegally burdening the Revenues of India with this charge, there could be no doubt what course generous Englishmen would adopt. He thought it a grave stretching of the principles of the Constitution to bring the Indian troops to Europe on the assumption that the consent of Parliament would be given; but, if angry debates should arise on the occasion, Members opposite would have to thank their Leader, because of the light manner in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had treated the matter at the first meeting of the House after the Recess. It was the right hon. Gentleman who had caused the proposal of the Motion of the noble Marquess. The Opposition had been placed by him under the necessity of either allowing dirt to be thrown on their principles, or else of exposing a Resolution, expressing the high Constitutional view, to the chance of rejection upon the votes of a docile band. The Amendment of the right hon. Baronet was what the lawyers termed a plea in confession and avoidance. As between the Amendment and the Resolution of the noble Marquess, which way would the great authorities on the English Constitution pronounce themselves were they present in the House? Which way would Hallam vote, if he were there? It might be answered that Hallam was a Whig; but, to be frank, most men had of late times come to think that the Whig view of the Constitution, however much it had been ridiculed in the early novels of the present Premier, was nevertheless in these days accepted by both sides. Hallam's History, for instance, Whig book though it was, was the text book of both the older Universities; and the modern Tory voters, who last week had given so triumphant a majority at Oxford to their side, had certainly, many of them, been trained on Hallam in doctrines very different to those which were being taught them by their Leaders now. There was a passage in Hallam, of which he would remind them in case they had forgotten it, in which he declared that that was unconstitutional which was "a novelty of much importance, tending to evade the existing law." Those words appeared exactly to describe the present proceeding of the Government. There ought immediately to be issued, for the use of the next generation of Conservative Undergraduates, an expurgated edition of Hallam, in which this and many other leading passages would be left out, even if Oxford and Cambridge were not compelled to accept as a brand-new text book, the Constitution according to Lord Beaconsfield. To turn for a few moments to the historical view of this question, let him call the attention of the House to some words which fell from Lord Winchilsea in 1734, and which were exactly applicable to the present situation—

"If Parliament should come into the practice of raising phantoms in the air, as an excuse for their granting extraordinary powers to Ministers of State, the liberties of this nation will then begin to stand upon a very precarious footing."—[Parl. History, vol. ix. p. 556.]

Those debates of 1734 did not, as a whole, help them much, for that was done which had not been done on the present occasion—namely, the previous consent of Parliament was asked to the augmentation of the Forces; but there was much in the language which was made use of in the debates that was of the highest moment. They should not lightly forget, for instance, these words of Shippen—

"We all know how difficult it is to refuse to the King upon the Throne those favours or powers which have been granted to his Predecessor; and, therefore, it has always been the established maxim of every honest man, who had a seat in either House of Parliament, not to grant to a good King those powers which a bad King might make ill-use of."—[Ibid. 583.]

As for the precedent of 1775, he had pointed out already that it did not apply; but the debate of 1775 was worthy of the most careful consideration by the House. The doctrine which he collected, by reading the India Act of 1858 in connection with the debates of 1775, was the following:—The territory of the Crown was, for military purposes, of two kinds; there was what might be called the Parliamentary Kingdom, garrisoned by troops subject to the English Mutiny Act, and there was India. Parliament left it to the Crown to keep up in India such Military Forces as the Advisers of the Crown thought fit. As regarded the Parliamentary Empire, the countries garrisoned by troops subject to the English Mutiny Act—or, in other words, the whole of the Dominions of the Crown, except India—Parliament did not leave it to the Advisers of the Crown to settle what Forces should be kept up; but Parliament itself, after hearing the statement of the Secretary of State for War, annually considered what Force was necessary, taking into account all the circumstances of the case and the state of international relations. Having considered all those facts, Parliament annually voted the number of men, and then passed an Act, the Preamble of which recited that number, and exhaustively specified and explained the whole of the reasons for which the men were needed. It must be obvious that if the Crown could bring the non-Parliamentary Army, the numbers of which were not voted, and which might be indefinitely great, into the Parliamentary territory without the previous consent of Parliament, all their present trouble—annual trouble—over the number of men and the Preamble of the Mutiny Bill was mere idle waste of time. Parliament, in sanctioning the numbers of the Parliamentary Army, had regard to the need for placing garrisons at Halifax, Bermuda, the Channel Islands, the Cape, Gibraltar, Malta, Aden, Ceylon, the Straits, Hong Kong, Vancouver Island, and so forth; but, if what Ministers had done was legal, the whole of these garrisons might be brought into Great Britain or into Ireland without the previous consent of Parliament and replaced by Indian troops. The right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Colonies had said that Parliament had approved of what was done in 1775. Now, it was quite true that the Bill of Indemnity, which was assented to by Lord North, and which passed through the Lower House, was thrown out in the Lords; but, in 1775, the Electoral troops of George III., who had been sent without the previous assent of Parliament to garrison Gibraltar and Minorca, had been sent there in time of war, for it was admitted on both sides that the American Rebellion constituted a state of war. Parliament, too, was not sitting in 1775 at the time the troops were sent, and as soon as it met, it was informed of what had been done by means of a Royal Message. Parliament had been treated with vastly greater courtesy in 1775 than had been extended to it now. On the consideration of the Message of the King, a Resolution had been moved by the Duke of Manchester, which declared—

[First Night.]

“That the bringing into any part of the Dominions of the Crown of Great Britain the Electoral Troops of His Majesty, . . . without the previous consent of Parliament, is dangerous and unconstitutional.”—[Parl. History, vol. 18, p. 801.]

In the Commons, the Whig Motion had been in the following words:—

“That the introducing the Hanoverian Troops into any part of the Dominions belonging to the Crown of Great Britain, without the consent of Parliament first had and obtained, is contrary to law.”—[Ibid, p. 818.]

How were these Resolutions met? Lord North moved that the measure was one—

That defence could not be made on this occasion. Parliament was actually sitting when the movement was decided on by the Cabinet, and there was no question of the immediate employment of these troops. The Government of 1775 most certainly had not taken the line of the right hon. Baronet the present Secretary of State as to the scope of the Bill of Rights. It might be added, that, even with regard to a time of war, the Tory doctrine was not admitted by the leading Whigs in 1775. The Duke of Manchester, omitting the words “in time of war,” declared—

“From every instance I have submitted to you, and from constant practice, I must infer that the King has no right to maintain, in any part of the Dominions of the British Crown, any Troops, other than are consented to by Parliament, both as to number and to nation.”

The Protest of the Lords, which was signed by the Dukes of Richmond, Portland, Grafton, Manchester, and Devonshire, by the Marquess of Rockingham, and by many other Peers of great Constitutional authority, declared—

“That Hanoverian Troops should, at the pleasure of the Minister, be considered a part of the British Military Establishment . . . tends wholly to invalidate the wise and salutary declaration of the grand fundamental law, which has bound together the rights of the subject and the succession of the Crown.”

Lord North, in answer to these speeches and declarations, had at first maintained, but, ultimately, by consenting to a Bill of Indemnity, had half given up, a Prerogative which had gone to this extent, that in time of War the Crown might employ troops out of the United Kingdom without the previous consent of Parliament. But they were not now at war, and he ventured to maintain that the Resolution of the noble Marquess, containing, as it did, the words “in time of peace,” would have received the assent even of Lord North. Mr. Clode, who was the chief authority upon The Military Forces of the Crown, declared that—

“It can no longer be questioned that the assent of Parliament is needed to the continuance of any armed Force within the Realm in time of peace.”

He explained that the Vote and the Preamble of the Mutiny Act, taken together, gave to the Crown the right to employ in the Army the number of men specified, and no more. And he then said—

“If ever the Crown should intentionally retain in arms a larger number of Forces than has been agreed upon, the Minister upon whose advice this course had been adopted would be open to impeachment.”

These were not times in which there was such danger of the invasion of the liberty of the subject that any man would seriously propose the impeachment of a Minister; but, nevertheless, they ought to guard against the setting of a mischievous precedent. He would make but one further allusion to the debates of 1775, and that would be a quotation. Serjeant Adair, a great Constitutional authority, had in that debate made use of words which, in another sense, were applicable to the existing situation, when he had said—

"Of all Foreign Troops, the most dangerous are those who are the subjects of the King, and not of . . . Parliament."

And he might add that, as regarded the employment of the Native Indian troops, they were calling in men who, whatever might be their military virtue, could neither esteem nor understand the laws and liberties of the English people. Besides the debates of 1775, there were many others of a later date, in which similar doctrines had been accepted by both sides. For instance, those of 1794 and those of 1798, when Parliament recognized that even voluntary offers of aid from British subjects in time of war required Parliamentary sanction. In 1803 it had, indeed, been allowed that the number of ordinary volunteers need not be limited by Statute, because any volunteer not on actual service could resign without the assent of the Crown. In 1816 there occurred the debates to which he had already briefly alluded, and to which he would now recur; only mentioning in passing that in 1800, and again in 1806, Mr. Pitt came down to the House and asked the previous assent of Parliament to the augmentation of the Forces of the Crown, even though it was time of war. In 1816, it would be remembered that it had been arranged between the English and French Governments that the English garrisons of Paris and of Picardy were to be paid by France. The right hon. Baronet maintained that the necessity for voting Supply was sufficient to meet all cases; but, certainly, it did not meet the case of 1816; and Parliament, in 1816, insisted that the number of men intended for these English garrisons to be paid by France, even though they were not to be maintained within the Realm, should previously be voted by that House. There were many other cases which went to show that the financial control referred to in the Amendment was not enough. He would mention one which occurred in the recollection of many hon. Members still in that House. He referred to the Chelsea Pensioners Bill, which was opposed by Mr. Cobden and by the right hon. Gentleman who now sat for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright); and, although the number of pensioners was not at first stated in the Bill, yet it was afterwards specified in deference to the objections that were raised. All the later debates that had been referred to bore upon the state of things in time of war. There was one case which had not been named, which was not a case of war, and which might possibly be referred to as a precedent. He meant the occupation of Quettah—which was outside India—by Indian troops two years ago. Quettah was not "within the Realm." No one could possibly maintain that the Bill of Rights applied to Quettah; but it was certainly his view that the charging on the Revenues of India of the expenses of the Quettah operations was a breach of the 55th clause of the Indian Government Act. He hoped that if the Quettah case were to be quoted as a precedent, the question of its legality would yet be brought forward and carefully debated by the House. To return to the main question, the old Constitutional doctrine took no account of any differences between any one part and any other part of the Dominions of the Crown. In the days of Lord North, it was generally allowed that "the King's Prerogative is no greater in one part of his Dominions than another." In the panic of 1858, they had unfortunately changed all this, and accepted the direct government by the Crown of a despotically-ruled community, the laws of which were not the laws of England. This fact was first brought home to the people of England by the adoption, under the auspices of the present Minister, of a despotic title to apply to that portion of the Dominions of the Crown. Parliament was now asked to condone a fresh act of the same kind, but one taken without even the observance of Constitutional form, and which, if approved, would bring about a permanent confusion between the Parliamentary and the non-Parliamentary portions of the Realm. He had tried to keep closely to the Constitutional argument; but, in replying to that which had been urged upon the other side, there were two special circumstances of the present case to which it was necessary to allude. They were told that there was a need for secrecy. For what purpose? These troops were not to act. It was by the mere bringing of them that Russia was to be impressed. Surely, the impression would have been more profound had a communication been made to Parliament by means of Message, and the consent of Parliament obtained? The ground for secrecy given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was no military necessity, but the saving of a few thousand pounds in transport. The House had already been told by the highest authorities upon the subject that the money had not been saved, and could not have been saved; and, even if there were this reason for the concealment for about a fortnight, while the arrangements for the transport were being made, there could be no such reason for continuing the concealment up to the Easter Recess, when it was certain that the news would become known. He could not but think, judging from the date at which one of the ships of Lord John Hay's Squadron had sailed with sealed orders, which had ultimately proved to be orders to convoy the Indian troops back to Malta, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer's memory must have failed him when he had given the House the dates a few days before that time. The second circumstance peculiar to the present case, which must also be briefly mentioned, was that it had become clear that the Crown was maintaining in India—a famine-stricken, an almost bankrupt, and a wholly unrepresented country—a Native Army larger than was needed for its defence. They were, in short, burdening India for Imperial purposes with a charge which, from a purely Indian point of view, must be a needless charge. In conclusion, he complained, in the first place, of the illegality which had been committed; in the second, that, even according to the views of the Tories of the last century, a grossly unconstitutional method of proceeding had been followed; and, in the third, that an act of great discourtesy had been done towards Parliament.

MR. GOLDNEY said, he was prepared to argue that the question of the Bill of Rights, on which the whole issue now before the House turned, was much more limited than had been assumed by preceding speakers. The wording of the Preamble of the Bill of Rights showed that it was intended to be limited to this Kingdom alone; while, on the other hand, under the existing and preceding Mutiny Acts, the Indian Forces, having been directly recognized by Parliament as the Forces of the Kingdom, were placed under the Prerogative of the Crown. In the early Mutiny Acts the number was not mentioned. The present

Act stated that it was necessary that a body of Forces should be employed for the safety of the Kingdom and the defence of the Possessions of Her Majesty, and that the whole should number 135,452 men "exclusive of those actually serving in Her Majesty's Indian Possessions;" and the Prerogative of the Crown obviously gave the Queen the power of moving these latter as she might think fit. In 1867, after the Indian Forces had become part of the Forces of the nation, Colonel Anson moved for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire how far they should be employed elsewhere than in India, and no person ever questioned the right of the Crown to deal with these Forces, and when the subject was brought before the Committee, no question was raised as to whether such employment would be unconstitutional. It was proved, in the course of the evidence taken before that Committee, that the Governor General of India had actually made provision that the troops should serve outside of India by issuing a General Order refusing the services of anyone who would not undertake at the time of enlistment to serve anywhere as required. Beyond that, Sir Richard Temple had proposed to send Indian troops to China, Africa, Malta, and Gibraltar. The question had been raised whether, under the Bill of Rights, the Queen could exercise Her Prerogative, without the consent of Parliament, in moving these Indian troops. Now, he contended that the Forces set out in the Mutiny Bill comprised not only those there enumerated, but the troops employed in India; and it had been clearly contemplated by the authorities in India that any troops employed there might be called upon to serve in any portion of the Queen's Dominions; because, under the Indian Act, the Governor General had the power to frame Articles of War binding on the Native troops, in whatever part of the world they might from time to time be called upon to serve. He contended, therefore, that it was in the power of the Crown, seeing that it was contemplated that Indian troops might be employed to garrison our Mediterranean fortresses, to do all that they had done. The idea was not new, but the opposition was entirely novel, and was a condemnation of powers which had hitherto never been challenged. The Resolution was framed on the assumption that the Mutiny Act, by containing the word "excepting," did not confer this power; but he, on the other hand, held that it did not comprise that word, and that the control of Parliament had been asserted and recognized in a practical way in the measures taken, and, believing it inexpedient to affirm any Resolution weakening the hands of Her Majesty's Government, he had no difficulty in cordially supporting the Amendment of the right hon. Baronet (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach). He was unable to see that the Government had in any way exceeded the legal and Constitutional limits within which they were permitted to act in this matter, and he hoped that that would be the view which the House would take of the question submitted to it.

After a pause,

MR. SPEAKER rose to put the Question, when

MR. DILLWYN rose and said, that although he had not intended to address the House, he could not allow the debate to fall through unexpectedly. The Resolution submitted to the House by the noble Marquess the Leader of the Opposition asserted a great Constitutional question, and ought not to be passed by lightly whilst hon. Members were having refreshment. He declined to accept the doctrine of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Goldney), and supported the Resolution, on the ground that the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government had violated the Bill of Rights in a particular not second in importance to anything in that Bill. He was surprised at the manner in which the Government met the charge. Without attempting to deny the violation of the Bill of Rights, they simply contended that it was not such as to call for discussion or condemnation. It was true, no doubt, that no penalty was attached to this particular violation in the Bill of Rights, and so far it might be contended that it was not a breach of the law; but the Bill of Rights suggested, instead of penalties, an appeal to the House of Commons, and that appeal was now made. As the violation had been made by a Conservative Government, they had no alternative but to re-assert the principle in the strongest possible manner, without proceeding for pains and penalties against the Government. To his mind, their Empire in India, and their interests in the East, were second by far to the interests of the people of this country, and, therefore, he did lay great stress upon the assertion of this principle. The right hon. Mover of the Amendment did not condescend to argue whether the Government had violated the Bill of Rights; indeed, his Amendment fell little short of an admission that it had been violated, while it assumed that the present securities were sufficient to insure Parliament having ample Constitutional control over the Military Forces of the country. But there must be no assumption of the kind. It was their duty to watch with a jealous eye all encroachments on the rights of the people; and it was with that view only that they now took the course they did. He (Mr. Dillwyn) did not know what greater security Parliament had over the Military Forces by voting money than was secured by the Bill of Rights. If the Amendment were carried, it would be tantamount to an admission that, in certain cases, the Bill of Rights might be violated with impunity, and they did not know in what other particular it might not next be infringed by Her Majesty's Government. If it were allowed to be violated in one instance, it was impossible to say where the evil would stop; they would find themselves at the beginning of a downward course in the direction of sacrificing the rights of the people to the Prerogative of the Crown. There was no doubt that the country was now governed by a Sovereign who would not willingly do wrong; but that was no reason for not preventing any Constitutional right being trespassed upon, or any new Prerogative being set up, because some future Sovereign might not be so scrupulous. There was no doubt that what was now claimed as a Prerogative of the Crown was an innovation, though it had been brought in by a Conservative Government. He hoped and believed that many hon. Gentlemen opposite would give a non-Party vote on a question which involved the rights and privileges of the people, and which was a distinct violation of the Constitution.

MR. MAC IVER said, that like the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), he desired to see a non-Party division on the question, although he thought there was nothing which hon. Gentlemen opposite less contemplated. If there were really a non-Party division, almost the whole House of Commons would go into the same Lobby in support of Her Majesty's Government; but he feared that many Liberal Members who outside the House, in their private capacity, said there was little difference of opinion between moderate men on both sides with reference to this subject, and that the Government had done their best, and the Liberals could not have done better, would vote against the Government on the present occasion. This was one of a long-continued series of attacks on the Government for no other than Party reasons; and it seemed to him that hon. Members opposite took up the Turkish question for the purpose of troubling the Government, and, if possible, to obtain their places—desirous to get back to power, no matter by what means. With gradually diminishing minorities, however, these attacks must, sooner or later, come to an end. He believed that in their hearts nine-tenths of the House of Commons and of the people completely approved of what the Government had done. The Government had carried out a wise measure in a most successful way. They had picked up all the useful vessels they could get at Bombay; they had taken all the available troops, and had sent them off at once; and the operation had been as successful as the best friends of the Government could wish. Hardly any hon. Member representing a large constituency having relations with Eastern trade, was opposed to the Government, and the opinions of the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins) had been repudiated in that town. He admitted that the Government might have obtained transports for the Indian troops at a cheaper rate from London, Calcutta, or Madras; but if they had not secured such as were on the spot, the effect of the Expedition would have been prejudiced. The moral effect of what the Government had done was, as had been ably put by the right hon. Gentleman, that it at once showed the world that it knew its own mind, that it was strong, and would use the resources of their united Empire to defend interests which were equally dear to India and Great Britain.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, the question, though important, was exceedingly simple, and it was purely legal and Constitutional. The right hon. Baronet the Colonial Secretary (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had achieved nothing less by his Amendment than the distinction of adding a new chapter to the Constitution. The proposition which the right hon. Baronet laid down came to this—that because the House could undoubtedly refuse to vote Supply, therefore it was competent to the Crown to raise 100,000 men in India, or, as far as he (Mr. Osborne Morgan) could see, anything else, without the consent of Parliament, and bring those troops to Malta, Gibraltar, the Isle of Man, or the Channel Islands, in sight of these shores, provided only they did not land them in Great Britain or Ireland. He must say a more startling proposition, coming as it did from a Leader of the Constitutional Party, he never heard. Those who followed the right hon. Baronet, however, did not go so far, though they contended that the Government might do anything, provided, after they had done it, they obtained the consent of Parliament. Now, that was not his notion of the Constitution; it was not his view, though the Constitution was intended to operate prospectively, and not retrospectively. No doubt, salus populi suprema lex was the first maxim of their law and their Constitution, and he did not deny that circumstances might arise which would justify high-handed, arbitrary, even illegal and unconstitutional, acts, for necessity had no law; but would anyone seriously and honestly assert that any such necessity as that had arisen in the present case? Would anyone assert that, in time of peace, when Parliament was sitting, the safety of the nation—for it was necessary to put it as high as that—required that these Indian troops should be sent to Malta, not only without communicating the fact to Parliament, not only without obtaining the consent of Parliament, but with an affectation of secrecy, and an almost ostentatious disregard of the wishes and opinions of Parliament in the matter. Were the Government afraid of Russia, or of Parliament, or of both? He never saw such a disproportion of means to an end as in this case. It was a most monstrous thing that for the sake of getting transports cheap, for the sake of saving a few hundred pounds, or a few days at most, the Government should value, as they seemed to have done, the British Constitution at the price of a bag of old clothes. Talk of driving a coach and four through an Act of Parliament? Why, the Colonial Secretary had driven a coach and six through the whole Constitution. Had the Crown the right to take 7,000 men from India? If so, it had the right to take 70,000 or 700,000, if it could get so many. If that plea were put aside, the question resolved itself into a purely Constitutional question. He knew the difficulty of arguing a grave Constitutional question before a popular Assembly. Such questions had always been, and always would be, debated and decided on Party lines; and, unfortunately, when a lawyer tried to address an audience as if they were a bench of Judges, he was told he was splitting straws and getting into Nisi Prius. But he would not be deterred by any such considerations from stating his belief that this course on the part of the Government to be equally opposed to the letter of their law and to the spirit of their Constitution. India was excluded from the Mutiny Act because she had a Government of her own, a Budget of her own, and a military system of her own. Under the Preamble of the Mutiny Act, there was a contract between the Crown on the one side and Parliament on the other. Mr. Clode, in his work on Military Law—a great authority—said—

It was very well to say that was a lawyers' crotchet, but it was a crotchet which had cost one King his head and another his Crown. He maintained that the words in the Bill of Rights “within the Kingdom” applied to other parts of Her Majesty's Dominions besides this country, and that was the opinion of Lord Camden and Lord Bathurst. From Magna Charta downwards their Constitution had abhorred military law, which only existed on sufferance in England, and, but for the Mutiny Act, the putting under that law of any subject of the Realm would be an illegal act. The exigencies of the State requiring a certain number of men to be kept in the Army, Parliament every year gave permission for the levy of that number of men, and no more. From the recitals of the Mutiny Act, it appeared that two distinct propositions were there maintained—firstly, the financial right of control possessed by Parliament, which applied to every branch of the Service, civil as well as military; and, secondly, that no man could be placed under martial law in time of peace without the consent of Parliament, which was only given from year to year. Hallam in his Constitutional History, said—

“These are the two effectual securities against military power; first, that no pay can be issued to the troops without a previous authorization by the Commons in a Committee of Supply, and by both Houses in an Act of Appropriation; and, secondly, that no officer or soldier can be punished for disobedience, nor any court martial held without the annual re-enactment of the Mutiny Bill. By the Bill of Rights it is declared unlawful to keep any Forces in time of peace without consent of Parliament. This consent by an invariable and wholesome usage is given only from year to year, and its necessity may be considered, perhaps, the most powerful of those causes which have transferred so much even of the Executive power into the management of the two Houses of Parliament.”

There were two proposals involved in the Bill of Rights and the Mutiny Act. The Motion of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) took both in; but the Amendment, while it admitted one, gave the go-by to the other. Further, he denied the correctness of the construction which had been put by the Colonial Secretary on the 55th section of the Act of 1858 for the Government of India, contending that that section related merely to finance and not to Prerogative. He did not accuse Her Majesty's Government of mala fides, but no doubt in reading the Mutiny Act they had made a blunder, and there were blunders which were worse than crimes. Had the right hon. Baronet come forward and said—“We have misread the Mutiny Act; we have made a mistake”—had the right hon. Baronet in that way appealed to the generosity of Parliament, he (Mr. Osborne Morgan) was sure that the House of Commons, which was, perhaps, the most generous Body in the world, would have met him half-way and said—“Let bygones be bygones.” But that was not the language of the Colonial Secretary, or of the Leader of House. The right hon. Baronet took high ground, and declared—“We have not violated a tittle of the Constitution; we have not broken a particle of the law." That being the tone adopted, it was absolutely necessary that those who were opposed to the action which the Government had taken should occupy equally high ground. He knew that the Government would beat their opponents in a division. He knew that the Government were blessed with a majority so docile and obedient—he would not say so mechanical—that it would endorse anything it was told to endorse. He had no doubt that the Amendment would be carried by a large majority, but to his mind that would only make the matter worse; because, if it were so easy to obtain the consent of Parliament to the policy of the Government, why, then, was the consent not obtained before that policy was entered upon? The result of several recent Elections did not give the Government much encouragement for believing that the country was so entirely on their side as some supposed; and he would warn them that, in appealing to popular passions in support of a high-minded policy, they were trading on dangerous ground—

"Incedis per ignes Suppositos cineri doloso."

In conclusion, he asserted that though the arguments and authorities which had been adduced by the noble Marquess in support of the Resolution against the Government might be conveniently ignored—they could not be satisfactorily answered.

MR. RITCHIE said, he agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Osborne Morgan), that there was a certain amount of inconvenience in discussing great Constitutional and legal questions in a popular Assembly where Party feeling was likely to be imported into the discussion; and therefore he regretted, with his right hon. Friend the Colonial Secretary, that noble Lords who raised that question in "another place," which was eminently fitted for its discussion did not take on themselves the responsibility of inviting a decision upon it there. He did not know the reason, but it appeared to him that the circumstance that no Resolution was before the other House argued a certain want of confidence in the position taken up by the Opposition; and it had even seemed doubtful at one time whether the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) intended to take a decision on the Resolution before the House. It was not in direct terms a Vote of Censure on the conduct of the Government; but, to be logical, the noble Marquess should have gone further, and asked the House to censure the Government for having departed from the lines of the Constitution. If the proposition of the noble Lord were correct, then the Government had violated the Constitution; if, on the other hand, the Government had not violated the Constitution, then the Resolution of the noble Marquess was not correct, and it asked the House to alter the Constitution by means of an abstract Resolution of one of the Houses of Parliament. Many precedents had been quoted, some in favour of the Government, and some against; and an objection had been raised that the employment of the Native Indian troops would infringe the Mutiny Act by taking the place of the British troops authorized by that Act, and so set them free for other service; but he would remind the House that at that very moment a war was going on at the Cape, in which their troops were helped by Native levies and by friendly volunteers, who, of course, liberated a certain number of European troops, and yet who would venture to say this was contrary to the law and the Constitution. The debate of 1775 had been mentioned, and he would only remark that on that occasion many good authorities had construed the word "Kingdom" in a sense totally opposite to that put upon it by the noble Marquess. The point had also been debated at the same time in the House of Commons, where the Resolution extending the meaning of the word "Kingdom" to the other Dominions of the Crown had been rejected by 283 votes to 81. The Bill of Rights was, by general admission, the test. It professed to declare the law, not to enact the law, and for the reasons for which a standing Army had been voted a grievance, it was necessary to look back further. Those reasons all applied to the Kingdom in the limited sense of the word, and were, in fact, chiefly local and domestic. Besides, the Bill of Rights spoke not only of the "Kingdom," but in another clause it spoke of the "Kingdom and the Dominions thereunto belonging;" so that one might fairly conclude that when in the same Bill it spoke only of the "Kingdom" it was not intended to include the other Dominions of the Crown. The truth was, that it was never in contemplation to extend the provisions of the Bill of Rights beyond the limits of the Kingdom, and the Mutiny Act, as it recited almost the words of the Bill of Rights, confirmed that view. If the Constitution required alteration, then let it be altered by a deliberate Act of all the Estates of the Realm, and not by a Resolution of the House of Commons. It had been said that our liberties were in danger; but did any sane man really believe that so long as Parliamentary control and Ministerial responsibility existed, our liberties were endangered by such a proceeding as that under discussion. Parliament must vote the Supplies; but objection had been taken that the Government had first spent the money and then come to Parliament, thus leaving it no option but to vote the money; but the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had, when the Vote of Credit was under discussion, admitted that Ministers would be justified in a time of great emergency in spending money, and afterwards coming to Parliament to sanction the step. Well, the Government had declared that the emergency had arisen, so that really this matter was a question of Ministerial responsibility, and nothing more. But the noble Marquess who moved the Resolution said that the Government ought to come to Parliament, not only for money, but for the men they wanted, and referred to Native troops having been employed in China, saying that a Vote had then been asked for; but he forgot to say that from 1859 to 1863 Native troops were being employed in China, not only without an application by the Government to the House for a Vote of money, but even for a Vote of men. Yet the Chancellor of the Exchequer during that time was the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone). It was not until 1863 that the money expended for those troops was put into the Votes, and not until 1864 were the men put into the Votes. The whole affair was made a matter of account between England and India, and the right hon. Gentleman was responsible for not putting either the money or the men into the Votes until 1863 and 1864. But why, it was asked, did not the Government state openly to the House that troops were to be brought from India to Malta, when the decision was taken, seeing, as had been observed by the hon. and learned Gentleman who spoke last, that they had behind them a docile majority, who would at once approve any measure they might think fit to adopt. The hon. and learned Gentleman, however, seemed to him (Mr. Ritchie) to have altogether failed to take into consideration the composition of the Opposition, which consisted of a great many separate factions, with a great many Leaders, and, as time was an element of importance in this matter, the Government might well hesitate to bring the matter prematurely before the House. If the hon. and learned Member took this into consideration, he (Mr. Ritchie) was sure he would sympathize with the Government in the course which they felt it to be their duty to pursue in a time of great emergency, and when the difficulties they might have to contend with in bringing the matter before Parliament would not have been found easy to overcome. It had been said that this movement of troops had taken the House by surprise. That was true, so far as the actual movement of the Indian troops was concerned; but the question was openly discussed for some time previously whether the Government would fall back upon Indian troops, and it was, therefore, a surprise that might any day have been expected by this House. ["Oh, oh!"] For his own part, he maintained that the Government had not only acted in a strictly legal and Constitutional manner in what it had done, but that it had also acted wisely. From an Indian point of view, it had acted wisely, because those who were well acquainted with India were of opinion that no step could have a greater effect in drawing the people of that country more closely to us than the asking them to come and fight side by side with our soldiers in a time of common danger. Such a step increased the bond of sympathy between the English and the Indian people, which had been lately strengthened by the gracious visit of the Prince of Wales, and the wise assumption of Imperial rank by the Queen. It had also acted wisely from an English and European point of view. What was the position of England at this moment? She had the approval of the whole of Europe in standing up for the integrity of Treaties. She admitted that they required modification, but contended that they should not be altered by one of the parties, but by the whole of the parties to them. At the present moment, no step which the Government had taken had, he thought, been more calculated to bring about the peace of Europe, or secure the object we had at heart, than the bringing over of Indian troops; because it showed a determination on their part to draw upon all the resources of the Empire to maintain its integrity and the independence of Europe.

MR. LAING, having had some experience in India as Finance Minister to Lord Canning, wished to say a few words on the question of our Indian policy, as regarded the employment of Native troops outside India, believing, as he did, that the principles that had been laid down by the Government were fraught with great danger and most destructive consequences to the future of our Indian Empire. The great principle now laid down was that we ought to consider the Native Indian Army as an integral portion of the British Army—that it was to be used on all occasions as a portion of that Army to supplement the military power of this country in the case of European wars or foreign expeditions, in order that by drawing on the immense population of India, great Britain might become one of the great military Powers of Europe. That new policy involved the necessity of entirely re-organizing it, and bringing it up to a high standard, both in point of numbers and of military efficiency. The question arose, was such a policy consistent with the safety of our Indian Empire? It was contrary to the principles laid down by Lord Canning, and many others of our most eminent statesmen. The fundamental conditions laid down for the safety of that Empire were—first, that the Force should be brought down to the lowest standard at which it could perform garrison and police duty. The numbers were fixed at 120,000, and the Force was reduced to that number. The next principle laid down was that for every two Native, there should be one European soldier, or a force of 60,000 men. The third principle was that the Native Troops were not to have any artillery, except a few mountain guns. The fourth was that the Native Army was not to be brought together in large bodies, but kept to separate and distinct regimental duties. Now, was not each one of these principles inconsistent with the principle that the Native troops were to be looked upon as a portion of the British Army? If these troops were to be used for European wars, all that system would have to be altered. The Army in India was not and could never be a national Army. In the first place, India was not a nation, but merely a geographical expression. It contained many different races, only agreeing in their entire difference to the English and dominant race. The Army in India must always be a mercenary Army, and, therefore, could never be actuated by national impulses and feelings. There never could be any community of feeling between the Rulers in India and those who were ruled, and it was a serious matter to depart from the principles which had been laid down. As to the statements about the popularity of the Expedition in India, of course, every soldier worth his salt preferred active service to the monotony of garrison duty. But public opinion in India, military and civilian, had always been in favour of any foreign Expedition. The great inducement which the Indian soldiers had to engage in those Expeditions was the hope of preferment, increased pay, and loot. It had been precisely the same thing in the case of the Expedition to Cabul, which had been undertaken under the same influences as had now been operating, mainly because the influence of the English Foreign Office had been brought to bear upon India, to come forward against supposed Russian encroachments in Central Asia, and next because civilian and military pressure had been brought to bear upon a weak Governor General. That had led to an Expedition which had struck a great blow at the security of our Indian Empire. He hoped nothing of the sort might occur now. Supposing that these Indian troops were employed, the real difficulty of the case would only occur when the war was over and the men were sent back to their Native country. Some persons thought that as the expedition was so popular among the troops, their return, instead of being a danger, would cement the bond existing between this country and India. In his opinion there could not be a more complete delusion than this. While conceding that the Expedition was popular, he could not admit, as some hon. Members opposite seemed to imagine, that the "Jingo" feeling extended to India, or that they were all Mussulman troops who would go into a war singing "Rule Britannia" because they fancied they were defending the Mussulman power of Turkey. The preposterous nature of such an idea would be apparent when it was considered that more than three-fourths of the population of India and the Indian Native troops, were not Mussulmans, but the descendants of people who had been for ages the subjects of Mussulman misrule during the Mogul domination. It was only the dread of the establishment of a Central Mahomedan Government at Delhi which kept the great bulk of the other races from joining in the Mutiny. To speak, then, of the feeling of the Mahomedans who rebelled against our rule a year or two after we had spent millions of treasure and oceans of blood in support of tottering Turkey, as sympathizing with the Sultan, was to talk utter nonsense. Indeed, there could be no greater danger to our rule in India than favouring one particular race, as the favoured one immediately jumped up to the conclusion that we were afraid of them; while, at the same time, it excited the jealousy of others. Our true policy, instead of being either the champions or the enemies of the Mahomedans, was to treat all creeds alike, holding the scale firmly and fairly between all the races, and showing no fear of any. If war really took place, and the Indian troops were employed, we must either be victorious or be beaten. In the latter case, the Native troops would go back sullen and discontented, to proclaim in every bazaar in India how much greater a Power Russia was than England. In the alternative—which all hoped might be the case—the Indian troops would go back to boast that they had crossed bayonets successfully with the best troops in Europe, driving them like chaff before the wind, and to reflect that, in the event of another Mutiny, they would have a good chance of success. They were not the men to put their light under a bushel, and would have to get something more than empty praise. Then, again, there would be a large number of Native officers, who, by courage in the field, would gain promotion; was it to be supposed that such men could be sent back and put under the command of an English boy-subaltern? But if they were not, the whole system of officering the Sepoy Army would be broken up, and Native officers of ability would then attain positions which would ensure the success of another Mutiny; the want of Native leaders and the heroism of our own countrymen being the cause of the failure of the last. These were serious dangers, not to be met by empty phrases, but which had been met by the statesmen who had re-organized the Indian Army after the Mutiny. In addition to those questions of principle, there were other difficulties of detail which had been mentioned to the House a few evenings since, by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) arising from the existence of caste and other causes, which made an Indian Army engaged in European warfare far more costly than the same number of English troops, all of which would have to be seriously considered when employing Indian troops became a reality. What was to be done in regard to the additional batta and pay which Indian troops received as compared with British troops? A colonel in the British Army received about £500 a-year, while a colonel of an Indian regiment received £1,500; was it likely that, with the troops serving side by side in Europe, such an anomaly could be continued? With regard to the financial aspect of this question, he found that the condition of Indian finance was at that moment one of great tension and great distress. The Mutiny, following the wars which had been carried on many years in India, aggravated the condition of India into a severe financial crisis. She was saved by the great efforts of Lord Canning and other Governors General in reducing expenditure, based mainly on military reduction. Indian finances were thus brought into a fairly satisfactory condition, and so continued for a series of years. But India was overtaken in the last few years by famine and a great fall in silver. The consequence was, that after struggling against that depression with temporary loans, the Indian Government had been driven to the most disagreeable necessity of imposing new taxes, and those of an unpopular kind, and of which he did not know which was the worst—namely, the salt tax and the licence duty. The political bearing of increased taxation there was shown by a saying of Lord Canning that danger for danger, he would rather undertake to govern India with 40,000 Europeans without the income tax, than with 80,000 Europeans with it. Economy in India meant military reduction; civil expenditure was not only fixed there, but inevitably tended to grow with the growth of the population and with the increase of civilization, like the Civil Estimates in this country. Therefore, it was the first duty of every Government in India to keep its military establishment down to the lowest figure possible, and the key-note of the position in that respect must be the number of Native troops. If, in this particular case, 7,000 Native troops could be spared from India for an indefinite time—and probably they would be followed by another 7,000, and possibly more after that—surely it would appear that she had been maintaining 7,000 troops who were not wanted for the ordinary garrison duty in India, and who ought to have been disbanded; and by sending home three European regiments to keep up the same relative proportions between the Native Indian and the European troops in India, £600,000 or £700,000 might have been saved. That was about the same amount as we got by imposing the obnoxious salt duty. We might not only have avoided increasing the salt duty, but have reduced it and given millions in India a large and immediate relief. If these men could be spared from India it was clearly the duty of the Government to give the people of that country the benefit of such an economy. Had Lord Canning been Governor General he believed it was what he would have done. Was it fair that India should pay the excessive expense of military establishments, which were kept up for English policy, to enable England to take a more prominent part in European quarrels? We never thought of bringing Indian troops to Sebastopol. To employ Indian troops in exceptional expeditions—to send them to meet Chinese matchlocks or the warriors of King Theodore—was totally different from employing them in regular European warfare, where they would have to stand in the same line as British troops, against adversaries like Russians or French or Germans. What had been done marked a clear revolution of policy in the question which should not have been determined on without consulting Parliament. He wanted to know what the late Governor General, or a still higher authority, Lord Lawrence, and the other high authorities upon India had to say to this question. The objections that had been raised ought to be met by the Government, and if the policy now complained of were to be allowed to continue, Indian finance would become thoroughly disorganized, or England would have to take upon herself a very heavy burden, and rightly so, if she made Indian troops fight her battles.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he was unhappily placed in a similar position to that occupied by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) with regard to this question, because he could not pretend to the knowledge of Indian matters that was possessed by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. But when he heard the hon. Member ask why they kept 60,000 English troops in India, and also speaking in disparaging terms of the utter want of community of feeling between the Rulers and the ruled in that country, he could not help referring to the striking display of loyalty on the part of the Native troops and people of India which had been evoked by the recent policy of Her Majesty's Government. The immediate question, however, before the House was the Motion of the noble Lord opposite. Now, however much on home grounds they might regret that Motion, no one could dispute the right of the noble Lord and his Friends to challenge the decision arrived at for ordering the Indian troops to Malta without the knowledge or consent of Parliament. If there was any reason for thinking that the Constitution had been infringed in that matter, the House of Commons would not only have a right to demand, but would fail in its duty if it did not demand a full explanation from the Government. He was resolved, if the occasion should arise, to do all in his power to uphold the Constitution which they had inherited from their forefathers, and under which they enjoyed a degree of prosperity and of freedom which fell to the lot of few other nations. At the same time, he was not prepared to accept the doctrine contained in the noble Lord's Resolution, which, he thought, involved a direct infringement of the Prerogative of the Crown. Although, as regarded the English troops of the Crown, the Resolution only affirmed what was generally acknowledged, yet in regard to Indian troops it would preclude the use of those Forces beyond the limits of India, without the consent of Parliament, in every case short of actual war, whether Parliament was sitting at the time or not, and however great might be the necessity or emergency. On that ground alone, therefore, if on no other, he would resist the Motion to the utmost. Supposing that a declaration of war between this country and another Power was a question of weeks, or perhaps of days, and that that war would imperil the fortunes of England in some part of her Empire, the Government might know that by due preparation and the movement of Indian troops in good time, the danger might be altogether averted; but Parliament not being in Session, its consent could not be obtained without a great loss of time. Was he to be told that in such a case a Government which used, without scruple, as it was bound to do, all the resources at its command in defence of the Empire, would be guilty of unconstitutional conduct? That, however, would be the effect of the noble Lord's Motion, whether it was so intended or not. Now, was it the fact that the Constitution was really in danger from recent proceedings? If the ordering of those Native troops to proceed to Malta, in a great emergency, was a breach of law and Constitution, he asked what Act did it violate? It was a fact that before those Indian troops were ordered to Malta, the number of men authorized by the Mutiny Act was more than completed. Therefore, it might be argued that the Mutiny Act was being infringed, because troops were being used in excess of the number specified in that Act. That was a very plausible ground on which to base an attack on the Government. But, on the other hand, the troops serving in that case were Native Indian troops which never had been included in the number specified by the Mutiny Act, and which formed part of a separate establishment altogether, and were serving under separate law. It was perfectly clear that the employment of troops, who did not come under an Act, could not by any ingenuity be distorted or twisted into a breach of that Act, which related to troops of a totally different description. The noble Lord said, if that was so, the law was either insufficient, or it had been violated. He could not agree with that; but if the noble Lord thought the law was insufficient, let him propose its amendment. So long as the law remained as it was, and so long as Her Majesty's Ministers remained within it, they had no right to charge the Government with unconstitutional conduct. In 1858, when the Government of India Bill was under discussion, an additional clause was moved by the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), providing—

That clause was identical in its effect with the present Motion of the noble Lord; and if that clause had been carried, he admitted that then the Government would have been guilty of a grave breach of Constitutional law. That clause was opposed by Lord Palmerston and others on the ground that it embodied a doctrine inconsistent with the Prerogative of the Crown and with the Constitution. After certain Amendments had been made in it, the clause was carried on a division; but it was not allowed to become law, or it was superseded by another, which had been quoted already. It said that, except in emergency, the Revenues of India should not be applied to defray the expenses of any military operations beyond the frontier of India; and the movement of troops from India to Malta was, he contended, precisely one of the cases contemplated by that clause. It was a military movement “beyond the external frontiers of India,” and the House would see that while the acknowledged Prerogative of the Crown in this case was in no way interfered with the counter-check to that Prerogative which Parliament in former days devised, was exercised fully, in that the Government could not defray the expenses of the movement out of the Revenues of India without coming to the Legislature—could not, indeed, obtain those expenses from any source whatever, unless Parliament chose to vote Supplies for the purpose. It was not accurate to distinguish the English Army as a Parliamentary Army; so far as their movement was concerned, both the English and the Indian Army were on the same footing. It was true there was this distinction between them, that the number of troops in England was annually voted by Parliament, and that in India there was no Parliamentary limit whatever upon the number; but when Parliament had voted the particular number for England, and when they came to the question of moving either those troops, or the troops in India, their control in the one case was precisely similar to what it was in the other. They could stop the Supplies, but they could do nothing more. Why, however, were they asked by the Motion of the noble Lord to impose a restriction for the first time in India upon the Prerogative of the Crown which did not exist, and which was altogether unknown in this country? The noble Lord opposite had said—"What is the justification of the policy of secrecy, which has been pursued by the Government?" That was a fair question, and in connection with it he would ask—"Is it the case that the Government have been at all wanting in the deference, the courtesy, and respect which are due to the House?" He had heard the explanations which had been given from the Treasury bench, and one of these explanations appeared to him to have been more than sufficient. Surely hon. Members could not deny that it would have been the height of unwisdom on the part of the Government to have announced their intention of calling out Indian troops, unless they had been perfectly certain of the success of their scheme. As it was, their success had been greater almost than they could have themselves hoped for, and all Parties in the country must now agree that they had been justified fully by the event. He could come to no other conclusion than that no charge of unconstitutional conduct could be maintained against the Government; and of the wisdom of their policy he never had a doubt, and, indeed, it was not called into question, nor challenged by the Motion. Hon. Members opposite might be assured that those on the Conservative benches were animated by a resolution no less ardent and determined than their own to guard and maintain that Constitution which they had inherited from their fathers, and to hand it down unimpaired to posterity. But with that Constitution they should remember that they had inherited something else besides—that those who sat within those walls were at this moment the trustees of the future fortunes of the Empire, the traditions of the people, and the greatness of the country, and those fortunes and traditions and the greatness they were determined, come what might, to maintain.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that had the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition required any confirmation of the argument which he addressed to the House, or any testimony to the justice of the Resolution which he had brought forward, it would have been found in the answer, if answer it could be called, which had been given on the part of the Government by the Colonial Secretary. The character of that answer was almost as singular as the Amendment by which it was accompanied. The right hon. Baronet had attacked the Resolution of the noble Lord with some severity, and the condemnation which he passed upon it was that it was a Constitutional truism. If it was a Constitutional truism, the least one might have expected was that a Constitutional Government would have accepted the proposition contained in it. On the contrary, however, no sooner had the Colonial Secretary declared it to be a Constitutional truism, than he added—"You must understand that the Government do not accept it." That was a very singular situation for a Secretary of State, to decline that which he stated was a Constitutional truism.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I never said I accepted the Resolution of the noble Lord as a Constitutional truism.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The right hon. Baronet having so dealt with the proposition of the noble Lord, had gone on to refer to the general policy of the Government, and in a peroration of a most imaginative character had called upon the House to set aside the Constitution, and to declare their confidence in that policy which, if he remembered rightly, linked together, according to the right hon. Baronet, the various races of the Empire by the ocean wave. When the policy of the Government properly came under the consideration of the House, and was stated in a somewhat more prosaic and, perhaps, more intelligible form than in the peroration of the Colonial Secretary, he, and those with whom he acted, would be prepared to consider it; and he hoped it might then be found that the races of this Empire might be linked together by something more stable than the ocean wave. Having stated that the Resolution of the noble Lord was a Constitutional truism which the Government could not accept, the right hon. Baronet had gone on—he could not say to grapple with the argument of the Leader of the Opposition, but to nibble at it. The right hon. Baronet, criticizing the terms of the Resolution, had said—“You speak of the Forces of the Crown; but you exclude the Militia and other Forces in the Colonies.” The noble Lord, however, in drawing up his Resolution, had adopted well-known and Constitutional terms, which had received Parliamentary acceptance, and were thoroughly understood. The Forces which were spoken of in the Mutiny Act did not include the Militia or the Reserves. The word “Forces” in that Act meant Forces of the character of a standing Army, and it had always been so understood. His noble Friend, therefore, had employed the word in the sense in which it was perfectly well known in Constitutional language. So in reference to another cavil, if he might so call it, on the part of the Secretary of State for the Colonies. The right hon. Baronet said—“What do you mean by the consent of Parliament? The consent of Parliament is given by statute in the Mutiny Act, and you cannot add to the Forces without altering the Act.” But that was precisely the point which was dealt with, in 1874, by Lord Cardwell, who said the consent of Parliament need not be testified by statute, but might be testified in another way—by a vote of the House of Commons after the Mutiny Act had been passed. “But,” said the right hon. Baronet again, “you only vote the money and do not vote the men.” He had been astonished at that statement. In 1870, no doubt, there was a Vote of Credit for money; but then there was also a separate and distinct Vote for men. In 1870, when it was necessary to add 20,000 men to the Army, it was done by a Supplementary Vote and a Vote of Credit for £2,000,000. What he charged the Government with was, not with the intention of violating the Constitution with any sinister motive, but with having come down to the House without understanding the Constitution of the country upon the capital points he had named. The Secretary of State for the Colonies had made two errors of the most palpable kind. Then, that right hon. Gentleman had endeavoured to excuse himself and the Government by stating that these Indian troops were employed in the same way at Singapore and Hong Kong. Yes; but on what terms and conditions? These troops were voted on a specific Estimate. They were voted at the instance of General Peel, the Secretary for War of the Conservative Government, who took the Constitutional objection that they ought not to allow the Native troops of the Crown to be employed unless they voted them on a specific Estimate. Then the Secretary of State referred to the Committee moved for by Colonel Anson, who, said the right hon. Baronet, did not say a word about there being no right to employ those troops. No one contested the right to employ these troops, if the proper Parliamentary preliminaries were taken. Then, said the Secretary of State, the Bill of Rights was wholly confined to the United Kingdom. He asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to explain what claim he put forth. Was he prepared to say that outside the United Kingdom the Crown claimed the right to maintain an Army of any amount it chose in all its Dominions without the consent of Parliament? If that was not the claim, he could not deny the position of his noble Friend. If that was the claim of the Crown, then he said there had been no Government since the days of the Stuarts—not in the bad days of Lord Bute and Lord North—who had dared in the presence of the House of Commons and the country to maintain such a proposition. If they were not prepared to maintain that, he asked what intermediate proposition was there between that and the proposition of his noble Friend? It was said to be sufficient that Parliament should have the command over the Supplies. But the Crown might maintain an Army without Supply. The Crown might use its own means, or utilize the other resources which it might obtain. There was such a thing as subsidizing countries to maintain armies. He would give an example. In the year 1816, after the war was over, the English Government maintained an Army of Occupation in Paris. He supposed, according to the doctrine of the Government, that the Crown might do what it liked with that Army without the consent of Parliament. It so happened that the Ministers of the day did not want Supplies for it; because, by the Treaty of Peace, an indemnity had been obtained, and a sum was to be paid by the French nation for maintaining the Army of Occupation. The consequence was, that the Minister said he would not apply to the House of Commons for the maintenance of the troops in Paris. But what was the language of the House of Commons? They said—"No; we will not stand that. We will not stand the Crown having an Army in Paris which is not under the control of Parliament. You must get a Vote of money for that Army, and you must pay into the Treasury the indemnity you receive from France; and so the control of Parliament shall be kept over the Army which is outside the United Kingdom, as well as over the Army within it." Then the right hon. Gentleman came to a precedent which was a little interesting, as it would appear as if for once, and once only, the Government had become disciples of his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich. The Secretary for the Colonies read a passage from a speech of the right hon. Member for Greenwich, to the effect that there were emergencies in which a Government ought to act even without the consent of Parliament, upon condition that they should come down and ask the concurrence of Parliament at the earliest possible moment. That was most excellent doctrine, a doctrine in which they would all agree; but what was most amazing was that the right hon. Gentleman said—"That is exactly what we have done." Why, it was a month ago since the thing was done, and they had not come down for the concurrence of Parliament yet; and when the Chancellor of the Exchequer was asked about the matter, he said—"We did not even think it necessary to allude to it." And that was what the Secretary for the Colonies called following the example of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich! All he could say was that the Secretary for the Colonies was not a very apt disciple of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. The right hon. Gentleman said that the object of the movement was to show to Europe that the British Government had the command of the Forces of a united Empire. But if they had pursued a different method, they might have shown not only that they had the command of the Forces of a united Empire, but the support of a united Parliament. [Laughter.] He did not know what the laughter meant. Did it mean that the Government did not communicate their intention because they did not think Parliament would support them? The Government had not ventured so far as that; but he thought the laughter of hon. Gentlemen opposite meant that. Passing from the right hon. Gentleman's speech, he would ask the House to consider some of the other speeches which had been made—very interesting, no doubt, but without any particular bearing upon the Resolution of the noble Lord. What was the meaning of that Resolution? It did not dispute, and he did not dispute, that this employment of Indian troops was a thing which might be done, and which ought to be done. But the question was whether this was a thing which ought to have been done in the manner in which it had been done. That was really the only question before the House. Some people said it was a very trivial matter, but he maintained it was not a very light thing to depart from Constitutional precedent. Hon. Gentlemen opposite—among them the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie)—had said that, after all, it was a question of the responsibility of the Government; but what did that mean? Did it mean that a Government was entitled to do anything in which it could secure the support of a majority? If so, it was a very dangerous proposition. Hon. Gentlemen opposite might not always be in a majority; and they might depend upon it, it was quite as important for them to consider the matter. The principles of the Constitution were checks upon majorities. They had seen Assemblies where democratic principles had prevailed, and where a majority had ruled without Constitutional checks. If these checks were swept away, they might depend upon it the danger was

came under the consideration of the House, and was stated in a somewhat more prosaic and, perhaps, more intelligible form than in the peroration of the Colonial Secretary, he, and those with whom he acted, would be prepared to consider it; and he hoped it might then be found that the races of this Empire might be linked together by something more stable than the ocean wave. Was he prepared to say that outside the United Kingdom the Crown claimed the right to maintain an Army of any amount it chose in all its Dominions without the consent of Parliament? If that was not the claim, he could not deny the position of his noble Friend. If that was the claim of the Crown, then he said there had been no Government since the days of the Stuarts—not in the bad days of Lord Bute and Lord North—who had dared in the presence of the House of Commons and the country to maintain such a proposition. If they were not prepared to maintain that, he asked what intermediate proposition was there between that and the proposition of his noble Friend? It was said to be sufficient that Parliament should have the command over the Supplies. But the Crown might maintain an Army without Supply. The Crown might use its own means, or utilize the other resources which it might tation of numbers had been observed down to the latest times. He could not admit that the case of the Abyssinian War, and the employment of Native troops therein, came within the principle which was urged in support of this particular line of conduct on the part of the Government. Abyssinia was not within the dominions of the Crown, and the time was not a time of peace. So far as he knew, the only cases in which Native Indian troops had been employed out of India in time of peace were when they served in Hong Kong, Singapore, and Labuan; but, on those occasions, they were included in the Votes. He did not contend that these troops should be included in the Mutiny Act; but they ought, at any rate, to be included in the Votes for the numbers of men and for the money which was to be used in paying them. He wished to say one word about the contention that the Bill of Rights only applied to the United Kingdom. The old recital was only done away with 10 years ago, by which it was upheld that troops were maintained for supporting the balance of power, and he did not know why it was struck out by the present Prime Minister. Coming to the Act of 1858, the Indian Army never was and never had been on the same footing as the English Army. It was not voted in numbers; it was maintained by moneys which did not come from Parliament, and it was governed by a Mutiny Act, which was not annual, but perpetual. Now, all those anomalies were tolerated with respect to the Indian Empire, and that was the reason why the Indian Army was, and as long as it remained in India must be, different from the Army of the Crown. If this non-Parliamentary Army was to be treated on exactly the same footing, Canada, Australia, and the Channel Islands, and, according to his view, the whole of the United Kingdom, might be filled with troops who were not voted by Parliament, and who were not subject to the Mutiny Act. That would be betraying the ancient liberties of the country, and was exactly what had happened in ancient Rome. They could not be too cautious in this respect. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said it was only moving troops from one part of the Empire to another. Yes; but the distinction was between non-voted Forces and voted Forces. The Act of 1858 was indirectly clear upon this subject—not directly, he admitted, because it was stated that the troops should not be moved out of India and charged upon the Indian Revenue. But the Government had violated the Act, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted that the very thing he had now done was contrary to the law. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman shook his head; but what he told the House he was doing was that he should move these troops from India, charging the cost in the first place on India, and then recouping the Indian Revenue afterwards. That was exactly what was done in the case of the Abyssinian War—the charge was put first on India, to be afterwards repaid. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Only to repay them partially.] In the case of the Abyssinian War, the Chancellor of the Exchequer confessed that what he had done was outside the letter of the law, and pleaded in extenuation that others had done the same thing before him. That was a very pardonable thing, then, in the face of the bad example set him. [Mr. GLADSTONE: It was not a bad example.] He would not argue the matter with his right hon. Friend. All he could say was that, having discovered that the thing was unlawful and required condonation, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had come again to the House of Commons and done the very thing which he had found was unlawful—that was to say, making an advance from the Indian Revenue, with the intention of recouping it afterwards. Of course, they would hear the explanation the Chancellor of the Exchequer had to give them. He (Sir William Harcourt) said that Parliament must vote these men not only as a Constitutional principle, but as a matter of necessity. They must vote them as new levies, otherwise they would have no control over them. He considered that he had now shown that the Government had violated the rules of English finance. The rule of English finance was that the object should be first stated to Parliament, which should then vote the expenditure necessary to carry it out, unless they obtained a Vote of Credit for the expenditure, for which they might afterwards account to Government. If, however, it was enough for Government first to spend the money, and then come down and ask Parliament to sanction the expenditure, where, he would ask, was the use of a Vote of Credit at all? He had endeavoured to discuss this question far from anything like Party asperity, as he wished rather to maintain a great Constitutional principle than to gain any mere Party advantage. Indeed, he was bound to say that he was not opposed to the general policy of Her Majesty's Government. So far as they were contending for the authority of England, and that she should have her just weight in the councils of Europe, he entirely agreed with them. He had always desired, and did now desire, that the dominion of Turkey should be put an end to. But he had never desired that Russia should have the undisputed control of the East; and, if the policy of the Government was to insist that Europe and England should be consulted in this matter, he was ready to place at their disposal, not only the Forces of the United Kingdom, but of the Empire generally. But it seemed to him quite as necessary for them to have, in a matter of this kind, the cordial co-operation of the House of Commons, which could only be obtained by treating the House on terms of complete confidence. It seemed to him that it was never more necessary than at a time of public danger, to adhere to the principles of the Constitution—he did not mean in a pedantic spirit. If the Government convinced the country that an overwhelming necessity existed, the country would put a liberal construction upon their acts. But what was the case? No such plea was put forward. The Government had not said—"We were obliged to do this thing, and could not consult you." No such thing. They came down and said it was not necessary to consult Parliament at all. With the majority they had at their backs, they might have had the Vote at any time for the last month. They might have had it before Parliament adjourned. They might have had it sooner. They might have had a Vote of Credit. Well, what was the plea of urgent necessity? The secret of the Government had been known for a month, and yet they said they could not communicate it to Parliament. What the Government said was, that this was to be a demonstration of the Forces of a united Empire. It could not be demonstrative and secret too. This essence of a demonstration was, that it should be made public. They could not demonstrate in secret any more than they could conspire in public. He did not impute to the Government any of the sinister motives that had been attributed to them in trying to find out precedents of Prerogative. There was a good deal of the trash of Imperialism talked in places where they would not expect to hear it, and written in quarterly organs, which, it was said in one case, ought to be burnt by the common hangman. Well, they did not do that kind of thing now, but rather reserved them for domestic use. He believed that what they had done was a sheer blunder, and it was a greater mistake that it had not been corrected. Very much the same kind of blunder had been committed by Mr. Pitt in 1794, accompanied by similar criticism, when he advanced the very violent doctrine of Prerogative, that the Crown had a perfect right to bring any number of foreign troops into the United Kingdom without the consent of Parliament. He was offered a Bill of Indemnity, and refused to accept it; and The Annual Register, which was written in those days by men of ability not unfriendly to him, said, that though people approved of the measure itself, still the propriety of a Parliamentary Commission for it appeared manifest; that the Ministers declined to accept an indemnity for conduct which was not reported blameworthy in any other light than in their refusal to acknowledge its illegality; that it was not without difficulty that their friends could find arguments to exculpate them; and that false pride and obstinate prejudice induced them to uphold measures once adopted, rather than candidly and magnanimously to admit an error. But how had the Government met the Motion of his noble Friend? The Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies did not take issue upon the Constitutional principles laid down by the Motion. It did not deny them. It did not accept them. It did not regard the Motion as a Vote of Want of Confidence. It was an appeal of what lawyers called confession and avoidance. It was a mixture of the Previous Question and a sort of resolution of general indemnity. That was not the way in which a grave error, however unintentional, should be atoned for. He believed that the principles which the Government had infringed in this case were principles that required to be re-established by the Resolution which his noble Friend had proposed, because it asserted principles which were consistent with the Prerogative of the Crown, which were agreeable to the authority of Parliament, and which, therefore, were essential to the interests of the Empire.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that in the course of the debate to which they had listened, and in no slight degree in the speech which they had just heard, there had been a great deal of confusion of thought which, in the first instance, he desired to clear up. What Her Majesty's Government wanted to know was, whether they were really charged with a breach of their Constitutional obligations, or with the crime of secrecy, in having concealed from their political opponents something they thought they had a right to know. From what had occurred he was inclined to think that it was because the Government had not told them what they proposed to do that they brought forward this Resolution. The charge of secrecy, however, had been, he thought, sufficiently answered by his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But he must say that if they desired to seek any further justification, or to prove the necessity of the step which the Government thought it necessary to advise Her Majesty to adopt, it would be found in the proceedings of that night and of the last fortnight. Was it not perfectly obvious that, if the Government had come down to the House and stated that Indian troops were to be brought to Malta, they would have been exposed to a perfect catechism? They would have been cross-examined as to the ultimate destination of the troops, as to whether 7,000 was the limit they intended to propose, and they would have had such patriotic speeches as that of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), who thought it consistent with his duty to express for the advantage of the enemies of this country his opinion of the character and qualities of these troops. Never did he hear a more despairing speech than that of the hon. Member for Orkney (Mr. Laing). As to a great part of it, he would be prepared, when the proper time came for discussing this question upon its merits, to meet the arguments of the hon. Member; but he ventured at once to protest against some of the doctrines laid down by the hon. Gentleman. And he had gone just one step too far. He had told them a story to show why they ought not to engage the services of the Indian troops outside of India. It happened that the story attracted the attention of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had a retentive memory, and he had referred him (Mr. Stanhope) to an occasion when the hon. Member related the same story—of that he did not complain, as a good story would bear repeating—but, unfortunately, it was used to support just the opposite principle. The hon. Member contended in 1867 that the employment of Indian troops was most desirable, and that, being in India when the Indian troops were returning from service in China, and having special opportunities of consulting military men, he could declare that in India we possessed a Reserve in an extremely warlike population which might be drawn on largely for reinforcements. He said, also, that the Sikhs, who had served in China, had been so much impressed with the valour and discipline of the British troops, and their superiority to the French, that they evinced the greatest desire to serve with the British in any part of the world they might be sent to. He hoped the hon. Gentleman who had just related the story would change his mind on the subject once more, and quote the story in support of his original view. As for the speech made by the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition, it reminded him (Mr. Stanhope) of what used to take place at quarter sessions. He had always found there that when any person was anxious not to have a discussion upon the merits, he always raised a preliminary objection upon the notices. That was what the noble Lord in effect had done. He had said to the Government, "Prove your notices." The noble Lord would not attend to the political bearings of the question, he would not consider the opportuneness of what had been done and the necessities of a great crisis; all he would think of was his technical point. It had been stated by the noble Lord with great fairness and moderation; but when the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William

Harcourt), who had some claim to be considered a Constitutional authority, rose, he fully expected to hear some argument adduced in support of the Motion; but he did not hear a single argument from the hon. and learned Gentleman addressed to the Constitutional aspects of the question. Much had been said about the consent of Parliament. Well, what did that mean? The noble Lord seemed to be a little shy of it. He was a little afraid of that plank in his platform. He went back to the year 1734, and told them what somebody else had then thought might be the different meanings of the phrase. But he would have liked to have got from the noble Lord what he himself meant by it in his Resolution. Parliament must mean both Houses of Parliament. The noble Lord could not get out of that position. It could not mean the vote of the House of Commons only; and he protested against any interpretation of the Resolution in that sense as an utterly unconstitutional proposition. But what the consent of Parliament undoubtedly involved was excessive delay. If this Resolution were correct, it applied not only to Native troops in India, but it applied to British troops in India; and, suppose there was a revolt in Ceylon, the consent of both Houses would be required before we could move British or Indian troops into Ceylon—that was what the proposition would lead to. Suppose Parliament was not sitting. Of course they might call Parliament together; but that would involve a delay of five or six weeks at least, so that they would not be able to move a single regiment without calling Parliament together in order to receive its sanction. Or, if there was a revolt in the Mauritius, they must send home and get a Vote of Parliament before they could take measures to put it down. But that was not all. What they wanted in a case of that kind was to send troops, if they could, to overawe an insurrection, rather than to put it down after it had occurred. If this Resolution was accepted, they would not be able to move a single regiment until they had obtained the consent of Parliament. Then a question had been raised as to the limits of the employment of the Native Army, and as some exception had been taken to the argument of his right hon-

Friend (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), it was only due to him to re-state, as far as he was able, one or two points which he desired the House to consider. What was the position of the Indian Army? It was clear that in the time of George II. it was not intended to go beyond the limits of the trading Company; but it had been the subject of subsequent legislation; and in the Preamble to the Statute of 4 Geo. IV. it was referred to in terms which assured its employment not merely within the limits of the Charter of the Company, but anywhere upon land or sea, within or without the limits of the Company. If Parliament then made that declaration, it could not now be maintained that Indian troops could only be employed outside the limits of India after obtaining the consent of Parliament. If it were unconstitutional, why had Parliament declared, in such wide and comprehensive terms, that the Indian Army might go anywhere? The fact was that the Indian Army had been employed elsewhere. That was a fact which it was impossible to get over. It had been sent to the Cape and to China; and if they were going to contend that what had been done already was a thing which ought not to be done now, they ought to bring forward the most definite and conclusive propositions in support of, and in proof of, such contention. But what had the noble Marquess done? Why, he had told them that he did not so much rely upon any particular words as upon practice and precedent. But precedents, so far as he (Mr. Stanhope) was able to understand them, were in favour of the action of the Government. But the noble Lord thought his proposition so clear, so indisputable, that it was worthy of being submitted to the consideration of the House of Lords without taking a division. The proposition of the noble Lord was not affirmed by the Bill of Rights. The Bill of Rights said "within the Kingdom;" therefore, no one could maintain that it forbade the use of the troops which the Government had made. Then it was said they did not rely on the exact words, but on the principle of the Bill of Rights. The noble Lord had relied on the precedent of 1775; he said at that time it was agreed on all sides of the House that the proposition for which he contended was a sound one, and that the Kingdom included the Dominions of the Crown.

[First Night.]

Well, if that were so, he should have expected to find that proposition afterwards re-affirmed. But had any evidence been produced of that character? On the contrary. He would not rely on The Annual Register, though it might be made up by a very competent person; but on what he believed to be a most authentic register in that respect of the proceedings of the period, and that was the Protests recorded in the House of Lords. They were in the writing of the noble Lords themselves, and had been on the book of Parliament ever since. On one occasion referred to, in 1795, two Protests were recorded in the House of Lords, and one began thus—

“Because it is contrary to law for the Crown to keep an Army in this Kingdom, either in time of peace or of war, without the consent of Parliament;”

At that time the House of Lords had examined the doctrines laid down in that Protest, and had struck out the words “with the exception of one noble Lord,” and had affirmed that the keeping of troops in this Kingdom in time of peace or war was unconstitutional. Then the noble Lord relied on the Mutiny Act. Well, the propositions laid down were not to be found in the Mutiny Act. He had taken two distinct propositions out of the Preamble of the Act, and, jumbling them together in one Resolution, had flung them down for the acceptance of Parliament. If, however, the House went a little further, it would see that that Act did contemplate the raising and keeping troops other than those mentioned; for the 4th clause, which dealt with Colonial and Foreign troops in Her Majesty’s pay, said that all officers and soldiers raised and serving in any of Her Majesty’s Dominions should be subject to the Articles of War; and if such officers and soldiers, having been made prisoners, should be sent into Great Britain or Ireland, they should not be allowed to serve therein. That evidently meant that they could serve elsewhere; and it expressly denied their right to serve in this Kingdom, according to the Bill of Rights. The House should look still further. What the Preamble of the Mutiny Act said was, that there was a declaration on the part of Parliament that the whole number of troops capable of serving in England should be 135,452, exclusive of the number actually serving in Her Majesty’s Indian Possessions, which, of course, meant that the Crown might maintain 135,452 men plus the number actually serving in Her Majesty’s Dominions. Not a single word in the Preamble of that Act interfered with the Crown’s undoubted right to regulate the removal and exact disposition of the troops. When he looked for a moment to the Bill of Rights, he was led to the conclusion that the noble Lord was wrong in his interpretation of its principle, and he admitted that the actual words did not bear out the proposition which he had placed before the House. But what were the principles on which the Bill of Rights was founded? We had only to read any history of the time to estimate the jealousy with which the standing Army was then regarded, though most historians found it rather difficult to explain the reasons for that extraordinary jealousy. They told us that the reasons mainly were, the desire to prevent the assembling of military Forces for unjustifiable purposes, so as to overawe Parliament, and induce it to enact for the people measures destructive of their freedom. Parliament objected, also, to the billeting of troops on the people without their consent; and those were the chief objections then raised to the maintenance of a standing Army, which, they urged, ought not to be kept in this country. That was the real principle on which the Bill of Rights was founded; but was there any man in that House, he would ask, who would pretend that we were in such danger now? Why, in any one year, on Salisbury Plain or somewhere else, we had an army assembled far larger than that by which the liberties of our forefathers were endangered. Even within the last few months, Reserved Forces far exceeding it had been called together. If, therefore, that danger ever again arose, Parliament would be perfectly prepared to meet it. At that time of night he would not trouble the House to listen to any elaborate argument; but he might be permitted to advert to the precedent of 1815, when the French indemnity was handed over. Sir J. Mackintosh then said that one of the controls which Parliament possessed over the Army was the annual Mutiny Bill, and another, which belonged solely to the House of Commons, the annual granting of money for its support. It was this latter control to which he desired especially to direct attention—the financial control. Was the intention and meaning of the Resolution, that certain Forces could not be introduced into any of the Dominions of the Crown, without the previous consent of Parliament? The word “previous” was not in the Resolution of the noble Lord, and the reason was that neither by precedent nor by authority could the proposition be justified that it was only with the previous consent of Parliament, in all cases, that these forces could be brought into any of the Dominions of the Crown. There must be many cases in which the Executive must be allowed to exercise their discretion. There was a time when the right hon. Gentleman opposite proposed a clause in the Government of India Bill. It was at a time at which the Indian Army could be employed anywhere, with no control except the provisions in the Bill of Rights, declaring that it could not be employed within this Kingdom. The House very properly desired to have some check against those constant frontier wars which were often begun and ended without Parliament having any control at all in the matter. The right hon. Gentleman, therefore, brought forward a clause to the effect that Her Majesty’s Indian Forces should not be employed beyond the frontier of India without the consent of Parliament. There was upon that occasion a very interesting discussion, in which a noble Lord whose name could not be mentioned, especially at the present moment, without the deepest respect—he meant Lord Russell—took part, and in which he concurred with Lord Palmerston in the inexpediency of fettering the power of the Crown in the movement of these troops—

“Supposing we had a war with some European Power, and that, this war being supported by the House of Commons, it was considered desirable for the Indian Army to attack the possessions of this enemy of the Crown, it appeared to him the clause would prevent the employment of those Forces without the consent of Parliament.”—[3 Hansard, cli. 1015.]

Propositions such as those to which he was referring were, he was aware, laid down in time of war; but hon. Gentlemen opposite appeared unable to understand a state of affairs so critical, without amounting to actual war, as would necessitate preparations for the maintenance of the honour of England. General Peel had some right to complain, because the troops, in that case, had been kept for some years in a particular locality, without any explanation being given to Parliament of their number or of the amount of money which would be required to sustain them. When the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) talked of the phantoms which the Government had conjured up, he seemed to him to speak far too lightly of a crisis which, in the Gracious Message which Her Majesty had been advised to send to Parliament, was described as an emergency. If hon. Gentlemen opposite disagreed with the course adopted by the Government, they could express their disapprobation of that policy, and say that the troops should go back to India—though no doubt, in some form or other, the country would have to bear the burden if that were done. The Opposition could satisfy their consciences, if they chose to do so, by turning out the present Ministers of the Crown and taking their places. Therefore, it was idle to say that the House had no effective control over this movement. The Government fully admitted the financial control which Parliament ought to exercise over this matter; in the course of a short time they would be prepared to submit a general Estimate of what they believed the expenditure was likely to be, and it would then be for Parliament to exercise the control which they thought fit under the circumstances. Anything that could have been said before the Easter Adjournment would have been a mere declaration of what the Government intended to do; no Estimate could possibly have been given. A certain amount of discretion had necessarily to be exercised by the Executive; but it was far from their thoughts to interfere with the form of the Constitution, and still less to tamper with its spirit. To institute any comparison between the dangers which threatened their forefathers and those against which they had now to guard was obviously impossible. But while, on the one hand, it was the advantage and the strength of their Constitutional system that it was capable of easy extension and adaptation to the altered circumstances of the Empire, so it ought not to be their weakness that, while amply secured against any real dangers, they were to be fettered and hampered by a too rigid interpretation of technical rules in the development and employment of their power. They all remembered the classical story of the man who carried a newly-born calf, and day by day as it grew he continued to carry it, so that his powers became enlarged just in proportion as the demand upon them increased. So must it be with England. They too, always, indeed, on the whole with advantage, but sometimes with purpose and deep anxiety, had had to bear an ever-increasing burden. And lo! it was suddenly made lighter. India had contributed, and willingly to the strength of their Empire. The Government had asserted the strength of the British Empire in the midst of a crisis which might exercise a material influence on the future of Europe. Was it necessary, wise, or opportune, to choose that exact moment to cast doubt upon the legality of this proceeding on the part of the Government, and in the eyes of Europe—because Europe would not understand these technical distinctions which hon. Gentlemen opposite had been attempting to draw—upon its wisdom also. To that question Her Majesty's Government awaited the answer without anxiety; because, whatever might be the feebleness of the efforts they could make to maintain the honour of the country, they would be satisfied, if it were said of them, as it had been said of another man in days gone by—"They knew how to make a small State great."

MR. FAWCETT moved the adjournment of the debate.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER hoped the House would assent to the debate being renewed on Tuesday, and that hon. Gentlemen who had Notices on the Paper for that day would give way.

MR. W. HOLMS said, he had no wish to interrupt the progress of so important a debate. He stood first on the Orders of the Day for Tuesday, and had a Resolution of considerable importance to propose on a question which excited great interest in Scotland. He, therefore, asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give him a day for his Motion. He did so the more readily, because during this Session Scotland had not received a large amount of attention from the Government.

MR. DILLWYN objected to private evenings being taken for the discussion of public matters.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—REPORT.

Resolution [16th May] reported.

First Resolution read a second time.

MR. PARNELL objected to the Resolution, because the amount included £289 for the printing in connection with the Queen's Colleges, Ireland. Whatever might be the merits of the system of education in Ireland, he, and the great majority of the Irish, were opposed to it, and he could not conscientiously allow any Vote on its behalf to pass unchallenged. It was impossible for him to express the extent to which he felt himself responsible in this matter; and if hon. Members looked into the way these Queen's Colleges had been worked, if they saw how they had failed in carrying out the ideas of the Legislature, it would be perfectly apparent why Irish Members should feel deeper interest in the question of education than in any other Irish subject which came before the House. The Queen's Universities were formed for the purpose of supplying University Education to those classes in Ireland who could not conscientiously avail themselves of the education afforded at Trinity College, Dublin. But, well-meaning as the determination on the part of the Legislature was, these Colleges had been to a very great extent—

MR. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. Member that, on the question of a Vote for Stationery, it is not competent for him to enter into a general discussion regarding the Queen's Colleges.

MR. PARNELL said, he bowed to the decision of the Speaker; and, as he could not, by the Forms of the House, move to leave out the one item of £289 for Stationery for the Queen's Colleges, he should move to reduce the Vote by £271,000, the whole amount set down for Stationery.

Amendment proposed, to leave out "£376,545," in order to insert "£105,545,"—(Mr. Parnell,)—instead thereof.

The House divided; Ayes 115; Noes 13: Majority 102.—(Div. List, No. 142.)

Resolution agreed to.

Subsequent Resolutions agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock.

"EURYDICE."—QUESTION.

EARL DE LA WARR asked the noble Lord who represented the Admiralty in that House, three Questions of which he had given him private Notice—namely, What further preparations are being made for raising the "Eurydice;" what was the total number of bodies that has been recovered up to the present time; and whether there is an efficient boat and crew on board the vessel moored near the wreck, to be sent out if required to pick up bodies which may come to the surface?

tion was to raise the Eurydice by placing two lighters, one at bow and one at stern, which were to be attached by hawsers at low water. It was hoped that as the tide rose the vessel would rise with it. The great difficulty had been found to result from the strength of the tides. The Eurydice was in 12 fathoms of water, across the tide, and, as the latter ran generally five to six knots, it had been found almost impossible to keep the lighters in position—especially in the unfavourable circumstances of the weather. To give them an idea of the difficulties which the working parties had had to contend against, he might refer to the official report of operations since the 7th.

"From the 7th to the 11th, divers down seven to eight hours; since the 12th only down once for a short time, but too much sea to work; 15th, rolling truly dreadful, since which no diving; gale."

What was now intended was this—to moor four additional lighters immediately over her—divers would be employed in placing toggles in ports on each side; to the toggles would be attached steel hawsers, and these would be brought to the four lighters, which, in addition to the two original lighters at bow and stern would, it was anticipated, lift the vessel bodily out of the bed she had made for herself. She had settled 9 feet, and her lee ports were level with the sand. With regard to the second Question of the noble Earl—the number of bodies recovered up to the present time was 20. There were boats and efficient crews to man them—boats that could live in all ordinary weather. On several occasions the weather had been such that no boat could live. There were dockyard tugs also constantly on the look-out for bodies, except when the weather was too bad to allow them to remain near the wreck.

COMMITTEE (ON RE-COMMITMENT).

House in Committee (on Re-commitment) (according to Order).

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON moved numerous Amendments (No. 76a 76b), which were agreed to, pro forma.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he proposed that the Bill should be re-committed on Monday, when the Amendments and new clauses could be discussed.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Thursday next; and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 88.)

ARMY EXAMINATIONS—RIDING AND ATHLETICS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE asked, Whether the Secretary of State for War has considered the propriety of allotting a certain number of marks for proficiency in riding and athletics in the examinations for entrance into Woolwich and Sandhurst Colleges? He thought that the giving of such marks was so desirable that it ought to be the rule in examinations for the Army; though, with candidates for the Militia, he would leave riding and athletics entirely optional. It was hardly necessary to say that proficiency in riding was of great importance to young men who proposed to enter the Cavalry. The Duke of Wellington used to say that he found the best Cavalry officers to be men who had been accustomed to ride to hounds. Now every officer who sought admission to the Staff College must produce a certificate of proficiency in riding. It might be said that a young officer would be taught at Sandhurst all the riding he required. He had nothing to say against the system of instruction in riding at Sandhurst. A large number of young men entered the riding school there who never had been on a horse before; they were made to go over a number of fences, and they got a number of falls which did them all the good in the world; but they could not in a term or two at Sandhurst make a good rider of a young fellow who had never been on a horse till he was 19 or 20 years of age. As regarded athletics, they were now practised at all their public schools, and not unfrequently were a part of the curriculum; but a proportion of the candidates for commissions in the Army were not educated in their public schools. It was to be borne in mind that, while the medical examination of the men was very critical, that of the officers was not very strict. If the heart and lungs of the latter were found to be sound, and they had not varicose veins, they were passed; but very weedy young men might pass the medical examination, and the gymnastic course which the cadets went through in the Military Colleges would not convert a weedy man into a strong one. It was an old saying that no person should go into the water till he knew how to swim. He thought it might fairly be said that no one should go into the Army till he knew how to ride. He would have examinations in four physical exercises—swimming, leaping, walking, and riding; but a boy need not go in for them all—he might even go in for one only; and it might be left to the candidate to choose from among them. He submitted that the examinations should not be, as they were at present, purely intellectual.

ARMY—COMPETITIVE EXAMINATIONS FOR COMMISSIONS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

EARL FORTESCUE said, that having long bestowed much attention on educational questions, he had naturally interested himself in the new system of competitive examinations for commissions in the Army. He had, during the last few years, on different occasions, publicly stated his views on the subject, and, as late as last July, addressed their Lordships at some length upon it. He had then expressed his earnest hope that the Government would carefully consider the question during the Recess, and, for the sake of obtaining the best and most efficient officers, allow excellence in martial and athletic exercises to have its due weight in competitive examinations for commissions, in the non-scientific, as well as the scientific branches of the British Army. He was now happy to have reason to believe that the Government had carefully considered the question. He was not at all opposed to competitive examinations, in order to enable the best out of the numerous candidates for the honour of serving the Queen in the Army to be selected. By all means, let Her Majesty take the best men, but let them be the best men all round, the most likely to prove efficient officers, and not merely the best scholars. The views which he had expressed were not based upon his own individual judgment alone, but upon the opinion of a number of distinguished officers of all ranks, from Field Marshals, downwards, who were all agreed upon it. That noble veteran, Sir John Burgoyne, whose military experience had commenced before this century, himself a man of much literary culture as well as of notoriously eminent scientific and professional attainments, in the very last conversation he had with him, expressed his fear lest too exclusive importance should be attached to mere book learning as a qualification for officers, and his conviction that a certain hardihood and love of adventure, such as was generally found in men addicted to field sports and athletic exercises, was much to be desired in the profession. Another friend of his, distinguished for his efficiency in the command of his regiment, an enthusiast for competitive examinations, had told him, that, in his opinion at least one-third, if not more nearly one-half of the marks ought to be allotted to proficiency in martial and athletic exercises. But this view was not confined to officers; it commended itself to non-professional men of common sense also. A right rev. Prelate, eminently successful as Head Master of a great public school, told him he had once had the offer of a commission in the Army for anyone he chose to name from that school; that he then, reflecting that the boy most likely to win a University Scholarship would not necessarily be the fittest to carry the Queen's Colours, instituted a competitive examination, partly intellectual, partly athletic, among the boys desiring the commission; and that he felt satisfied he should send one who would do credit both to his school and to the Army, when, on adding up the marks, he ascertained that the successful candidate was the captain of the School Eleven. The Clerical Pedagogue, it seemed to him (Earl Fortescue), contrasted favourably in this instance as regarded common sense, with the eminent statesmen and distinguished officers, the Members of the Legislature and men of the world, who had devised the present system, notwithstanding the long-established recognition of a different principle in the examinations for commissions in the scientific branches of the Army. Surely, good riding, to which the noble Viscount opposite had so justly attached importance, was less essential to the Engineer than to the Cavalry Officer, whose duties obliged him to be so much on horseback; and yet, strange to say, the candidate for a commission, if in the Engineers, got marks for it, but if in the Cavalry, got none. The only explanation was that the examinations for the Engineers and Artillery had been the result of experience of the requirements of the Service, while the present system of examinations for the non-scientific branches had been somewhat crudely and hastily adopted under the pressure of popular clamour. He protested, not against the principle of competitive examinations, but against this application of it as opposed alike to experience and to common sense, and begged to put the Question of which he had given Notice—namely, Whether the late Secretary for War did not appoint a Committee to inquire into the expediency of extending to the examinations for commissions in the non-scientific branches of the Army, the principle, long recognized to a certain extent as regarded those for the Engineers and Artillery, of giving a certain number of marks for proficiency in certain martial or athletic exercises; and, if so, whether that Committee had yet made any Report, and, if they had, whether the Government were considering the practicability of taking steps to modify the present system accordingly?

LORD HAMPTON said, that as the Head of the Civil Service Commission, this subject had attracted his attention, and he had thought it his duty to give his attention to it. The examination of candidates for the Army was now intrusted to the Commission. He had been much struck how much these examinations turned upon educational and mental qualifications, and he arrived at the conclusion that the examinations for those candidates were of too exclusively an intellectual character. Having well considered the question, he thought it desirable, under a judicious arrangement, to supplement—not supersede—the present system by physical tests. He had communicated that opinion to the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief, and His Royal Highness, without committing himself to any particular plan, expressed his strong approbation of the principle of such a test. He also called the attention of his noble Friend (Viscount Cranbrook), who was then Secretary of State for War, and he also entirely concurred in these views. Eventually, it was thought advisable that there should be a conference between some representatives of the War Office and the Civil Service Commissioners on the subject. His noble Friend appointed a Committee of three Staff officers, who, with him, as representing the Civil Service Commission, had very attentively considered the subject. A unanimous Report, in which a test of physical efficiency was recommended, had been agreed to. He hoped to hear from his noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for War, that the Government would lay that Report on the Table.

VISCOUNT BURY need hardly say there was an almost universal consensus of opinion, among military men and non-military men, that it was desirable there should be some sort of physical test for candidates seeking commissions in the Army. The first duty of the authorities in these matters was, of course, to see that their young officers were educated men; but, that object secured, if a physical test could be added, it would be of advantage. Until the Report of the Committee referred to by his noble Friend had been sufficiently considered by the illustrious Duke at the head of the Army, and by his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War, it was regarded as a confidential document, which might be altered in its details, and, therefore, it would not be convenient to produce it now; but when His Royal Highness and his right hon. and gallant Friend had had an opportunity of perusing and considering the Report, whether favourable or unfavourable, it would be laid on the Table, when no doubt it would receive the attention it demanded as an expression of opinion of the noble Lord, whose experience so well entitled his views to consideration.

THE MARQUESS OF LANDSDOWNE said, he did not think that the proposal of a physical test for candidates seeking commissions could, with advantage, be discussed by their Lordships till the Report of the Committee was in the hands of their Lordships. He rose to point out an error into which the noble Earl (Earl Fortescue) had fallen, when he described the competitive examinations as having been hastily and crudely introduced in answer to popular clamour. That was altogether a mistake. They were introduced with the utmost deliberation and in compliance with the Report of a Royal Commission, appointed by the noble Lord who had just spoken, and who was at the time Secretary of State for War. His noble Friend behind him had acted upon the Report of that Commission, which had unanimously recommended a system of competitive examinations, directed not to test the ability of the candidates in military subjects, but their proficiency in those subjects, which were usually to be learned at our great public schools. He did not say anything against a physical test, if it were possible to introduce it—the experiment would be watched with interest on both sides. He could not, however, but feel that whatever amount of caution might be used, they would have still to encounter the same class of difficulties as that which had to be contended with at present. He believed it to be beyond the reach of ingenuity to devise a perfect system of examination. There must be cases of bad luck, and chance must come in, whatever the system of examination might be. He did not like to make a gloomy anticipation, but the application of the physical test might result in the exclusion of young men who, hereafter, might have proved very valuable officers. There were many young men of 19 and 20 who never had had an opportunity of acquiring the art of equitation or of learning to swim. He would only add, that it would have been an advantage if noble Lords, who had inveighed so often against the present examinations, had told them not only whether the existing system of examinations was likely to act unfairly with respect to candidates, but whether it actually had done so. That proposition, however, was one which he had never heard distinctly advanced during the time this question had been discussed.

House adjourned at Six o'clock, to Thursday next, half past
Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 21st May, 1878.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBER SWORN—Viscount Castlereagh, for the County of Down.
PUBLIC BILL—Committee—Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Ireland) [44]—R.P.

QUESTIONS.

RUSSIA—PURCHASE AND EQUIPMENT OF PRIVATEERS.—QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked Mr. Attorney General, If his attention has been called to the alleged purchase and equipment by the Russian Government and Russian subjects of United States' steamships for the purposes of being employed and commissioned as public Privateers; and, if he can state how far the allegations are correct, and the nature of the responsibilities attaching to the United States' Government under the Treaty of Washington, and to the Russian Government and Russian subjects under the Declaration of Paris, should the vessels in question, or ships of other neutral countries, be commissioned for the capture of British shipping in the event of War?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER): Sir, in reply to the hon. Gentleman, I beg to state that steamships have been recently purchased in the United States by persons who are said to be acting on behalf of the Russian Government; but her Majesty's Government have no information which would lead them to believe that these vessels are intended, in the event of war, to be commissioned and employed as privateers, in contravention of the Declaration of Paris, to which Great Britain and Russia were parties, and whereby it was agreed that privateering should be, and remain, abolished. By Article 6 of the Treaty of Washington, Great Britain and the United States agreed to observe in future, as between themselves, the three rules therein laid down as binding on a neutral Government in time of war; and Her Majesty's Government have no reason to apprehend that the Government of the United States have any intention of departing from the observance of those rules, if circumstances should call for their application. I think it is hardly necessary, therefore, to consider what responsibilities would attach to the United States' Government or to the Russian Government, in the event of any violation on their part of the obligations by which they are bound under the Treaty of Washington and the Declaration of Paris respectively.

BORNEO.—QUESTION.

MR. ERNEST NOEL asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether Her Majesty's Government has arrived at any decision with regard to the Treaties for the cession of extensive tracts of territory on the northern and western coasts of Borneo, which have recently been concluded between the representatives of an English Company and the Sultans of Brunei and Sulu; and, if so, whether he will lay upon the Table of the House, Copies of the Treaties, and of all Correspondence in relation thereto?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, Her Majesty's Government have deferred coming to a decision in regard to this question until after the arrival in this country of the promoters of the scheme, which is expected to occur in the course of the summer.

GRAND JURY LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is his intention to proceed with the Grand Jury Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill, with a view to its becoming Law during the present Session; and, if so, when does he intend to move the Second Reading of the Bill?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, I am most anxious to proceed with this Bill without delay, and I was in hopes that before Easter—[Cries of "Whitsuntide!"]—I mean what I originally said, Easter—that before Easter the House would have had an opportunity of disposing of the second reading. The time, however, occupied in the discussion of various other measures, to which I need not particularly refer, unfortunately disappointed those expectations. As to when I intend to move the second reading, the hon. Gentleman will not be surprised if I am unable to give any definite answer to his Question, when he considers the state of the Order Book, and especially the position of Supply. I hope, however, it will not be long deferred, and that to that end, hon. Members who take an interest in the Bill, will afford their assistance in preparing the way for its consideration at an early date.

ARMY—VOLUNTEER ARTILLERY ADJUTANTS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL MAKINS asked the Secretary of State for War, If he is aware that Adjutants of Artillery Volunteer Corps receive 7*d.* a-day less pay than Adjutants of Rifle Volunteer Corps; and, if he will take steps to remove this inequality of pay, as the offices are equally onerous?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, that both of those officers were paid according to their respective ranks in the Regular Service, and that the rate of pay was not adjusted with reference to the duties they performed, but was simply the full pay due to their respective ranks.

STRAITS SETTLEMENTS—THE PERAK EXPEDITION ALLOWANCES.

QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the "batta" promised to the officers and men of the Perak has been paid to the men, and at what rate; whether the payments to the officers have been deferred; and, if so, for what reason; and, at what rate it is intended to pay the officers?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, that the batta or extra field allowance in question was at the rate of 4*s.* 6*d.* a-day to field officers. 2*s.* 6*d.* to captains, and 1*s.* 6*d.* to subalterns, for six months. It was paid as the claims came in; but as nominal returns were required, and as one of the regiments was now at the Cape, there was considerable difficulty in obtaining the required information. He was not aware of any other reason for the delay that had taken place.

POSTPONEMENT OF MOTIONS.

MR. W. HOLMS, who had the first Motion on the Paper relating to Religious Denominations (Scotland), said, that he had no wish to interfere with the course of an important debate, and expressed his willingness to postpone his Motion, provided that other hon. Members who had Motions on the Paper took the same course.

MR. A. MOORE said, he would also postpone his Motion relating to Pauper Children in Irish Workhouses.

MR. PARNELL said, that as he had a Motion on the Paper relating to the Sales of Irish Church Lands, he wished to explain the course which he proposed to take. He should be very unwilling to interfere between the House and the debate on the movement of the Indian troops under ordinary circumstances; but the circumstances under which his Motion appeared on the Paper that evening were not of an ordinary character. Originally, he introduced a Bill upon the subject, and the fact of his Motion appearing on the Paper that evening was the result of the proceedings which took place in connection with that Bill. He moved the second reading of that Bill about a quarter-of-an-hour after midnight, and the Government deliberately promoted a "count-out." ["Oh, oh!"] The Government, he repeated, deliberately promoted a "count-out"——

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is stating the course which he proposes to take with regard to his Motion; and it is quite out of Order on his part to discuss the conduct of the Government on a late occasion, with regard to a Bill not now before the House.

MR. PARNELL said, that he wished to explain the reasons of the course which he intended to take.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is entitled to explain; but is not entitled to call in question the proceedings of the Government on a late occasion.

MR. PARNELL, resuming, said, that he merely wished to explain his reasons for pursuing the course he had pursued, and which he was about to pursue. As a result of the "count-out," he was compelled to bring the matter forward in the form of a Motion. It did not relate to the subject-matter of the Bill, but was rather a consequence of the proceedings which took place in connection with the Bill, and of some matters that happened subsequently. He feared that he should not be able, under ordinary circumstances, to bring forward his Motion with any certainty in the event of his postponing it now. If he endeavoured to bring it on again, there might be another "count-out," and, consequently, he might be precluded from submitting the very important question involved in his Motion to the decision of the House; and, unless the House decided on that question that Session, an opportunity for coming to a decision would have disappeared, because the lands would all have been sold, and the same opportunity would not be available next Session. He, therefore, felt himself in a position of very considerable responsibility in reference to the question. On the one side, he did not wish to prejudice the fate of his Motion by setting the House against him; whilst, on the other hand, he felt it his duty to use every means and all diligence to obtain the opinion of the House on the subject as soon as possible, because mischief was being done every day. What he should propose was this—if the Government would undertake to keep a House for him next Tuesday, and to use their influence with their Supporters to prevent any Notices of Opposition being given to his Motion, so as to prevent it from being brought under the operation of the Half-past 12 o'clock Rule, then he should be happy to put his Motion down for next Tuesday. Otherwise he should, however reluctantly, feel it his duty to move his Resolution at whatever time it might be reached.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I can only say that I will do everything in my power to keep a House; but, of course, I cannot promise that my efforts will be successful.

MR. PARNELL: Sir, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has promised to do everything in his power to keep a House. That is perfectly satisfactory, and I shall not proceed with the Motion.

Motion accordingly postponed until Thursday next.

MR. O'DONNELL intimated his readiness to postpone the Motion of which he had given Notice, relative to the riots and bloodshed attending the enforcement of the collection of the new licence tax at Surat.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. [SECOND NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [20th May],

"That, by the Constitution of this Realm, no Forces may be raised or kept by the Crown in time of peace, without the consent of Parliament, within any part of the Dominions of the Crown, excepting only such Forces as may be actually serving within Her Majesty's Indian Possessions."—(The Marquess of Hartington.)

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House, being of opinion that the constitutional control of Parliament over the raising and employment of the Military Forces of the Crown is fully secured by the provisions of the Law, and by the undoubted power of this House to grant or refuse Supplies, considers it to be unnecessary and inexpedient to affirm any Resolution tending to weaken the hands of Her Majesty's Government in the present state of Foreign affairs,"—(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)
—instead thereof.

Debate resumed.

MR. FAWCETT, in reference to the debate of the previous night, said, there was no single point on which Ministers and their Supporters laid so much stress as that the act which the Leaders of the Opposition declared to be unconstitutional should not have been challenged by a direct Vote in the other House of Parliament. No one could feel more strongly than he did on that point, and he thanked the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons for his prompt determination to bring the conduct of the Government, in reference to the removal of the Indian troops, to a decision on the part of that House. With regard to what had been done by the Leader of the Opposition in "another place," Members of the House of Commons had no control over that. For his own part, he most heartily endorsed what was said by the Prime Minister in "another place," when he said that bold phrases should always be met by corresponding acts; because, no matter what Party might be in power, that had always been the policy he himself (Mr. Fawcett) had endeavoured to pursue. Now, there was no taunt which the Treasury Bench seemed to think so effectual as to remind the front Opposition Bench of what the latter did when they were in power with regard to the Royal Warrant abolishing Purchase in the Army. But he (Mr. Fawcett) would remind the House that some of those who were now on the Opposition benches below the Gangway protested again and again against that Warrant. They appealed again and again to Mr. Disraeli—the then Leader of the Opposition—to give them an opportunity to show their objections to the course which the Government then adopted. Mr. Disraeli described that act as a "shameful conspiracy against the liberties of Parliament;" but he cared so little for those liberties of Parliament when the question of the Prerogative of the Crown was at stake, that he had not the courage to challenge the proceeding he denounced, and his "bold phrases" only ended in empty talk. He (Mr. Fawcett) knew that the impression prevailed that the question at issue involved so many legal technicalities and Constitutional questions, that no one but a Constitutional lawyer ought to presume to take part in the debate. He, however, did not accept that view. He desired to take it out of that trough of technicalities, so that he might discuss the subject in its broad political aspect, and he thought he should be able to show that by what the Government had done, a grave political issue was raised, upon which the English people generally were competent to express an opinion. It was perfectly idle, he maintained, for the Secretary of State for the Colonies and the Under Secretary of State for India to say that the act of the Government amounted to nothing more than the sending a single Madras regiment to Singapore, or allowing a few Indian troops to contend against a semi-barbarian Chief in Abyssinia. Showers of praise had been poured upon the Government by their Supporters, because of what they regarded, and what had been described, as "a magnificent display of new policy."

Mr. Fawcett

[Cheers from the Ministerial Benches.]

Yes, that sentiment was cheered, and he was going to say other things which hon. Members opposite would also cheer. They had said that, after the movement of those Indian troops, Europe would see England in a different position. [Cheers.] Yes, that also was cheered, and hon. Members opposite would likewise cheer this—they said that Russia and every other European Power would see by that act that England did not rely simply on that military strength which was defined by the Mutiny Act; but that, in consequence of it, they would be made aware that they had to deal with a country who could draw inexhaustible supplies from an unlimited Indian Army. [Cheers.] This also would be cheered—they said that, whereas England formerly had a small Army, now she had a large Army, and was presented in a different aspect before admiring and terrified Europe. Well, all that sort of thing could not be proclaimed on a thousand platforms, and hon. Members opposite be permitted to come down to that House and, influenced by the exigencies of debate, attempt to minimize the act, of which they spoke in terms of such admiration, by saying that it was nothing more than had been done before; or, as he (Mr. Fawcett) had before observed, that it was the same as sending a Madras regiment to Singapore or a certain number of troops to Abyssinia. The question which the House had to consider was a simple one. In the first place, he, and those with whom he acted, maintained that no emergency existed in politics to justify the Government in pursuing a policy of secrecy and concealment towards the English Parliament; and, in the second place, they contended that even if such an emergency had occurred, the course which the Government had adopted was not that which ought to have been pursued. What, he would ask, was the evidence of emergency? The journals which were the most thorough-going in their support of the Ministry had over and over again declared that there was not the slightest justification for the secrecy which had been observed. The excuse of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was, that if the Government had taken Parliament into their confidence, difficulties would have been placed in the way of transport;

but a Member of the House, who was practically acquainted with the shipping trade, had stated that if the Government had only announced frankly what they were about to do, they would have obtained the transport ships at a much less cost than they actually had to pay, and that would be conclusively proved, he was informed, when the Supplementary Estimates were laid upon the Table. But, even admitting that they had to pay £3 or £4 a-ton more for transports, were the resources of England, he would ask, so poor, that in order to save that paltry sum the Constitutional usages of the country were to be, to say the least of it, greatly strained? But the defence of the policy of secrecy by the Secretary of State for the Colonies and the Under Secretary of State for India, if not more substantial than the plea of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, involved considerations which suggested a more material issue. Their justification was, in effect, that if the Government had come down to Parliament and made known their intentions, they would have been hampered by Parliament, and that they were not certain of obtaining its approval. But the Government could not escape this dilemma—they were either certain that they could obtain the approval of Parliament for the employment of Indian troops, or they were not. If they were, the contention of the noble Leader of the Opposition—that what they might have done with the permission of Parliament as a military demonstration, would have been greatly strengthened, was irresistible. If they were not certain of obtaining the approval of Parliament, what was the position in which they placed the House when they set it at defiance. They set it at defiance, and prevented Parliament from discussing a question and expressing an opinion upon a subject on which they admitted there was some doubt. Nothing, to his mind, could be more fatal to the Privileges of that Assembly. Now, what had been the conduct of the Chancellor of the Exchequer? During the Easter Recess he (Mr. Fawcett) carefully abstained from saying a word in public on the subject. He thought it was quite possible the Chancellor of the Exchequer might have come down to the House, when it re-assembled, and given convincing proof that a case of emergency existed. The right hon.

Gentleman, however, did not utter a single syllable to that effect. He did not tender any apology, much less show any justification for the extraordinary course the Government had pursued. On the contrary, he treated the whole matter in the lightest possible manner, and as if they were dealing with the most indifferent question; and he coolly informed the House that the Government did not deem it necessary, nor, in his opinion, was it customary, that they should on such a subject communicate their decision to Parliament. Could there be any language employed more calculated to show that at that time the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not suppose that the Government were justified in what they had done on the plea of emergency? But admitting, for the sake of argument, that emergency did really exist, what was the course which the Government ought to have adopted? Without an hour's delay, they ought to have come down to the House, and said—"On our own responsibility, but in face of what we considered an emergency, we have acted, we know, illegally. We have illegally spent the money of India, and we ask you to pass at once a short Act which will give absolute security to the people of that country that any money which has been so expended shall be repaid." That was what might have been done, but what had not been done. Instead of that, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that a Supplementary Estimate would be introduced; but was there ever such a shadow of Constitutional control presented for the acceptance of the House of Commons? Suppose they arrived at the conclusion that the expenditure incurred was useless and mischievous, in what position would they be placed? Then, when was the Indian Government to be re-imbursed the cost of this Expedition? No statement had been made as to when the Supplementary Estimate would be produced; if a Dissolution occurred, it might not be produced for months and months. But there was another matter in connection with the financial aspect of the question to which he desired to refer. He should like to know, moreover, whether, before spending the money, Her Majesty's Government had obtained the consent of the Council of the Secretary of State for India? because, if they had not, they had violated an essential principle of the financial administration of India. But it was not merely with financial considerations that the House had to deal. No Indian troops could be moved to Europe without raising political questions of the greatest importance connected with England and India. The measure, therefore, was one on which the people of India and England had a right to be consulted. He was not, however, going to discuss prematurely the policy of employing Indian troops in Europe. It was not necessary to do so at present. If the course which the Government had taken was to continue, he did not see what possible good could result from hon. Members expending their time and their energies in simply going through the barren performance of registering the uncontrolled decrees of an uncontrollable Government. Some hon. Members had attempted to minimize the importance of the subject by saying that the Indian contingent numbered only 7,000 men; but the question really was, whether Her Majesty's Government were to be allowed to draw to an unlimited extent upon the military resources of India for a European war? There were hundreds of thousands of English citizens who objected to the employment of Indian troops in Europe, and who, whenever they had an opportunity of expressing their opinions on the subject, would show that they were not, as the Colonial Secretary had termed them, an "obscure section" of the English public. They objected to that employment on principle, and they felt that if England entered into a war, it would be a mean and ungenerous thing to throw the sacrifice of life and blood which that war would entail upon people who were not responsible for its being waged. Those to whom he referred felt that in the past England had been strong enough in her own resources to maintain and defend her position and reputation in Europe, and that what had been done before might be done again by the valour of British soldiers. Then, had Her Majesty's Government thought of the sequel, looked at from an Indian point of view? The campaign would end victoriously, and the Indian troops, flushed with victory, and proud of having fought side by side with English soldiers on equal terms—they might even have been complimented by the British nation, and thanked by that House—

having done this, they would return to India to find themselves placed under a badge of servitude and denied the privilege of having officers of their own race and creed to lead them. Would not that spread far and wide over India a sense of injustice dangerous to our rule? Once more, take the military expenditure of India and the taxation which it necessitated. The House had already been told, and, no doubt, would be told again, boastingly, that the policy of the Government would be supported by a large majority of hon. Members; but he wished to take this opportunity of giving Notice that on the Indian Budget he would move a Resolution which would be something in the following terms:—

"That, it having been decided that the Army of India is so large that an indefinite number of Indian troops can be spared to aid England in a European contest, this House is of opinion that the Indian military expenditure is excessive; that India has to maintain more troops than is necessary for her own defence; that the expenditure, consequently, ought to be reduced, and various taxes repealed which now prove burdensome to the Indian people."

He intended to press that Resolution to a division. [Ministerial cheers.] He did not intend to shirk a division, and he should speak upon the Motion in distinct words which, he thought, would be understood in India, unless, under the gagging Press Law recently introduced, they were charged with sedition and suppressed. He was not attempting to enter into Constitutional Law, nor did he intend to say much about Prerogative. He was not going to define strictly the limits of Prerogative; but every tyro knew that there were Prerogatives of the Crown which, though they legally existed, could not for a moment be used, and which were only allowed to continue, because no Minister was rash or unwise enough to disturb the long repose wherein they had slumbered. Hitherto, the people of England had believed that no Minister would be rash or reckless enough to disturb that principle, which was regarded as one of our most cherished traditions, that Parliament should keep a direct control over the strength of the standing Army. That control had now been destroyed, and the voting of a certain number of men in the Mutiny Bill would henceforth become an idle farce, because an hour after it was passed, the Government could add indefinitely to the strength of the English

Army in Europe, and indirectly could more than double the strength of the standing Army employed in England. The essence of the Mutiny Bill had been destroyed, and it would be an idle farce to waste a single moment next Session in discussing it. He believed that, a month ago, the great majority of the English people had supposed that there was no more chance of the Prerogative of the Crown being used to destroy the control of Parliament over the standing Army than there was of its being used to veto a Bill which had been passed by a vast majority in both Houses of Parliament. The Government maintained that they could exercise this Prerogative legally. He believed it was an illegal act; but, even if it were a legal act, it must raise a grave question, on which he would await with confidence the decision of the country. He and his Friends would put it to the country, for they would not let the subject drop. They knew they could not defeat the Government now, but they were protesting against what the Government had done. They would continue to protest against it, on every opportunity, to the people of England, and whenever the opportunity came—and he, for one, said the sooner the better—they would put to the English people this broad and intelligible question—“Is it your wish that the control which Parliament has exercised in the past over the strength of the English Army shall be continued, or do you desire that the control which your forefathers struggled for should, by the exercise of a dominant Prerogative, be virtually taken away from the House of Commons?”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) said, that the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), who had just concluded what was a very eloquent speech, had complained somewhat bitterly of the narrow and technical “trough” to which that question was confined. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman did right in making that complaint; but, if so, he (the Attorney General) thought the House would agree with him that the complaint ought to have been directed against the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Boroughs (the Marquess of Hartington), and not against Her Majesty’s Government; because he did not know who was to blame for the question being confined in a narrow and technical “trough,” except the noble Lord, who was the originator of the Motion. It could not be objected, however, that the hon. Member for Hackney had confined his remarks to the narrow and technical “trough,” for he had diverged from it, and embarked upon the discussion of a variety of questions, which certainly had nothing in the world to do with the issue before the House, but which the Government would be prepared to answer when the proper time arose. For his own part, he (the Attorney General) did not say that he had any particular objection to the hon. Gentleman taking that course; only he thought it would be more convenient if the House were to enter into the consideration which the hon. Gentleman had raised, that the House should have had some Notice of these questions. He entertained no doubt that Her Majesty’s Ministers would be quite willing to embark on the question as to whether there was any emergency which justified the removal of the Indian troops from India to Malta. He had no doubt that, on a proper occasion, the Government would be quite willing to enter into the question as to whether they had pursued the course which they ought to have pursued; and, also, into the question whether the expenditure out of the Revenues of India could be justified or not. They would likewise, he daresay, enter upon the question, when they were asked to do so, whether the employment of Indian troops in Europe was an advantageous and a politic proceeding. All these points were interesting in themselves, but they had nothing to do with the Motion of the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition. That Motion raised a grave Constitutional question, and however reluctant the House might be to deal with a Constitutional question, yet as the question had been raised, it was incumbent on those against whom the Motion was directed to deal with it as far as they were able. The proposition of the noble Lord was a very simple one; it was a very abstract one; and it had a very academical and forensic air about it. It was more forensic than it was academical. He could trace in it the hand—or hands, he was going to say—of a learned Constitutional lawyer. But that phrase would hardly suit his purpose, because he did not think that this was a Constitutional Motion. But he could trace the hand in it of a legal Parliamentary practitioner. The Motion was very skilfully and astutely framed. It was the Motion of the noble Lord; but its language, and the ideas which that language conveyed, were the language and ideas of the legal advisers of the noble Lord. It was framed like a legal document. It recited the substance of the Bill of Rights and of the Mutiny Act, and the only objection one had to it was that it did not recite correctly. Those who had framed the Motion said that it recited the legal effect of those documents. Anybody reading the Motion, who was not particularly conversant with the Bill of Rights or with the Mutiny Act, would suppose that there was an exact statement in it of the substance of the Bill of Rights and the substance of the Mutiny Act; but, when he came to consult the Bill of Rights and the Mutiny Act, he would find that he was very much mistaken. Lawyers, in the good old times of subtle astute pleading, when they framed an indictment against a man, for example, who had committed an offence in Timbuctoo, and they wanted to give jurisdiction here, said, the offence was committed in Timbuctoo, to wit, in the city of Westminster, in the county of Middlesex; and he wondered his hon. and learned Friend who assisted the noble Lord in the framing of the Motion did not state that it was against the Constitution, and so on, for the Crown, in a time of peace, and without the consent of Parliament, within any part of the United Kingdom—that was to say, within any portion of the Dominions of the Crown—to do so-and-so; because the whole question which arose upon this part of the case rested upon this—whether or not the Bill of Rights and the Mutiny Act applied not only to the United Kingdom, but to the other Dominions of the Crown? The Motion of the noble Lord contained an abstract proposition, and he (the Attorney General) supposed it was intended to cover the particular case of the removal of Indian troops from India to Malta, and to assert that, in some way or other, that proceeding was illegal. But he thought the House, upon the consideration of the question, would come to the conclusion that the design of the Motion had not been accomplished, and could not be accomplished, because the proposition which the Motion enunciated was altogether and radically unsound. If that was the conclusion at which the House arrived, he did not suppose anybody would be able to go into the Lobby to support the noble Lord's proposition. But as he had said the proposition was unsound, it was incumbent on him to make some effort, even at the expense of tiring the House by a legal discussion, to demonstrate the truth and justice of that which he had advanced. In considering the proposition which was contained in this Motion, it was important to bear in mind what were the Prerogatives of the Crown which were now the subject of discussion before the Bill of Rights and the Mutiny Act passed. Now, before the Bill of Rights passed into law, he did not think any hon. Gentleman would be willing to dispute that it was the Prerogative of the Crown to declare war and to make peace, or would dispute that a recital which was contained in an Act of Parliament still on the Statute Book was perfectly true—namely, that—

“Within the realms and dominions of the Crown the sole and supreme government and command of the militia, and of all forces by sea and by land, and of all forts and places of strength, is, and by the laws of England was, the undoubted right of the Crown, and both or either House of Parliament cannot and ought not to pretend to the same.”

He did not think anyone would deny that, at all events, before the Bill of Rights passed into law, it was the Prerogative of the Crown not only to command and control the Forces of the Realm, but also, when necessary, to raise and maintain those Forces. Before that Bill passed into law, the Crown used to gather together the Forces necessary to repel invasion or to wage war against other countries. It had also within its Prerogative the enrolment of the Militia Force, and the appointment of the Lord Lieutenant, who in each county was the Constitutional Commander of that Force, and considerable Regular Forces had been raised and kept up by the Crown before the Bill of Rights became law. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich cheered that sentiment and that view of the case, and, from the tone of the right hon. Gentleman, he (the Attorney General) was inclined to believe that his cheer was somewhat sarcastic. The right hon. Gentleman would of course be able in his turn to explain his own view of the matter, and he durst say the right hon. Gentleman's explanation would entirely overwhelm him; but, at all events, he had a right to entertain his own view. It had been said, and probably would be said again, that the Bill of Rights contained not a new enactment with reference to the law, but simply a declaration of what the law really was. Well, that might be so, but he himself did not think it was. He did not know that that was very important, but he wanted the House to have a just notion of the question they were dealing with. It might be important; but he did not think so, for two reasons, which he would give—first, because if it was the common law which was declared by the Bill of Rights, he should not have expected in the reign of Charles the First, when the Bill of Rights was presented, when there was such a fervour with regard to outraged liberties, that the only complaint with respect to the Army assembled at that time would have been, as it was, that it was dispersed into the various counties in the Kingdom and quartered on the inhabitants of those counties, much to the vexation and grievance of the inhabitants thereof. That was the complaint which was made in the Petition for the Bill of Rights, and there was not a syllable there that it was not the Prerogative of the Crown to maintain these troops. He found a passage on the subject in a work of one of the most eminent and celebrated Constitutional lawyers—he meant Mr. Hallam. He said, with reference to this matter—

“The most questionable proposition, though at the same time one of the most important, was that which asserts the illegality of a standing army in times of peace unless with the consent of Parliament. It seems difficult to perceive in what respect this infringed on any man's private right or by what reason (for no statute could be pretended) the King was debarred from enlisting soldiers by voluntary contract for the defence of his dominions, especially after an express law had declared the sole power over the militia, without giving any definition of that word, to reside in the Crown.”—[Constitutional History, c. xv.]

Those who had ironically cheered him when he said that the declaration of the Bill of Rights was not a correct declaration of the common law would perhaps ironically cheer Mr. Hallam's enunciation of the same proposition. But, however that might be, they must take the Bill of Rights as it stood, and he was as willing as any man to approve that celebrated Statute. He did not care, however, whether the common law was stated in the Bill of Rights or not. The question for the House to consider was, what was the limit to the Crown's Prerogative which was imposed by the Bill of Rights? He knew that some hon. Gentlemen had, so to speak, thrown overboard the Bill of Rights, finding, on inspection, that it did not suit them. They were in love with it when the noble Lord's Resolution was framed, but they had become disillusionized; and they also found that the Mutiny Act did not support them, nor suit the spirit of the proposition that had been laid down. But as the noble Lord's Resolution went forth to the country professedly based on those notable Acts, it was incumbent on him to consider that question. Now, the question was, what limit on the Crown's Prerogative with respect to the military Forces was imposed by the Bill of Rights? and he would presently come to the limit proposed by the Mutiny Act. The Bill of Rights said this—that the raising and keeping of a standing Army within the Kingdom in time of peace, unless it were with the consent of Parliament, was against law. That enactment was quite plain and clear. It was passed at a time when the Kingdom consisted of the Kingdom of England only. It was confined, he asserted, in its operation to the Kingdom. That was the natural meaning of the word that was used, and there was nothing in the circumstances of the case which should induce anybody to strain that natural meaning, to make it read otherwise. Moreover, the mischief which that Act of Parliament was intended to meet and grapple with was met and grappled with by the terms used in the Statute itself, for, undoubtedly, one of the great objects which the Legislature had in view when the Bill of Rights came before it was to prevent the Houses of Parliament and the Members who had their homes in this country from being overawed and coerced by the presence of a standing Army. Such a consideration, however, had no reference to the Dominions of the Crown beyond the Kingdom. Therefore it was that that provision was inserted in the Act, and that it was confined to the Kingdom. If anybody had any doubt as to that, let him consider that at the time when that Statute was passed there was a standing Army in a Dependency of the Crown—namely, in Ireland—which was not touched by the Bill of Rights and was not limited in any way, and that there were also Forces of the Crown in other Dependencies and Colonies of the Kingdom with which the Bill of Rights did not in the slightest degree interfere. There was a considerable standing Army in Ireland, and it was not until many years after the Bill was passed into law, that any Act was passed which interfered with it. But, if they wanted any further confirmation of his proposition that the Bill of Rights was confined to the Kingdom, they would find it in the fact that after the Kingdom became enlarged, after the Union with Scotland and with Ireland, after the constitution of one Parliament for the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, they had in the Mutiny Act, passed year by year, this declaration in the shape of a recital of what the law was—namely, that for the Crown to maintain an Army in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in time of peace without the consent of Parliament was against the law. That they had before them in the Bill of Rights. Therefore, they had before them the Bill of Rights as interpreted by the Legislature in every succeeding year since the formation of the Constitution of Great Britain and Ireland; they had the Mutiny Bill, passed annually by the most eminent statesmen and lawyers whom this country could produce, and stating, year by year, that that law was applicable only to the state of things in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. Then, what more was to be required? If the Bill of Rights and the Mutiny Act applied merely to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and they were intended to remedy the evils which existed and which were apprehended—evils which had reference simply to the state of things in Great Britain and Ireland—what became of the contention that the proposition of the noble Lord was one which the House could accept? If what he had pointed out were correctly pointed out—if his enunciation of the law were right—the proposition of the noble Lord must necessarily fall to the ground, because; so far as it extended to the Dominions of the Crown outside of the Kingdom, it was utterly unsupported and fallacious. Let him not be misunderstood. While endeavouring to explain what the Prerogative of the Crown was, he would not be supposed to deny that Parliament had anything to do with the Forces maintained by the Crown—no one on that side—certainly no one on the Government benches—had ever contended for anything of that kind. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary for the Colonies, whenever they had spoken on the question, had always confessed that the power Parliament possessed over the Forces which might be raised by Her Majesty was a power of very great importance, and one which, in fact, gave to Parliament almost a complete check and control; for no one denied that if Forces were raised—he cared not where—in the Dominions of the Crown, and if they had to be paid out of the Revenues of this Kingdom, Parliament had a complete check, because it might refuse the requisite Supplies. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had from beginning to end said—"We contend that we have a right to move these Forces from India to Malta; but we do not contend that, after they have arrived at Malta, and when they have to be maintained there at the expense of the Revenues of this country, it will be in the power of the Crown or of Ministers to keep and maintain them there. But what we say is, that if they are to remain there at the cost of this country, we must come to Parliament with the fullest possible explanations, and ask for the requisite grant of money for them." He had no doubt that those who knew more about the policy of that measure than he could do would have no difficulty in satisfying the House at the proper time that there was an urgent necessity for ordering those troops to be brought from India to Malta without a previous communication to Parliament. That, however, was not the question they were now called on to discuss, but they had before them an abstract proposition. Allusion had been made in more than one speech to something that took place in the last century. In their laudable endeavours to assist the Government in carrying out the wise and prudent policy upon which they had determined, the noble Lord and those who followed him in supporting his Resolution, had gone far and wide to see if they could not discover precedents which would justify their proposition; and, amongst the precedents which they had pointed out to justify to some extent that for which they contended, was a discussion which took place in the year 1775, when certain Hanoverian troops were sent to Gibraltar and Minorca to garrison the fortifications of those places. Port Mahon was one of the places they were sent to. Now, in the discussion of that subject, if they might rely on the reports—but he did not think it would be very wise to rely implicitly on the reports of the debates in that House at that time—a good many, as he thought, wild and fantastical notions were expressed with reference to the Bill of Rights on the one side and the other. But the real discussion turned upon this—here were foreign troops, owing allegiance to a foreign Sovereign—because it was not the King of England, but the Elector of Hanover, who had the control of these troops—here were foreign troops, and a foreign Sovereign importing these foreign troops into fortresses of this Kingdom. Objection was made to this proceeding, and, in his humble opinion, it was rightly made on several grounds. In the first place, if they took, not the Bill of Rights, but the Act of Settlement, that Act provided, in short, that no foreigner, no person who was not a native-born subject of the Crown, should be entrusted with any military or civil post; and it was perfectly clear that, if those troops were sent to Gibraltar and Port Mahon, those in command of them would be entrusted with military offices of the greatest possible importance, and that the entrusting them with these offices was an infringement of the Act of Settlement, though in no shape or respect an infringement of the Bill of Rights. Again, those troops owed no allegiance to the Sovereign of England; the allegiance which they owed was to the Elector of Hanover. Further, they were sent to Gibraltar and Minorca while under no Mutiny Law which emanated from the Legislature of this country. At all events, so far as this country was concerned, they were under no Mutiny Law at all, and they might, if they had so chosen—though, as matter of fact, we knew their conduct was irreproachable—have surrendered the fortress of Gibraltar to the enemy, and not a single man of them could have been tried under military law, or any other law of this country. For these reasons, therefore, was it not abundantly clear that, without the slightest reference to the Bill of Rights, or the Mutiny Act, or any other Act but the Act of Settlement, it was wise for those eminent statesmen who objected to the proceedings in 1775 to make their objections, and that those objections ought to have been supported? He had said that there was a Bill of Indemnity introduced, and that Bill was carried with one single exception, although it was not ultimately accepted. He did not wish to examine minutely into what was done, or to say that because it was done in Parliament, therefore it was right—for that was not his opinion upon all occasions, and especially so in the circumstances of the case he was alluding to. But he did say this—that, as far as he could form an opinion on the subject, those who were at the helm of affairs would have done well to have accepted, or introduced themselves, a Bill of Indemnity to cure the irregularity. But what, in the name of fortune, had that incident of 1775 to do with the question which they were discussing? The Commanders of these Indian troops were not aliens who would be put in positions of trust under the Act of Settlement; they were not persons who were not natural-born subjects of Her Majesty. Indian troops were not foreigners; for though their colour was slightly deeper, he supposed no one in that House, be he ever so great a Constitutional lawyer, would deny that the Indian troops were subjects of Her Majesty. What in the world, then, had they to do with the incident of 1775? For what reason was it lugged into this discussion, except that hon. Gentlemen who wanted to support the proposition of the noble Marquess found that, unless they lugged something into the discussion beyond the Bill of Rights and the Mutiny Act, with which they started, they could not possibly make anything of it? It seemed to him that no great light was thrown on the matter by discussing what was done in 1775, or that the House would derive any material advantage in considering what was done in 1794, when, he believed, certain troops—Austrians or Hessians, were landed in the Isle of Wight. Undoubtedly, certain objections also were taken to that step; but it was settled that there was a case of great emergency, and what possible analogy they could draw, on one side or the other, from the fact of those troops being introduced into the island, or what possible light they could get from the discussions when the matter was brought upon the carpet, he was, for his part, unable to find out. It seemed to him that they would derive much greater benefit from dealing with this question upon the principle which was involved, and from considering the consequences which would follow, supposing the proposition of the noble Lord was a right one. With respect to the principle, he (the Attorney General) had shown that the Bill of Rights did not extend beyond the Kingdom, that the English Mutiny Act did not extend beyond the United Kingdom, and that the reasons for these enactments were reasons confined within the area of the Kingdom in one case, and of the United Kingdom in the other. Now, he would examine for a moment the consequences which might ensue if the proposition of the noble Lord were accepted. If the proposition of the noble Lord were accepted, what would happen to the inhabitants of the Colonies and Dependencies of the Crown, for had they not been committing a most gross and flagrant infringement of the Bill of Rights and of the Constitutional law of this country? [Sir HENRY JAMES dissented.] His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Taunton shook his head, and might state presently what he had to say to the contrary; but, having advanced his proposition, he (the Attorney General) would try now to establish it. In the Colonies and Dependencies of this country there were Forces of many descriptions, constituting the Militia and Volunteers, and in several there were Regular Standing Forces. [The Marquess of HARTINGTON: How many?] "How many?" said the noble Lord. He did not care if there were only a dozen. If they said they would not introduce more than seven regiments, what had the number to do with it? Hon. Gentlemen opposite said that when seven regiments were brought, 70 regiments might also be brought, and, of course, it was the principle that was important in both cases. He said that if there were in the Colonies and Dependencies of the Crown—Victoria, for example—Regular Forces established at all, what did it matter whether they were 1, 100, or 200—a troop of Cavalry, a regiment of Infantry, or a battery or two of Artillery? They were there, and were raised and maintained not out of the Revenues of this country; they were maintained in the Dominions of Her Majesty, they were under the control and command of Her Majesty, and were raised on Her Majesty's behalf. Would hon. Gentlemen deny that it was so? It might be that there were not many of these troops besides the Militia; but there were great bodies of Militia, and he would not pause to dwell on that point, because it might be fairly said, by way of distinction, that the Militia did not come under the category of a standing Army. He should have thought that when they were called out they did; but it was no use labouring that point, because it was possible something might be said against it, and it was no use labouring a point of that kind when he had so many against which nothing could be said. Could anyone deny that if the Government of the Dominion of Canada liked, it could raise a standing Army? [Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] He was glad the right hon. Member for Greenwich said "Hear, hear!" and that the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) endorsed it by a pleasing smile. Under the British North America Act of 1857, the Dominion Government had power to raise a force of Militia—or, in the words of the Act, "any Force for the Military or Naval Service." Now, for anything they knew, next year, or the year after, or in a few years, the Legislature of the Dominion might think proper to raise Forces for the protection of the Dominion. He did not think anybody would object; at all events, not hon. Gentlemen on the other side, because many of them in 1862 maintained that, under the circumstances of the time, it was desirable that the Colonies should be able to raise Forces for their own defence. Well, then, supposing they took that step, would anybody contend that those Forces, which would not be within the Realm, but which would be raised on behalf of Her Majesty, would be under the control of Parliament, or that they would be improperly raised without the consent of the Imperial Parliament? He knew what would be urged against this by his hon. Friends on the other side. They would say that if the Dominion raised this Army, it would be raised with the consent of Parliament. Hon. Members might say that it would be raised under an Act of the Dominion authorized by an Act of the Imperial Parliament. Hon. Members opposite might say so, and if so, let them have the benefit of it; but if they did say so, he should like to know under what authority the Native troops in India were raised? Were they raised simply by a law of the Governor General in Council in India? No; they were raised under a law of the Governor General in Council in India, which was sanctioned by, and which was enacted under, the authority of the Imperial Legislature. Therefore, the Force which might be raised in Canada and the Force in India would stand exactly upon the same footing; and if it were said of one of those Forces that they could not be moved without the consent of the Imperial Parliament, exactly the same thing must be said of the other also. But there was something further to indicate the extraordinary nature of the proposition advanced by hon. Members opposite. It was said that the Mutiny Act specified the number of the Forces that might be raised in Her Majesty's Dominions, and that they amounted, he thought, to some 135,000 men—he forgot the exact figures—exclusive of the Forces of Her Majesty that were serving in India. That was one of the expressions derived from the Mutiny Act which were so carefully inserted in the Motion of the noble Lord. Well, but those Forces of Her Majesty serving in India comprised not only the Native Indian troops, but the English regiments of the Line which happened to be in India, and which, happening to be in India, were not maintained out of the Revenues of this country, but out of those of India. So there would be this curious state of things—that if, for example, during war, an invasion of one of their Colonies was threatened—it might be an Australian Colony—and if, before war actually broke out, because some distinction appeared to be drawn between a state of peace and a state of war as it affected that question; and, therefore, for the sake of illustration, he would take a time of peace—and if the Colony, for the protection of themselves and of the Imperial interests, were desirous to have some assistance, and it was resolved to send to them some of the regiments of the Line which happened to be stationed in India, if the contention of hon. Members opposite were correct, it would, notwithstanding that the Colony was willing to pay for their maintenance, be an illegal act on the part of the Crown to send those regiments to them. And thus—for it was the conclusion to which they were driven—rather than Her Majesty should have the power of sending a few of the English regiments from India to the assistance of their Colonies in time of threatened invasion, though before the outbreak of war, hon. Members opposite would raise this wonderful Constitutional objection, and say—"No, you shall not send them," and would thus do their best to prevent that timely assistance being furnished. He thought that these consequences of the contention into which the noble Lord and those who followed him must necessarily be driven were of themselves almost sufficient to prove the absurdity of the proposition which they advanced. He knew that the hon. and learned Member for Oxford had disregarded consequences altogether. The hon. and learned Gentleman had made a speech about "the great Constitutional principle," whatever that might mean. The hon. and learned Gentlemen began by making a speech in support of this Resolution, which was founded upon the Bill of Rights, but very shortly he found that the Bill of Rights did not suit his purpose. The hon. and learned Gentleman had taken up the Bill of Rights as a battle-axe, but its handle broke in his hand; then he took up the truncheon of the Mutiny Act, and even that had slipped from his grasp, for he could make nothing of it; and then he bethought himself of "the great constitutional principle which underlies the whole state of our society," which somehow or another he sought to fish up in support of this Resolution. This last weapon, however, was like the masquerader's weapon—it consisted of nothing but an empty bladder tied at the end of a stick. Another point, however, had been raised, and a good deal had been made of it. It was the one which rested upon the Act for the Government of India, which was passed in 1858. He understood, in the course of the debate, that it was asserted there was something in that Act which rendered this movement of the Native Indian troops from India to Malta illegal. His position, however, was this—he contended that Her Majesty had the control and management of the Forces in India; that they were Her Forces; and that it was Her Prerogative, for the good of the Empire—and he did not suppose that Her Majesty would use them for any other purpose—to move those Forces from India, where they were, to Malta, or to anywhere else, leaving it to the Imperial Parliament, when they got there, subsequently to sanction the step which had been taken by voting the necessary Supplies. When this Act for the Government of India was rightly considered, it would be found that, instead of condemning his contention, it altogether blessed it. That Act was passed in 1858, and when it was before the Committee of that House, the right hon. Member for Greenwich—who, of course, was always particularly cautious lest the Prerogative of the Crown should be encroached upon—introduced a clause which was directed, to a certain extent, against the Prerogative of the Crown. That clause was as follows:—

“That, except for repelling actual invasion, or under other sudden and urgent necessity, Her Majesty’s Forces in the East Indies shall not be employed in any Military operation beyond the external frontier of Her Majesty’s Indian Possessions without the consent of Parliament to the purposes thereof.”—[3 Hansard, cli. 1067.]

The purport of that clause throughout was this—that, although it had been legal theretofore to employ Her Majesty’s troops in India anywhere else, for the future those Forces should not be employed outside the limits of our Indian Empire without the consent of Parliament. Had that clause been passed into law, hon. Members opposite would have been fully justified in contending that it was illegal to move the Native Indian troops from India to Malta. The right hon. Member for Greenwich had introduced that clause with a speech which was very convincing, because the clause was carried by a considerable majority. He would not weary the House by referring in detail to what was said upon that occasion, but would content himself with saying that many of the then associates of the right hon. Gentleman—such as Lord Palmerston, Earl Granville, Lord John Russell, and the late Mr. Wilson—protested against that clause on the ground that it was an undue restriction and fetter which the right hon. Gentleman was placing upon the Prerogative of the Crown. Cogent arguments were urged against the proposal, but they did not convince the right hon. Gentleman, who persisted and carried his clause. But when its effect came to be better known, and when the Bill went up to the House of Lords, the House of Lords would not have the clause at any price. The objections which had been raised against it in that House were reiterated in the House of Lords, and the late Lord Derby, in order to get rid of it, introduced and carried the clause which now stood in the Act, and which ran as follows:—

[“Hear, hear!”] He was delighted to find that hon. Members opposite appreciated so nicely the distinction between the two clauses. There was nothing in the clause which prevented Her Majesty from exercising Her Prerogative and bringing these troops from India to Malta—in fact, it was impliedly conceded that she might do so; but there was something in the clause, and properly so, to prevent the operation which might be carried on, not exclusively for the benefit of India, being saddled on the Indian Revenue. They were dealing with a nice, he might say a subtle, Constitutional question, and Her Majesty’s Government were not going to muddle up two things so entirely distinct, and to say that because the clause prevented the expenses of removing the Native Indian Troops from India to Malta being saddled upon the Revenues of India, therefore Her Majesty had no power to move those troops to such places as She might think it expedient they should be sent to. No one had ever contended, so far as he was aware, that the expense of moving these troops should be saddled upon the Indian revenues. Boldly and candidly he asserted that that expense would have to come out of the Revenues of this country, and that Parliament would have to be asked for the necessary Supplies. Doubtless, difficulties might arise in apportioning the cost of the troops; but he was informed that the balance of the account between India and this country was generally in favour of this country, and, therefore, the only result of our defraying these charges would be that the balance in our favour would be reduced by a small amount. Precedents had been cited by hon. Members opposite, and he would not touch upon those precedents further than to say that there were numbers of instances in which the Native Indian troops had been moved, and had been stationed, not in foreign parts, but on the frontiers of the Territories of the Crown, and that in some cases in time of peace. The hon. and learned Member for Oxford had alluded to the case where an outbreak of the Maories in New Zealand had been apprehended and application had been made to the Home Government for some Indian troops to assist the Colonial Forces in putting it down. The then Government promised to send some of the Native Indian regiments to assist the inhabitants of the Colony to suppress the threatened outbreak. After the Government had promised that this should be done, however, it was said that they found there was an unconstitutional pitfall in which they might be plunged. The consequence was, they immediately revoked their order, but to this extent only—that, instead of Native troops, they sent to the assistance of the Colonists in New Zealand three or four English regiments of the Line which happened at the time to be stationed in India. What was the difference in a Constitutional point of view between these two courses for he could not see any. If it were unconstitutional to send Native troops to assist the Colonists in New Zealand, was it not unconstitutional to send troops of the Line? Were they not just as much “Forces serving within Her Majesty’s Indian Possessions,” paid by the Revenues of India, and not paid a single sixpence out of the Revenues of this country? That, he thought, disposed of the precedent which was sought to be set up. A good deal had been said about a course of the kind which had been taken by the Government, being taken in time of war. What in the world did it matter whether Her Majesty removed Her troops in time of war or of peace? [“Oh, oh!”] Why, it was the same thing, and for this reason—that wonderful idea of peace was derived from the Mutiny Act and the Bill of Rights. Because it was said, under those statutes, that certain things might not be done in the United Kingdom in time of peace, it was therefore contended that the same thing might not be done out of the United Kingdom. With regard to this last question, neither the Mutiny Act, the Bill of Rights, the Act for the Government of India, nor the wonderful Constitutional principles which had been pumped up by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford, would avail anything. If Her Majesty could move Her troops where She pleased in time of war, he could not see that any Constitutional principle was violated by Her moving them in time of peace. The Parliament in either case would be there to vote all the necessary Supplies alike for the cost of moving the troops and of maintaining them in the place or places to which they had been moved. But, supposing the interpretation to which he had referred—but could not admit—were true, would anyone say that Europe was in a state of perfect peace? It might be, and was, that the Continent was not in a state of war; but it might be likened to a beautiful Summer’s day, when threatening clouds suddenly darkened the sky, and no drops of rain fell or thunder rolled or lightning flashed—a sudden change might occur which would very speedily develop and bring, almost immediately, rain, and lightning, and thunder where a few minutes before all had been peace and brightness. Let them look at the war that had been waged and had only just ceased; look at the plains of Europe glistening with a wilderness of bayonets; consider the blood which had been shed; look at the preparations for war heard of on all sides; and then ask themselves—was that a time of profound peace? He did not say it was war, but he did say that the Government—if any Government could do so constitutionally—was justified in resorting to every precaution against war. He should say no more. That was not exactly the time in which such a Motion as that of the noble Lord should be introduced. The people were earnestly waiting for the issue of the negotiations that were now going on; they were on the tip-toe of expectation; they were anxious to ascertain whether the firm and determined attitude which the Government had assumed would be productive of benefit, and would secure the interests of this country; and they were not particularly interested in this quibbling on Constitutional rights.

MR. GLADSTONE: Mr. Speaker, my noble Friend, when he introduced the Motion before the House, stated that he intended to confine himself altogether to the Constitutional and legal question which it appeared to raise, and added that he would avoid a discussion on questions of policy. The Attorney General made the same promise; but the difference was that, while my noble Friend adhered to his promise with the utmost strictness till the conclusion of his speech, on the other hand, the Attorney General, who has given us a very valuable and useful exposition of his views upon the legal question, could not refrain in his peroration from adverting to the question of policy, and pronouncing a warm eulogium upon the proceedings of Her Majesty's Government. Well, Sir, I intend to follow, as far as I am able, the example of my noble Friend who kept to his promise, and not that of the Attorney General, who a little departed from his; but I must say one word upon the subject, because, among the many rather notable facts of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary last night, which stated the case of the Government, one was his complaint that we had evaded or avoided any declaration of policy upon the general question. Well, I will not be led into a statement which will occupy even so much as two minutes; but I must say that that charge of the Colonial Secretary appears to me to be most unjust. Everyone of course, looks at these charges as they affect himself. I may, indeed, be liable to the accusation of having gone much beyond the ordinary duty and function of a Member in Opposition in suggesting a policy to the Government; but I own it appears to me that the contrary accusation, so far as it is levelled against me, is altogether absurd. I now tell Her Majesty's Government, that if they will only pursue European objects in concert with Europe, and not by a policy of isolation; if they will only allow Europe to determine upon what terms, and in what method, she will go into Congress; if they will only pursue diplomatic aims by diplomatic means, and refrain from warlike menaces until diplomatic means have failed and just cause for war has appeared—there is a policy, a policy opposed to theirs upon every point, and a policy which many, certainly on this side of the House, have been forward to recommend during all the recent stages of the present discussion. The only other object which remains is the most important of all, and I cannot abandon the hope that it is one in which we may be found at one with Her Majesty's Government. If so, it will be a great comfort, and a great reparation for all that has taken place at former periods—namely, that when once the influence of this country comes to be used in the Councils of Europe for the settlement of the East, it may be used for the purpose of consolidating, confirming, and extending, and not for the purpose of narrowing or impairing the liberties of the subject-races under Turkish rule. Another word I am compelled to say, because we had a gibe from the Attorney General, and a comment from my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) of a very explicit character, which it is impossible to pass by in silence. It appears that we are not the parties authorized to object to what we think a violent extension of the Prerogative of the Crown, on account of what is called the Purchase Warrant. We were ready to defend that Warrant at the time when it was discussed, and it is inconvenient to revive these old controversies—[Laughter]—when they cannot be discussed. If hon. Gentlemen wished me to enter upon a discussion of this question, I should be prepared to go on with it; but as they offer me no encouragement, I will only say, and I challenge contradiction, that the Warrant was devised and passed for the purpose of putting a stop to a gross, habitual, and undoubted violation of the law by the highest authorities. Hon. Members will, perhaps, reflect and inquire a little about the Purchase Warrant, before they welcome a revival of that question. I am extremely sorry the Attorney General has left his place, because it will be my duty to object, as well as I can, to any fundamental propositions that he has laid down on this question as partly a legal and partly a Constitutional question as distinct from legal. It will be my duty to impugn the conduct, not of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in particular—even if I refer to his name, I mean to speak of him simply as the organ of the Government—it will be my duty to impugn the conduct of the Government in this matter distinctly upon Constitutional and legal grounds. We have had a convenient definition, produced from Mr. Hallam, of the word “unconstitutional.” As applied to an act, we are told that the act must be novel, great, and must also have a tendency to the subversion of the law. In that sense of the word, I contend that there are two proceedings of the Government, quite independently of the legal aspect of the question and of the question of policy, which are strictly unconstitutional. Her Majesty’s Government incurred a charge for those Indian troops at the very time they were proposing and carrying the financial measures of the year, without providing any Ways and Means for meeting that charge. Now, Sir, if there is one thing more than another that will come within the definition of Mr. Hallam, it is a proceeding of that kind. Nothing is more novel; few things can better deserve the title of great; and nothing goes more directly towards sapping the fundamental powers of this House, than such a proceeding as I have described. It is the undoubted and paramount duty of Her Majesty’s Government, at the time they submit the financial measures of the year, to make known to Parliament the whole of the Charge which they expect will have to be met within the year, and to propose a provision of Ways and Means to meet the entire Charge. Now, Sir, I am not making a charge against the Chancellor of the Exchequer—which, I believe, has been made by some—that he did not explain to us the nature of the Government measure at the time of his Budget. That is a totally different matter. If the measure were objectionable upon other grounds, and if Her Majesty’s Government thought the revelation of it at that particular moment inexpedient, they were perfectly justified in keeping it secret; but, though justified in keeping it secret, they were not on that account one whit the less bound to make pecuniary provision for that measure. [“No!”] Hon. Gentlemen say they are not. Then, do those hon. Gentleman deny it? because, if so, let them not deny it by what I may call these irresponsible expressions of dissent, but in speech. Let them tell me that they think the Finance Minister is justified in coming with a Budget to this House, detailing to the House what he believes to be the financial Expenditure of the year, calling upon the House to provide Ways and Means to meet that Expenditure, and at the same time keeping back items of expenditure which he believes will be incurred, but which he is not to state to the House of Commons. [“No, no!”] No!—you say he is not justified. Then, I entirely agree with you; and it will remain for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to explain how and why it was, or whether it was—for I shall be very glad to find that the accusation which I make is not founded in fact—it will be for him, I say, to explain whether it was; and, if so, how and why it was, that, knowing that a charge might be incurred during the year for the Indian Forces, he did not include in the Budget what he thought was a sufficient sum to meet the probable amount of that charge? What I am stating is not, I think, unreasonable—[The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Hear, hear!]

—because my right hon. Friend has told us that the first decision of Her Majesty’s Government was taken on the 27th of March, and that the Order was actually sent on the 4th of April. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: The 12th. On the 4th the Budget was submitted.] Well, on the 12th, Her Majesty’s Government were fully aware of this charge; and yet they proceeded with the Budget as they had framed it before they were aware of this charge, and invited the House of Commons to accede to it. We did accede to it, and we voted different taxes on the invitation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that in the full belief—which we were justified in entertaining—that we were making adequate provision for the entire Expenditure of the year, so far as it was foreseen by Her Majesty’s Government. Now, Sir, if the statement can be shaken in its main particulars, I, for one, shall be extremely glad. If it cannot, then I call it an instance of highly unconstitutional conduct. Well, Sir, in the second place, I think it is unconstitutional to deal, as the Government has done—and here there is no doubt at all about the facts—with the power of the House of Commons to vote money. They have placed us under the virtual necessity of meeting an expenditure which they have incurred without our sanction or knowledge. Now, I want to know, if that be allowable, what are the limits of that doctrine? It has been said by some Member of Her Majesty's Government elsewhere, and I may be told, that a Government often gives orders for this or that expenditure in anticipation of the sanction of Parliament. Perfectly true—a fact entirely inseparable from the administration of a great country. But these orders are given for the purpose of expenditure within the ordinary precedents, the ordinary course, and the ordinary necessities of administration. They are not given for things novel; they are given for things "great;" they are not given for things tending to narrow the discretion of Parliament. Is our discretion narrowed in this instance, or is it not? Are we free, or are we not, to refuse to vote this money? You know perfectly well that it would be disgraceful to leave it as a charge upon the Revenues of India. You know this as well—that there is no other source, except the Imperial Exchequer, from which it can be met. So that, instead of giving us a real freedom, you leave us, indeed, that nominal freedom which you cannot take away, and with which it is out of your power to interfere; but you have placed us in a position in which no real discretion can be exercised by us; and this in a case where you have gone against all precedent, and where, if ever there was such a case, it was most desirable that the discretion of Parliament should be unfettered and unimpaired. Sir, it is admitted that the introduction of Native Indian troops into the warfare of this quarter of the globe, independently of the question of their being so introduced in time of peace, is a matter of great novelty, and is a proceeding involving important questions of policy in every sense and in every direction such as, perhaps, can hardly be found in any other proposition that can be made. In the year 1854-5, when the Government of Lord Aberdeen thought it was necessary to ask Parliament to raise a Foreign Legion, that was a time of war; but we did nothing towards committing Parliament to the raising of that Legion without first seeking the authority of Parliament for the purpose. Surely the necessity for the siege of Sebastopol, with our reduced Army pining and perishing away from day to day, was an urgent necessity, compared with that of arraying your military demonstration in such an order as you think will best back your diplomatic arguments. But with the general and I believe the universal approval of Parliament, we felt that the introduction of foreign troops into the service of the country was an act of so grave and novel a character that it would be a high offence against the Privileges of Parliament if we were to presume to move in that direction without having first obtained its sanction. I take no merit whatever for this proceeding. I believe we should have been grossly to blame had we acted otherwise. Well, if Her Majesty's Government have taken the course they have adopted, not for the purpose of preserving the safety of the country, not to meet the exigencies of a war, but for the purpose of giving effect to their own special conceptions—that diplomacy is best backed when the bayonets are gleaming outside the door; if they have done that, then they have placed us in a condition of virtual servitude as regards the administration of this great power and privilege of voting money by a proceeding which, it appears to me, is one in the highest degree unconstitutional. Now, Sir, I come a little nearer to the Attorney General, whom I am glad to see in his place, and I begin by apologizing to him for the cheer which he so good humouredly referred to. I have always listened with respect and satisfaction to his legal arguments, and am always greatly assisted by them in my humble endeavours to comprehend the question at issue; and, therefore, it was from no want of respect that I was betrayed, along with a learned Friend near me, into that momentary utterance; but it was, I must frankly own, for my surprise, when I considered the way in which we were being led and who it was that was leading us in it. Well, Sir, I have, I think, shown that the proceedings of the Government were unconstitutional; and I now come to the other point—namely, that they were strictly and properly illegal proceedings—and in two respects the first has relation to the Bill of Rights, but it is not the relation to the Bill of Rights which the Attorney General ingeniously conceived. I am sorry to find that the hon. and learned Gentleman objects so much to a Motion if he scents in it something that shows him it has been drawn by a lawyer. The Attorney General has been concerned in the highest degree to discover something astute in the manner of bringing this subject before the House; but the Attorney General entirely misconceives the relation of my noble Friend's Motion to the Bill of Rights and the Mutiny Act. He appeared to think that the Motion was founded upon nothing but the Bill of Rights and the Mutiny Act. He has not heard that statement from anyone on this side of the House. I quite agree that the Attorney General sees nothing in the matter except the Bill of Rights and the Mutiny Act. But the question is, whether he ought to see something in the matter besides the Bill of Rights and the Mutiny Act. Now, what are the doctrines that we have heard from the Attorney General to-night? He has said, if I understood him—and I will put my propositions briefly—that the Bill of Rights in that particular clause which says the raising or keeping of a standing Army within the United Kingdom in time of peace, unless it be with the consent of Parliament, is against the law; he has stated that the Bill of Rights made that law. The Attorney General has also stated that it made the law for England, and that before the Bill of Rights the law did not exist either for England or for Her Majesty's Possessions beyond the seas. Now, Sir, what I have been taught—and what I think will be contended to-night from this side of the House—is that, whatever be the authority of the Bill of Rights and the Mutiny Act, they have reference to something more venerable still—to the ancient Common Law of the land, which the Attorney General does not appear to have taken at all into his view. The Attorney General finds that there was a debate in 1775, and, I will not say astutely—for I know he objects to everything that is astute—but ingeniously, and very effectively, as they say, he gets rid of that debate in 1775 by saying that a great many men on both sides of the House said many fantastic and wild things. That is the way that the Conservative Attorney General of 1878 disposes of Lord Chancellor Bathurst, Lord Camden, and the great legal luminaries of 1775. He will not deny that among the "wild and fantastic things" that they said were these—First of all, that the Bill of Rights was in this matter a strictly declaratory Act, and that while this was said by Lord Shelburne, it was said by Lord Camden and Lord Shelburne, and admitted by Lord Chancellor Bathurst, that "the Kingdom" in the Bill of Rights was to be interpreted as including the Dependencies of the Crown. But what are the two main propositions of the Attorney General? He says that the Bill of Rights did not declare the law, but made it. He also said that it made the law for the United Kingdom, not for the Dependencies of the Crown. There is one authority which I am sure the Attorney General will admit, and not accuse of wild and fantastic things, in regard to the Bill of Rights, and that is the Bill of Rights itself. And what does the Bill of Rights say upon the first proposition of the Attorney General—that the Bill of Rights did not declare the law, but made it. The Bill of Rights says this—

"The said Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons, pursuant to their respective letters of election, being now assembled, and taking into their most serious consideration the best means for attaining the things aforesaid, do in the first place, as their ancestors in like case have usually done for the vindicating and asserting of their ancient rights and liberties, declare—"

They declare! And then they proceed to declare, among others, the propositions which I have already read to the House. But, says the Attorney General, it is not a declaratory Bill. He has given us a most interesting description of the powers of the Crown, as he thinks that they existed, but as the authors of the Bill of Rights did not think they existed, before the Revolution of 1688. I must say he has made us all thank God that we did not live under a state of things such as he described. He has been most liberal to us to-night. He admits boldly—in fact, he makes great concessions to us—he does not for a moment think of denying the power of the House of Commons to vote the money. He does not contend that the Crown can take money. I thought at one time we were going back to Ship-money; but I was mistaken. Whatever other dangers I think there may be, there is no danger of that sort; the generosity of the Attorney General would keep them from it. I want now to test the doctrine of the Attorney General about the Dependencies of the Crown. He says that the Crown had the universal power of raising Forces for the purposes of defence before the Bill of Rights, and that that power, universal before, was abridged by the Bill of Rights solely with reference to the Kingdom of England, now represented by the United Kingdom. The Crown had, however, the right of maintaining Standing Armies except in England after the Bill of Rights, and everywhere as well as in England before the Bill of Rights. According to the Attorney General, there is no doubt at all about it. By his contention, it was perfectly competent to the Crown to maintain Standing Armies in every one of our American Colonies. That was the contention of the Attorney General. Now, in the first place, that was not the practice of the Crown. In the second place, it was not the practice of the Crown until very late and very evil times—the evil times preceding the American Revolt and Civil War, and when in that American Revolt and Civil War the great statesmen—for such they were, though bred within the narrow limits of small Colonies—set forth their grievances. Among them they stated this grievance charged upon the King of England—"He has kept among us in times of peace Standing Armies without the consent of our Legislature." That was set forth by the American people. It was the expression of the general practice. The Attorney General finds nothing in that declaration, nothing in Lord Camden, Lord Shelburne, or Lord Chancellor Bathurst, to support the theory that the Crown is entitled to keep Standing Armies in the Colonies at its pleasure. I own that these are pretty considerable objections taken to the legal doctrine of the Attorney General in matters of the very highest Constitutional import. The Attorney General goes on to say there is a power given to Canada, under which in Canada an Army may be raised and paid without the consent of the British Parliament further than as that consent is given by the Dominion Government Act, and that a similar power has been given in respect of the Indian Army by the Indian Government Act of 1858. Does the Attorney General think that these are parallel cases? Does he think that the powers of the right hon. Gentlemen among whom he sits are the same with respect to this Canadian Army as they are with regard to the Indian Army? Without doubt, Parliament gave away a portion of its power to Canada. It gave away a portion of its power to be exercised in Canada under the same Constitutional restraints as apply to the administration of the Army under the Mutiny Act, and so to be exercised that the Ministers of the Crown in this country have no more power over the Army of Canada than they have over the Armies of France and Germany. The responsibility of the direction of that Army is in the hands of the responsible Ministers of Canada, exercising powers which have been granted to them by the British Legislature. Is that the case with the Indian Army? It is, as the hon. and learned Gentleman knows, in every important particular, except that both have a Parliamentary authority, the reverse, because the Indian Army, so far from being entirely removed from the control of the Ministers of the Crown, is really at their absolute disposal. The Attorney General has done that for us for which I feel grateful to him. He has revealed to us in his speech the true doctrine and true contention of the Government. I listened in vain to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and I listened in vain to the able speech of my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India (Mr. E. Stanhope)—whose appointment, for his abundant promise, I heard with great pleasure—in the endeavour to extract from them the doctrine on which the Government means to take its stand. My hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India said he did not like extremes this way or extremes that way, and that the Government was moderate in all they did; but he did not give us the smallest iota of a clue to the laws, or the principles, or the securities by which the liberties of Parliament are to be guaranteed. But the Attorney General has been very frank and very communicative. His doctrine, taken as a whole, is that it is the Prerogative of the Crown to make peace and war, to raise and maintain Armies, to discipline, command, and direct troops; that this Prerogative, which was universal in the glorious days of the Monarchy in the 17th century, though it was supposed to have received its death-blow in 1689, still continues in full force in the Dominions of the Crown everywhere outside the United Kingdom. And what has Parliament to do? Nothing at all, except to vote the money; and to vote the money when? Before it has been spent? Aha! if he had extended his generosity a little, and would only have given some inkling of an idea in his mind that we were to hear of the thing before it was done, and not after, it would have made all the difference. No, Sir; it is after it has been spent. How long? As long after as the Government thinks convenient. But according to what criterion? Not convenient according to the criterion of military necessity, but convenient according to the state of diplomatic negotiations and the state of political exigencies. So that the Government, according to the Attorney General, has the power to maintain what Forces it pleases, and use them as it pleases, and when it pleases, and where it pleases, and as long as it pleases, until it is under the necessity of finding money from this House; but as to the time of that necessity, it can exercise its own discretion, it is not bound to know anything of our previous consent at all, and there is no limit as to the time at which it is under an obligation to come and take us into its counsel. The Attorney General has not been complete in his examination of precedents; he has not condescended to look at the precedent of 1816, he has forgotten, or has not been informed, that in 1816 a large sum of money, forming a portion of the indemnity payable by France, came into the hands of the Government, and was proposed by the Government to be applied to the maintenance of the British Army in France. Now, I challenge the Attorney General again. According to his view and contention, the money having come lawfully into the hands of the Government, they were justified in applying it to maintain the British troops in France without the authority of Parliament. That is the doctrine of the Attorney General; do not let there be any mistake about it; these things are too important for there to be any mistake about them; this is the beginning and not the ending of a Constitutional conflict. The vote of the majority will have a vast importance, of which I shall have a word to say by-and-by; but, whatever its importance may be, it will dash itself, like the idle wave against the rock, when it comes into conflict with the fixed, hereditary liberties of the British nation. In the teeth of the doctrine of the Attorney General, a demand was made on the Government of 1816—in excellent Tory times, in better Tory times than the present—a demand was made on the Government of Lord Liverpool to put that money under the control of Parliament and to vote the expense of those troops, and the Government of Lord Liverpool, strong in a majority even greater than that now possessed by the present Government, acceded to this demand. So much for the doctrine of the Attorney General upon these three fundamental principles—first, that the Bill of Rights did not declare the law, but made it; second, that it made it only for this Kingdom, and that no such law as it made had then existed or now exists outside this Kingdom; and, third, that provided the Crown can obtain the means to support troops, it may maintain them anywhere, except in the United Kingdom, without asking Parliament for its consent. That I believe to be the state of the case as regards the Bill of Rights and the offence Her Majesty's Government, in my view, have committed against the law—not against the Bill of Rights merely, but against that Common Law of which the Bill of Rights is, perhaps, not the most complete, but, at the same time, a most solemn historical expression. The Secretary of State for the Colonies thought he settled the question by showing that when the Union with Ireland was effected, the words "the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland" were substituted for the simple phrase "the Kingdom." I am afraid the Secretary of State for the Colonies must have been in communication with the Attorney General, and must have had the simplicity of his mind in some degree corrupted; for, as we have heard from the Attorney General to-night, that which politicians above all things eschew, when they have anything serious or important to do, is taking the views of the lawyers about it. This was the doctrine laid down in the preamble of the speech of the Attorney General. If there had been no such thing as a Common Law; if the whole law had rested merely upon the question of this word "Kingdom" in the Statutes, in the first place we never should have had the Declaration of 1775; but, passing that by, and granting that the change to the words "United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland" in the Mutiny Act would have been an important fact, it is of no importance whatever to the present state of the argument, because the word "Kingdom" does not derive importance from any grammatical and necessary meaning as found in the Bill of Rights, but from the relation of that portion of the Bill of Rights to the common law of the country, which common law could not possibly be affected by the question whether the Preamble to the Mutiny Act speaks of the "Kingdom" or speaks of the "United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland." I now come to the second of those breaches of the law which, it appears to me, the Government have committed—whether from taking or not taking the advice of the Attorney General beforehand I do not know—that is, the breach of the Indian Government Act. Bold it may be to challenge the Attorney General in his law; and I feel myself more at home when I challenge him on his history, for I do not suppose that he is a better authority upon what has occurred in the House of Lords than are the records that are placed in our hands. The Attorney General says there was an equivocal clause introduced by me into this House, and opposed by all the Liberal authorities. Such is the disinterestedness of the Attorney General, that he seems to prefer very greatly those Liberal authorities to all the Conservative authorities who warmly supported the clause. He paraded those Liberal authorities; he marched them out one by one on the floor of the House—Lord Palmerston, Lord Russell, Lord Granville, Mr. Wilson, and I know not who; and he appeared to pass by with contempt Lord Beaconsfield, Lord Derby, and all the Members of the Government, who succeeded in carrying that clause by a large majority in a House in which they themselves were in a minority. The clause went to the House of Lords, and there, according to the Attorney General, either from the superior illumination of that Chamber, or the lapse of time and its beneficial influence in opening the human mind to truth, or from reflection upon the utterances of Lord Palmerston and some of his Friends, a marvellous change was produced, and Lord Derby was compelled to give way to the objection and to produce a clause of a totally different character. I quite agree it is of a totally different character from what the Opposition desired; but apparently the hon. and learned Gentleman has been misinformed as to what occurred. It is true Lord Derby said that, to obviate objections which had been taken to an apparent interference with the Prerogative of the Crown, he would amend the clause; but he never said he would produce another clause. He did not obviate the objections by the Amendments he made, and the opposition was continued in the Lords to the amended clause based upon the principle on which it had been denounced in this House. And why? Because the Lords knew perfectly well that the amended clause was a reality.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER): I beg pardon of the right hon. Gentleman for one moment. I find in the records of Parliament—"The Earl of Derby moved to insert a new clause in the following words—Clause 55."

MR. GLADSTONE: I apologize; I thought it had been done by way of Amendment; but I do not at all care whether it is new in itself, or only new in form. I think the Attorney General will admit that I am right in point of substance. A restriction was introduced upon the action of the Crown; it was introduced with regard to operations beyond the frontier. It was introduced "except in cases of grave and urgent necessity;" and instead of saying that the operations beyond the frontiers should not take place "without the assent of Parliament," it said that the Revenues of India should not be charged with these operations. That is the amount of the change. And now what does this clause mean? We have had the Forces of India brought beyond the frontier; it has not been set up by the Attorney General as a defence that this is a sudden and urgent necessity. To maintain that it is a sudden necessity would be doing a violence to language which he would never dream of. A sudden necessity is that which has given no notice of itself beforehand. But this necessity, whatever it be—I do not know that it is a necessity at all—is a necessity which is in the sequence of a regular order of proceedings, one following upon another, and each one of which has been, in your mind and intentions, an introduction to the one that came after it. But, Sir, I think I have some title to speak of this clause, because the terms of it were terms on which I had the privilege of communicating fully with the present Lord Derby, who was Secretary of State for the period; and I must say that my views were entirely in consonance with those which he entertained, and I, for one, fully assented to that Amendment. Why? Because I saw it was a Constitutional improvement; that it maintained some control, and maintained that control in a Constitutional form, instead of in a form clearly unconstitutional. The consent of Parliament is now required to the military operations. What is meant by “the consent of Parliament?” Is it the previous consent of Parliament? The word “consent,” I contend, as used, whether in an Act of Parliament or in the proceedings of this House—in the Parliamentary law of the country means, as in common sense it must mean, the previous consent of Parliament. The Attorney General does not mean that—he means the consent to-morrow, next day, a month hence, or any other time when you want the money. The Attorney General does not see the force of his own argument. If his argument were sound—that there is no limit of time applicable to the consent of Parliament—he would not have dwelt on the Amendment of the clause at all, for the old clause said it should not take place “without the approval of Parliament to the purposes thereof.” But if you can have the consent of Parliament long after the fact, why might you not also have approval “to the purposes thereof” long after the fact? The Attorney General, I admit, has reduced that clause to an utter farce—has rendered it a nonentity except for protection to the Revenues of India. The Attorney General should recollect what took place before that clause was enacted. He should recollect the Afghan War of 1840 and the calamities that followed it—the whole of that policy being carried through without the slightest intervention of Parliament at the expense of India. The same thing might happen again. The history of that time might be repeated if the construction of the Attorney General is correct. He would have consulted Parliament at his own convenience, but his application to Parliament might have been postponed till the great catastrophe that happened in Afghanistan. Sir, I maintain that the construction which the Attorney General has put upon the Bill of Rights and the law connected with it is an untrue construction, and that his construction of the India Government Act is a great deal worse than that—it is a preposterous construction. [“Oh!”] I should be the last man to use a disrespectful expression—I mean a construction which reduces the authors of the clause, and those concerned in passing it, to a preposterous position so far as regards restraints upon the Prerogatives of the Crown in regard to the Indian Forces, which constituted the reason of its introduction. Well, Sir, I will not dwell upon the element of concealment in this case, except to say that it would have been some consolation, in connection with the extraordinary proceeding that has been taken, if one had been able to perceive some kind of benefit that could accrue from such concealment. My noble Friend near me (the Marquess of Hartington) has pointed out that your purpose in all these proceedings—I address myself to the Representatives of the Government here—appears to have been two-fold; it has been to make a series of military demonstrations, and to obtain the consent of Parliament to those demonstrations, in order to strengthen your hands. Having those objects in view, you ought to have pursued a directly opposite course to that which you followed; and the moment you had obtained the knowledge that the thing could be done—which was knowledge easily obtained—you ought to have come down to Parliament and made your demonstration effective in the eyes of Europe. Instead of that, however, matters have been carried on in secret; and by keeping the movement of these troops back from our knowledge, and by violating, as it appears to me, the Constitutional practice and the law of the land, you have contrived to make this into a most formidable subject of controversy, and the knowledge of that controversy cannot be confined within these walls, but must go throughout the length and breadth of Europe. I must say a word for the action under that clause which took place in the year 1859, because I do not think that the history, or the clear history, of that transaction has as yet been given. I am, beyond all things, anxious to call the attention of the House to the nature of the contention, as put by the Government, in this case. What we say is comparatively of little importance. We have no hope, charm we never so wisely, of charming your back benches into assenting to our proposition. I saw a few minutes ago, in his place, a Gentleman, an old Member of this House, to whom I should have wished to make an appeal—I mean the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole). There is another Gentleman, an old Member of this House, who has testified his opinion by his constant attendance, and by declaration already made. I want to know what are to be the votes of these Gentlemen? I hope my hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Newdegate) will not think it disrespectful that I should appeal to him; but I believe it is of the utmost importance to know the part that may be taken by old Constitutional Members of this House; and Gentlemen like my hon. Friend and the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge have great responsibility resting on them on this occasion. It is a matter of great concern if those who have sat long in this House, who have sat with great Constitutional authorities, and who have seen matters treated very differently from this, if they should give their sanction to innovations of what I must describe a dangerous character. We have heard what the doctrine of the Government is—there is no limit at all affecting the employment of East Indian Forces by the Crown, except that they are not to be brought into the United Kingdom. I am glad that even that limitation is left; for when I heard the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney, last night, and the cheers that it drew from the Treasury Bench, I had great doubts whether he was going to leave us the limitation of the United Kingdom. I do not expect to be annoyed by the billeting of soldiers without the authority of Parliament; but it is no good answer on the part of the Government to assume that there is no likelihood of anything of that kind, and, therefore, we need not be disturbed. When these things occurred the country was within one step of a revolution, and a revolution came to put an end to them. What we want is not to go within one step of a revolution—not to go one step nearer a revolution than we now stand. But let us look at this contention—the Prerogative of the Crown cannot be limited except by some express enactment, and by the necessity of asking a Vote from Parliament when the Government find they cannot get on without it. The various East Indian regiments are all Her Majesty's Forces. The 55th clause has no reference whatever, except that they must ask us to Vote the money when the money has already been spent. So, Sir, it has come to this—that, in the time of a Conservative Government, when, from year to year, and from generation to generation, you have been fixing, as you thought, the full Force of the Empire—for I will not look after any 12 men or 50 men that may be employed for service possibly in some Crown Colony—when we think we have been fixing the Military Service of the Empire, and when we think we have confined them in safe bounds, we find a vast Indian Force, and are told by the Government that Her Majesty's control over this Force is an absolute power to direct them wherever She pleases, provided they do not come into the United Kingdom. The Crown obtains from Parliament the right to raise 135,000 troops—strictly limited as to the use of the men, firstly, by the Vote of the number; secondly, by the Vote of the money; and, thirdly, by the expiration of the Mutiny Act. But within two or three hours, by telegram, there are in another part of the world 200,000 or 300,000 troops, a number which, if need be, may be doubled, under no control from the Vote of number, the Vote of Money, or the control of the Mutiny Act—that vast Force, having none of those restraints, unlimited as to number, and backed by a Treasury filled by more than £50,000,000 in the year—the whole of that vast Force is at the will and pleasure of Gentlemen sitting opposite, to be used for any purpose they please, without their saying why or wherefore, so long as they do not enter into the United Kingdom. Is that to be the state of things under which we are to live? I cannot listen for a moment to the plea that there is no practical danger. That was the plea that was made in the time of “Ship-money.” It was said boldly and truly that Charles wanted the money for equipping a Fleet—it was really required; but such were his unhappy relations with Parliament he could not get it from them, and, consequently, he must get it where he could. Shall we consent to part with the securities obtained for us by our fathers? It is not merely whether we shall rush into the midst of danger, but whether we shall go within an inch of it. Do we think that liberty is a thing so safe, so popular at all times, that the sentinels of the Constitution may occasionally go to sleep? Is that the view entertained by the House of Commons? It may be that this Division will prove that such is the view of the majority; it may be that you will show that you are ready to assert that we have less liberty now than in 1865 and 1775; less than in 1865 because this had happened in 1859—the Naval Forces of France and England jointly sailed to the mouth of Peiho, carrying the Plenipotentiaries of the two countries, in order that in conformity with the Treaty of Tien Tsin they might convey the Treaty to Peking to be ratified there. That Expedition was encountered by an assault from an ambuscade. It fought bravely, but suffered severely, and dishonour was inflicted on the flags of England and France. It was in the month of June, and Parliament was sitting; but there was no telegraph to China then, and the news did not reach the country till a few weeks after Parliament had been prorogued. The Government considered—and no one could question it—that a case of that kind, in which a Force approaching with no hostile intentions had been actually assaulted, repulsed, and for the moment defeated, was one of sudden necessity in which it was our duty to send orders to the nearest Forces for the men wanted. No one questioned that proceeding; and I do not believe that any one failed to see that that was one of the cases excepted from the Indian Government Act as a case of sudden and urgent necessity. But when the war had been brought to a conclusion, it was still found necessary to leave in China some portion of the Forces, and that portion remained in China for some time, with the consent of Parliament, which was given on the ground that it was really a sequel—the continuous sequel—of a case, of sudden and urgent necessity, and therefore covered by the conditions of that case. But, after some time, General Peel pointed out the state of the case and the Government of Lord Palmerston assented to his view; and although the state of things had grown out of a case of sudden and urgent necessity, yet they agreed that the Indian Force remaining in China for the purpose of completing the transactions there should be treated as a Force subject to Parliament, and that both the men and the money should be voted. Here is the Vote taken in the year 1866. This House actually voted—

“That a number not exceeding 178 of Native Indian Troops, belonging to Her Majesty’s Native Indian Army, be maintained beyond the limits of Her Majesty’s Indian Possessions.”

What I affirm is that this Vote expresses a compact between the Executive Government and the Parliament. It expressed the result of much discussion in this House, and that was that these Troops, though but the tail, so to speak, of an Expedition of necessity, should be voted by this House, though their number was only 178. Yet now we have the Attorney General telling us, not as to 178, but as to 178,000, the whole Force that the whole of India can yield—East, West, North, and South—can be taken by the Government, provided only that they get the money to pay for them without coming to Parliament. It is still more sad to think that we have lost something of our liberties even since 1775. In that year it was admitted that the word “Kingdom” in the Bill of Rights, in order to bring it into conformity to common law, must be understood to mean the whole of the Dependencies of the Crown; and now, in 1878, what was then unanimously asserted is formally denied. The Attorney General sets up another case and says—What was the object or the use of foreign troops? The Bill of Rights does not speak of foreign troops, but of keeping up a standing Army; and therefore the Attorney General is entirely wrong in alleging that, as a matter of fact, the question turns on the employment of foreign troops. But the case of Indian troops requires more contention than if they were foreign troops. If they were foreign troops, who is to pay them?—and they would be only a handful of men; but in India you have 200,000 men, and might make them 400,000, and there is a Treasury of £50,000,000 to support them till it is exhausted. I find no difficulty in seeing my way to the right conclusion in these circumstances. I think it is our duty, from generation to generation, not to abandon, not to impair, not to suffer to be impaired, so far as it depends on us, the ancient and ancestral liberties of this country; but to guard with the utmost jealousy every security that has been thought wise by the great sages of the Constitution for the purpose of guaranteeing our liberties. I was out of town at the time when my noble Friend resolved on giving Notice of this Motion; but I heartily and cordially thank him for giving that Notice, and for his announcement to take the sense of the House upon it. I think if these things are to be done, they ought to be done in open day. The Vote of the majority in favour of this proceeding will be an historical fact of cardinal importance. It is our duty to run the risk of that Vote. It will be a great evil—it will be a national calamity; but there is one evil greater and one calamity deeper still, and that is that the day should come when, at any rate, the minority of the House of Commons should shrink from its duty, and should fail to use every effort in its power to bring to the knowledge of the people the mode in which, and the circumstances under which, its liberties are being dealt with by its Representatives.

MR. BALFOUR said, that he felt unwilling to follow the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, but he thought it worth while to point out that the right hon. Gentleman had not been wholly accurate in his treatment of the historical precedents he had given. The two main points of his speech had been the accusation against the Government of having incurred expenses without the consent of Parliament, and the charge that they had broken through the Constitutional bulwarks set up by the Bill of Rights. He would not follow the right hon. Gentleman into the reasons for the first accusation, because it was not covered by the Resolution before the House; but the second came under the terms of the Resolution, and was a Constitutional point with which the right hon. Gentleman had not dealt properly. What was the bearing of the precedent of 1775? Lord North's Government had undoubtedly infringed the Constitution, though Parliament did not think it worth while to cover them by a Bill of Indemnity. But, in his opinion, the Constitutional principle they violated was not that declared by the Bill of Rights, but that laid down in the Act of Settlement. They were wrong, not because they introduced troops into Gibraltar without leave of Parliament, but because they put foreigners into places of trust. He was aware that in the debates of that period a different opinion had been expressed. But of the speakers who supported that opinion he need only notice two—Lord Bathurst and Lord Camden; but there was some reason, he thought, to doubt the value of their opinions. Lord Camden was at the time violently hostile to the Colonial measures of Lord North, and the violence of his politics tended somewhat to impair the accuracy of his law; while, as to Lord Bathurst, even his admirers would not maintain that his legal knowledge was very profound. The Debate of 1794 dealt with a different subject—the introduction of foreigners into the United Kingdom—and the Attorney General, he believed it was, of the day, distinctly stated that, in his opinion, Gibraltar was outside the Kingdom according to the meaning of the Bill of Rights. If, therefore, Parliamentary precedent was to be consulted for the exact meaning given to the word "Kingdom," as used in the Bill of Rights and the Mutiny Bill, it would be found that the opinions of Lord Camden and Lord Bathurst were on one side; while, on the other side there was the fact that a large Military Establishment was maintained in Ireland, the opinion of the Attorney General to whom he had just referred, and the statutory interpretation which was put upon the Bill of Rights by the alteration which was made in the Mutiny Act in 1801. Indeed, it appeared to him that even the interpretation which was placed upon the Bill of Rights by Lord Camden by no means supported the allegation which his right hon. Friend opposite tried to found upon it. Lord Camden said that the word "Kingdom" meant all the Dominions of the Crown; and, if it did, India, no doubt, formed part of those Dominions. In that case, then, the Government could not have infringed the Bill of Rights, for the mere ordering of the transfer of troops from one part of the Kingdom to another was by no one maintained to be illegal. If, on the other hand, Lord Camden's interpretation was not accurate, Malta could not be said to be a portion of the Kingdom, and no troops had been introduced into the Kingdom in contravention of the provisions of the Mutiny Act. Whichever horn of the dilemma hon. Gentlemen opposite wished to choose, the Government, therefore, it seemed to him, stood absolved. The opinion which he took of the legitimate powers of the Executive seemed to him supported by the course that was taken by Parliament on the occasion of the India Bill of 1858. As to the clause which had been proposed by his right hon. Friend in that Bill in 1858, his recollection of what then occurred was that that clause was somewhat hastily accepted by the Government of Lord Derby. It was strongly objected to by Lord Palmerston and others, on the ground that it would unduly limit the Prerogative of the Crown; but it was passed in the House of Commons by a large majority. In the House of Lords, on the second reading of the Bill, Lord Derby took the same objection to it, and expressed it to be his opinion that in that respect it ought to be amended. When the Bill got into Committee, Lord Derby accordingly brought forward a new clause; but even to that Lord Granville objected, on the ground that it would unduly limit the power of the Executive, and he divided the House of Lords upon it. When the Bill afterwards came back to the House of Commons, although several alterations which had been made in it were not agreed to, the clause which had been substituted by Lord Derby for that of his right hon. Friend was adopted, and that clause did not limit, and certainly was not intended to limit, the power of the Crown to transfer troops from one part of its Dominions to another. The only intention which the framers of the clause, he believed, had in view, was to protect the Revenues of India, and that object had been satisfactorily attained. According, then, to the accurate interpretation of the Bill of Rights, as well as under the Act of 1858, the Government had, he thought, been acting entirely within the limits of the authority with which they were invested. There still remained the broad question of the danger to the Constitution which might arise from allowing Indian troops to be brought to Malta, as in the present instance. What mystic virtue was there in the Isthmus of Suez, that it should be so wrong and unconstitutional to bring Indian troops through it? If it were not dangerous to bring Indian troops to Aden, it was not dangerous to bring them to Malta; and if our liberties were threatened by the existence of non-Parliamentary troops in the Mediterranean they could not be safe so long as there were non-Parliamentary troops in India. Seeing, therefore, that this Debate would serve as an important precedent in future years, he trusted that no mistaken view of the law would induce that House to unduly limit the power of the Executive of this country.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he was not about to enter into the military aspect of the question, notwithstanding some taunts which had been directed against him by the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for India on the previous evening. He felt that the question of the employment of the Native troops of India throughout Her Majesty's Dominions was one of such extreme importance, generally, that he should have liked to have discussed it apart from a great Constitutional question, which was in some respects of another character. He desired to confine himself on the present occasion to one special corner and view of this Constitutional question. The Government maintained that it was not unconstitutional for Her Majesty, in the exercise of Her Prerogative, to bring Indian troops into Europe, or into the countries adjacent to Europe, in excess of the number voted by Parliament; but they argued that that power could not be exercised except by means of Supplies voted by Parliament. The answer to this was, that the limitation of the Prerogative by the necessity of Supplies had been avoided by the use of money, temporarily or, otherwise, out of the Indian Exchequer. He was afraid Her Majesty's Government habitually obtained money from the Indian Exchequer when emergencies arose in our Possessions abroad, and he wished to know whether it was a fact that the Government exercised an uncontrolled power of procuring money from this source? He maintained, that if the Government thought they could by the mere exercise of the Prerogative order the expenses of these troops to be defrayed from the Indian Exchequer, they had been guilty of an unconstitutional and illegal act. It was quite true that the House had divested itself of the control over the Indian finances, for the Resolution usually passed late in August could not be called control; but the Indian finances had not therefore been left to the personal control of Her Majesty's Ministers, a Constitutional authority had been established, which stood in the same relation to Indian Revenue and Expenditure that that House did to English finances. The Act for the Government of India, constituted by Section 7, a Council of 15 members, and by Section 23, it was provided—

"At a meeting of the Council at which the Secretary of State is present, if there be a difference of opinion on any question, other than any question with regard to which a majority of Votes at any meeting is hereinafter declared to be necessary, the determination of the Secretary of State shall be final."

Now, what were the cases where a majority of the Votes of the Council was necessary? Section 41 answered this question; for it declared that—

"The expenditure of the Revenues of India, both in India and elsewhere, shall be subject to the control of the Secretary of State in Council, and no grant or appropriation of any part of such Revenue or any other property coming into the possession of the Secretary of State in Council by authority of this Act, shall be made without the concurrence of a majority by the Votes at a meeting of the Council."

Now, he wished to know whether the expense which had been incurred in the present case, and defrayed out of the Indian Exchequer, had been voted by the Indian Council? It might be that the Secretary of State had asked for and obtained the consent of the Council to this appropriation of Indian funds; but if so, let the fact be made known to the House. He feared that since the establishment of the telegraph, India had come to be very much governed outside the Constitutional method—that it had come to be governed by telegrams passing between the Secretary of State, or a still greater person, the Prime Minister, and the Governor General of India. Successive Secretaries of State seemed to have come to believe that the clause to which he had referred had not any practical effect, and had got into the habit of overriding it. The Government might think that they were not bound to apply to the Council, and that the clause was not applicable to an expenditure such as that now under consideration; but if they held that opinion, let them say boldly that they were entitled to exercise a despotic power. He wished to ask Her Majesty's Government three Questions—first, whether, in order to make the expenditure for the transport of the Indian troops legal, it was not absolutely necessary that it should have the sanction of a majority of the Indian Council? secondly, whether the Government maintained that they were entitled to exercise a despotic control? and, thirdly, whether for the future they would consider themselves bound by the Act?

MR. FORSYTH said, that he wished to explain the vote he intended to give. The noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition had by his Resolution asked them to affirm a grave and important Constitutional principle—he did not agree with his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General that it was a quibble of the Constitution—and the question ought to be discussed without heat or passion, and, if possible, without Party feeling. He feared, however, that in the present condition of affairs, it would be impossible to discuss a question of this nature without something of Party feeling; but no Party consideration ought to induce them to deny or impair a sound Constitutional maxim. They ought to be as jealous as their forefathers were with regard to the Constitutional control by Parliament over the military Forces of the Crown, and transmit to their posterity the same heritage of freedom which they themselves had received. If the only question had been the Resolution of the noble Lord, without amendment, he could not have voted against it, because he believed that it affirmed a sound Constitutional principle. He understood the Resolution to refer to the Regular Forces in the pay of the Crown, maintained out of the taxation of the country, not to the local Forces raised and kept in the Colonies, and paid for by the local Legislatures. It was clear that Her Majesty had no power to enlist foreigners except with the sanction of an Act of Parliament. The first Act in the last century authorizing this was passed in the reign of George III.; and during the Crimean War the Act 18 Vict. c. 2 was passed, "enabling" the Crown to employ foreigners, who were not to serve in the United Kingdom. To raise and keep troops in the Dominions of the Crown and in its pay, beyond the number authorized in the Mutiny Act, without the consent of Parliament, would be, in his opinion, a fraud upon that Act; for by garrisoning their Colonies and Dependencies by such troops, "in defence of the Possessions of the Crown," the necessity for so large a number as Parliament had voted would no longer exist, and the superfluous number might be brought into this country, and form part of the Standing Army here, contrary to the spirit of the Mutiny Act and the Bill of Rights. Of course, in time of great emergency this might be done, and, if necessary, a Bill of Indemnity would be passed. But the Resolution of the noble Lord had been met by an Amendment, which contained an equally sound Constitutional principle with that contained in the Resolution. He was prepared to accept both propositions—the Resolution and the Amendment—because they did not conflict with one another; both were true and sound expositions of Constitutional Law. He thought, however, that the Government had been perfectly justified in moving the Amendment—for they must, to a certain extent, interpret the meaning of a Resolution by the way in which it was supported; and no doubt, the intent in moving the Resolution had been to attack the policy of moving the Indian troops. In three similar cases—in 1775, 1794, and 1816—the same course had been adopted, and the Previous Question had been carried by the Governments of the day. To show how jealous Parliament was of its control over the numbers as well as the pay of the Forces of the Crown, he would quote a few historical cases. The hon. and learned Member then cited several precedents in proof of his position, beginning with the year 1734, when a Message was brought down from King George I., hoping that he might be allowed to augment His Army, but that was opposed on the ground of danger to the country. The Addresses, however, were carried. That and subsequent precedents showed the jealousy of Parliament in keeping full control over the Army. Then, as to the moving of the troops from India. The Government might complain that no distinct Resolution had been brought forward condemning it. If it had been, they might have justified what they had done on the ground of emergency. He denied that what had been done was unconstitutional; still he regretted that Parliament was not told of it much earlier. As far as he was concerned, he saw no principle on which the Crown should be prevented moving troops from Calcutta to Malta, apart from any question of finance, any more than that they should be disabled from taking a precisely opposite course. Then, as to the question of finance, the Act of 1858 did not limit the power of the Crown to move Native Indian troops from India, but it provided that the expense incurred by such an employment of those troops as the present, should be borne, not by the Indian, but by the Imperial Exchequer. The present was not the time to discuss the policy or expediency of the course adopted by Her Majesty's Government; but there was one point to which no allusion had been made, to which he desired to refer. Under existing Acts, the Governor General of India had power to appoint courts martial for the trial of Native soldiers serving in India, or between the Straits of Magellan and the Cape of Good Hope. He thought, however, that when these troops reached Malta, it would be found that there was no Mutiny Act which would apply to them, and that the Government would have to ask Parliament for the necessary powers. He did not dissent from the Resolution in terms—and he also agreed with the Amendment. That being so, as the Government told them that passing the Resolution would weaken their hands in the present state of foreign affairs, when the prospect of the meeting of a Congress had never before been so favourable, and seeing that he had no wish to do that, he should vote for the Amendment.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken (Mr. Forsyth) had said, that he could see no distinction between the Motion and the Amendment before the House. But, if there were no distinction, why had the Amendment been moved? He felt strongly, that the time had come when the great Constitutional doctrine, stated in the Motion before the House, ought to be affirmed. He was, therefore, prepared to vote for the Resolution of the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Burghs. It was time that the House should assert its Constitutional control over the Armaments employed by the Crown. He would have the House consider, how largely, within the last few years, the Armaments of this country had been increased. The Standing Army was at present, roughly speaking, double what it was in the year 1855. The Reserves were of themselves almost equal to the numbers of the Standing Army in some former years. The character of the Militia had been changed into that of a Reserve, by its command having been transferred from the local Lords Lieutenant to Officers immediately dependent on the Ministry of the day. It might have been necessary thus to augment the Force at the immediate disposal of the Crown; but, surely, when all this had been lately done, it was not a period for Parliament to relax its Constitutional control over the increased Forces placed at the disposal of Her Majesty's Ministers. And was it not just cause for jealousy on the part of the House, when it found that a Government, that called itself Conservative, and had been considered eminently Constitutional, was, in the case of these Indian troops, violating the provisions of the India Act of 1858—an Act, which some of those same Ministers, when formerly in office, induced Parliament to pass into law? It happened that he (Mr. Newdegate) had rather peculiar and personal knowledge of the circumstances connected with the passing of the India Act. It was not very long before the passing of that Act, that the late Lord Derby had the kindness to invite him to become Secretary to the Board of Control in his Government—an office which he felt obliged to decline; but he served on the India Committee, and, at that time, took a very deep interest in the future constitution of the Government of India—a fact of which the late Lord Derby was perfectly aware. The India Act was passed in 1858, and he need only advert to what occurred in this House, with respect to a clause, that would restrict the power of the Crown in the disposal of the Native Forces of India, and that was carried through this House on the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone). The present Lord Beaconsfield, the present Lord Derby—aye, and all the Conservatives in the House—voted for the clause; and that clause imposed a positive restriction upon the removal of Indian Troops from India without the consent of Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had informed the House that another clause was substituted by the House of Lords for the clause which this House had adopted upon the right hon. Gentleman's Motion; that was the 55th clause of the Act for the Government of India; and, with the permission of the House, he would call its attention to the speech of the late Lord Derby, when he moved this substituted clause, the alleged violation of which by Her Majesty's Government touched the real legal question before the House; for, having been in communication with Lord Derby on the subject of India, he knew that the clause spoke that noble Lord's intentions. The clause ran in these words—

“Except for preventing or repelling actual invasion of Her Majesty's Indian Possessions, or under other sudden and urgent necessity, the Revenues of India shall not, without the consent of Parliament, be applicable to defray the expenses of any Military operation, carried on beyond the external frontiers of such Possession, by Her Majesty's Forces charged upon such Revenues.”

The Earl of Derby, in proposing the clause, said—this was from Hansard—

“The object of the clause was to impose a certain restriction upon the Prerogative of the Crown—”

These were the first words Lord Derby uttered—

"through the intervention of Parliament. It was erroneously thought that it would prevent the Crown from employing Indian Forces upon any foreign Expedition. The clause had no such object or effect; or, after it passed, the Crown would be at full liberty to employ those Forces in any quarter of the globe for which, by the terms of their enlistment, they were eligible."

He (Mr. Newdegate) did not dispute what an hon. Member had said, who held that the Indian Mutiny Act sufficed for the employment of those troops in any quarter of the globe. Lord Derby went on to say—

"It being the undoubted Prerogative of the Crown to make war and peace, the Constitutional check upon the exercise of that Prerogative was the sanction of Parliament by the granting of the pecuniary resources."

What, then, became of the mere financial argument? Lord Derby proposed this clause in order that the House of Commons might have the opportunity, by its financial operations, of sanctioning or refusing to sanction the employment of those troops. What, he asked, became of the idea, that this clause was intended to be hung up for an indefinite period, during which those troops might be employed without the concurrence and immediate consent of Parliament? Lord Derby observed—

"The Crown could not send out Forces unless Parliament provided the funds to pay them; but it was necessary to introduce this clause for protection of the Revenues of India. The effect of the clause would be, that Indian troops, except for the purpose of preventing anticipated invasion, or of repelling actual invasion, should not quit their own territory."

He (Mr. Newdegate) did not understand that Her Majesty's Government anticipated an immediate invasion of India, nor did it seem to him that any sudden or urgent necessity existed. Their present action did not, therefore, come within the exception to which Lord Derby referred in moving this clause. Lord Derby continued—

"Or, if they did, the expense should be defrayed out of the Revenues of this country, and not out of the Revenues of India. If the troops were employed out of India, it would be for Parliament to decide whether they were employed upon Indian or Imperial objects."

Now, it had always been held that the Indian Forces might be employed for Indian objects, without the Government coming to this House; that he did not gainsay. Yet it had been said by the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for India—"Why, the troops could not be employed in the Island of Ceylon;" but it was clear that Lord Derby, when he moved this clause, intended that, for Indian purposes, the consent of Parliament should not be required for the employment of those troops. Lord Derby went on to say—

"The clause did not prevent the Crown from making use of the Indian troops, subject only to this—that, as a general rule, the expense of those troops must be defrayed by Parliament; and the same constitutional check, therefore, was imposed on the Crown with regard to troops serving in India, which was imposed with respect to troops serving in every other part of the globe."

That was the intention of the clause. [Mr. ASSHETON CROSS: Hear, hear!] The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary said, "Hear, hear!" but he (Mr. Newdegate) could show him that the construction which the right hon. Gentleman put upon this clause was not in accordance with the understanding of its Mover.

"If"—proceeded Lord Derby—"the clause were not agreed to, it would be perfectly competent for any unconstitutional Sovereign to employ the whole of the Revenues and troops of India for any purpose which the Crown might direct, without the necessity of going to Parliament for the advance of a single shilling."—[3 Hansard, cli. 1697-98.]

Now, what Her Majesty's Government had done was this. They had moved those troops from India for employment at Malta during a period of peace, and whilst Parliament was sitting, without applying to Parliament for its consent. When Her Majesty proposed to call out the Reserves, the Government advised Her Majesty to send a Message to both Houses of Parliament, and applied for the consent of Parliament before they ventured to embody the Reserve—indeed, before they summoned a single man of the Reserves; and he (Mr. Newdegate) contended, that according to the intention of Parliament, both according to the clause passed by this House in the first instance, and afterwards by the clause in the Indian Act, which Lord Derby carried in the House of Lords, the consent of Parliament, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had argued, meant the previous consent of Parliament, in the case of the Indian troops, when employed out of Asia, exactly as in the case of the Reserves; and it was in this respect that he ventured to state, that from his understanding of the intentions of the late Lord Derby, who carried this clause, and from the manner in which that noble Lord resisted the subsequent attempts which were made to alter or to interrupt the progress of the clause, that it was clearly the intention of the late Lord Derby, and the intention of the House of Lords when they passed the clause, and the intention of the House of Commons who accepted it, that the consent of Parliament should be obtained before any of the Indian troops were moved out of the Indian territories. His conviction did not rest only upon what he had stated. In 1857, the year before the Indian Act was passed, there was a most remarkable debate in this House. On the 16th of July, 1857, the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) moved a Resolution in this House, condemning the Government of Lord Palmerston for the employment of Indian troops in Persia. That Resolution was proposed at a most peculiar period. It was in the very height of the Indian Mutiny; therefore, the House of Commons felt that that was not a time when it would have been right to cast any reflection, however well deserved, upon the Government with respect to anything connected with the use or employment of the Indian Forces. He would mention a few facts and dates, which would show why Parliament did not think it right at that moment to interfere. It was not until the month of September that Lucknow was relieved; it was not even then in the full possession of the Crown; Delhi had not been taken. The Indian Mutiny was not declared to be suppressed until December the 20th. Therefore, as that Mutiny was at its height in July, Parliament very properly withheld any expression of opinion that might have appeared to reflect upon the conduct of Her Majesty's Government. Now, that was a crisis—that was an emergency. They talked of an emergency now; what was the emergency now, compared with the emergency in the month of July, 1857? Yet the House of Commons would not, he believed, have refrained from expressing an opinion against Lord Palmerston's employment of Indian troops without its consent, unless Lord Palmerston had apologized to the House. On the 16th of July, 1857, Lord Palmerston said—

"I contend, on the contrary, that our Constitution wisely and properly vests in the Crown the Prerogative and the discretion of declaring war and of making peace, with the reserve, however, which I readily admit, that when the Advisers of the Sovereign have deemed it their duty to counsel the Crown either to engage in or put an end to war, it is incumbent on them to lay before Parliament, if it is sitting, the grounds upon which the one course or the other has been adopted; or, if Parliament is not sitting, when the interests of the country are deemed to be such as to require recourse to be had to war, I frankly and freely admit it to be their duty to take the earliest opportunity of calling Parliament together in order to submit to it their reasons for resorting to hostilities. I should be the last man to deny that general proposition. I maintain, however, that in the case to which the Motion alludes, there were circumstances which rendered it a special case, and excepted it for the moment from the application of that general rule."

What, further, did Lord Palmerston say? Having admitted that he had no right to remove those troops out of India and employ them in war, without the knowledge of Parliament, as a general rule, he went on to say, in answer to the question, why he had not specially convened Parliament?—

"The earliest moment at which it would have been right to call Parliament together, with the view of stating to them the course of proceeding with regard to Persia, was the 16th of December, when it is acknowledged that the Declaration of War was actually issued. Parliament then stood summoned for the 3rd of February. The Christmas Holidays were approaching, and the earliest period at which it could have assembled would have been the first or second week in January. Therefore, the only laches, if laches it was, would refer to the short interval between the middle of January and the 3rd of February, on which day Parliament met. If the war had been one with a European Power, involving great and serious consequences, and likely to require the immediate co-operation of this House, I admit that even that brief delay ought to have been avoided. But, considering the remoteness of the scene of action; considering that no immediate requisition was necessary to be made to Parliament for the purposes of the war, we thought it would be attaching more importance to the matter than it intrinsically deserved to anticipate the period for which Parliament stood convoked, and to issue a Proclamation calling it together a fortnight sooner for the purpose of announcing to it that operations were going on in Persia. But we did in the Speech from the Throne at the opening of the Session communicate to the Legislature the facts of these disputes with the Shah, as well as the naval and military operations, which had taken place."—
[3 Hansard, cxlvi. 1638-39-40.]

Therefore, Lord Palmerston admitted that he had no right, even when he felt himself bound to advise a Declaration of War, to move those Indian troops out of

India without the consent of Parliament, and even though he might have had to call Parliament together for the purpose. In the next year, in order to remove all doubt on the subject, Parliament passed the clause which he (Mr. Newdegate) had read to the House, with the exposition which was given of that clause by its Mover, the late Lord Derby; and he would ask Her Majesty's Government, why it was that now, in a period of peace, they, the Leaders of the Conservative Party in Parliament, had disregarded and set aside the provisions of an Act which was passed by their former Leader, and which he, who had served under Lord Derby, now told them was passed with the object of preventing the very action which the Government had taken in this instance? He would give the House another proof of this. In the year 1867 the Abyssinian War was likely to occur; and what did the Mover of this clause in the India Act—Lord Derby—do? He convened Parliament in November; and his (Mr. Newdegate's) late Friend (Lord Hylton), who had succeeded him as Whipper-in to the Conservative Party, and was subsequently made a Peer, seconded the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. In doing so, he declared that Parliament had then been convened, because it was constitutionally necessary that the consent of Parliament should be obtained before the Indian troops could be employed in Abyssinia. He thought, then, that he had ground, from personal knowledge, for entertaining the opinion, which he did with sincere regret, that Lord Beaconsfield's Government had violated the provisions of an Act which several of themselves passed when formerly in Office, and not only the letter, but also the sense, of the clause which their former Leader carried, for the very purpose of restraining the action which they had now taken. He regretted extremely that this case should have arisen. Why Her Majesty's Government had not come down to the House, and, in conformity with the precedent of 1867—for they had not to convene Parliament for the purpose, Parliament was sitting—why they had not asked the consent of Parliament for the employment of those Indian troops, he owned that he could not understand—unless he was to understand, from the speech that had been made by the Attorney General, and from other speeches which he regretted to have heard from the Ministerial Benches, and from which it appeared that the doctrine, which now for the first time they sought to establish, was, that the Advisers of the Crown were to have full liberty, and without previously consulting Parliament, to employ a large number, perhaps 100,000 or more, of these Indian troops, whenever they listed, in any part of the world. He held that that would be a most dangerous power for any Ministry, however composed, to possess; for he contemplated, as Lord Derby contemplated, as possible, the contingency of some Prime Minister, or some Sovereign, succeeding, who might be disposed to ignore the safeguards for British freedom which had been erected by our ancestors, and had existed for generations and for centuries, to preclude the possibility of our fellow-countrymen, or this House, their Representative, being overawed by a standing Army, and to preclude the possibility of the policy of this country abroad being compromised by the unconstitutional action of any Minister or Sovereign, without the consent of Parliament—to preclude the possibility of the country finding itself engaged in a war that it might deprecate, and that it might have avoided, if Parliament had intervened. He had ventured to address these few words to the House. After the able and exhaustive speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, he felt that, as an old Member of the House, to whom the right hon. Gentleman had appealed—and one, who had considered somewhat gravely wide Constitutional questions—that he should risk weakening the force of the right hon. Gentleman's powerful oration, by venturing another word in support of the right hon. Gentleman's arguments.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, the last speaker was entitled to their sincere congratulations for his clear, manly, and out-spoken enunciation of Constitutional law and principles. It was said this was not the best time to discuss the policy and economy of removing Indian troops out of India; but it was to be feared that if those points were not now discussed, they would escape consideration. He condemned the conduct of the Government on three separate grounds—first, on the ground of Constitutional law, secondly, on the ground of economy, and thirdly, on the ground of policy, both as affecting this country and India. He must, first of all, say a few words with regard to the Indian troops themselves. Some hard and undeserved things had been said against them, and he felt bound to say a word or two in their defence. These men were loyal, well-disciplined, faithful, orderly, and obedient servants of the Crown. In circumstances new and unexampled, they were leaving their home and kindred with alacrity and cheerfulness at the call of the country to which they had sworn allegiance, and when they arrived at Malta they should be met, not with terms of disparagement and reproach, but, as far as their military conduct went, in terms of eulogy and praise, and should be treated with consideration and kindness. It was said they were Mahomedans, and therefore likely to engage in this expedition with a sympathy they might be supposed to have for the Turks. As a matter of fact, he might say the majority of the men were not Mahomedans; three-fifths of them were Hindoos, and had no more sympathy with Turkey than he had. The first ground upon which he condemned the conduct of the Government—namely, that of Constitutional law—could not be more distinctly defined, or with more vigour and force, than by the Resolution submitted by the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition. Two questions were presented to the House—first, was the employment of these troops, without the consent of Parliament previously obtained, legal or illegal? and, secondly, assuming their employment to be illegal, was there anything in the circumstances of the case which the Government could plead in justification for having departed from the law? He thought it was impossible to deny the illegality of the conduct of the Government, after the elaborate and wonderful speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. Nor did he think there was any emergency to justify the Government in moving these troops without the previous consent of Parliament. With regard to his second ground of objection, he observed that no troops under the British Crown, in their surroundings and their peculiarities, were so expensive as these troops which had been brought from India to Malta. He believed they required, by two-thirds, more tonnage than any other troops in the world. If, in 1875, the Government had adopted a plan which he and others suggested, there would have been no necessity for looking to India for a military reinforcement—they would have at their command a reinforcement which, for military purposes, would have been three times more efficient than that to which they had resorted, and which would occasion enormous expenditure. If the Government had increased the Militia Reserves from 30,000 to 40,000, the cost would have been only about £45,000 a-year. Those 10,000 additional men would have been sufficient to fill up 21 battalions of the Line. With regard to his third ground of objection, he would observe that the result of the step taken by the Government was at least questionable, and might be fraught with danger to India and to England. If these 7,000 Native troops from India were to be followed by such a number as would have weight in Europe, we should have to make a total change in our Indian policy, in this respect among others—we should have to insist on a disbandment of the Armies of the independent Native Princes. With regard to the Amendment moved by the Secretary for the Colonies, it affirmed that the Constitutional control of Parliament over the raising and employment of the Military Forces of the Crown was fully secured by the provisions of the law. Now, part of the law in reference to that case was contained in the Act of 1858 for the government of India, which said that Indian troops should not be used outside the limits of India at the expense of the Revenues of that country. He asked, therefore, of what use the law was, when it was overriden, as it had been in this instance, through the action taken by Her Majesty's Government? The Amendment also affirmed that the control of Parliament was secured by the undoubted power of the House to grant or refuse Supplies. But what did such a power really amount to, after the expense of moving those troops had been actually incurred? The House was placed, practically, very much in the position of the traveller whose money was demanded from him by the highwayman who held a pistol at his head. In conclusion, he did not wish to weaken the hands of the Government in a time of difficulty. That statement might be received with incredulity — but in proof of it he had that day withdrawn from the Notice Paper of the House a Motion relating to the efficiency of the Indian troops, because he had been assured, on good authority, that it would be inconvenient for the public interests to proceed with it. This was a great Constitutional question, and he hoped that many hon. Members opposite, following the example of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), would support the Resolution of the noble Lord. If the Members of the Opposition did not vote for the preservation of the Privileges of the House of Commons in such a vital question, they would have voluntarily abandoned their functions as guardians of the public purse. If, ignoring the merits of the question, hon. Members opposite voted blindly with the Government, they would show that, instead of being jealous preservers of Constitutional privileges, they had become a mere machinery for registering the personal acts of a personal Government.

MR. GRANTHAM*: I do not intend to follow my hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Henry Havelock) through the arguments he has used to induce us to vote for the Resolution; because he has devoted himself exclusively to the question of the policy of bringing over Indian troops to unite them with our English Army for service in Europe or in Asia, instead of attempting to grapple with the question of law raised by the Resolution of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington). I would willingly follow him through those fields over which he has travelled, because I look upon this measure as one of the greatest masterpieces of Her Majesty's Government; but I must ask the House to travel back to the only question now before us—namely, has the noble Lord correctly stated in his Resolution the Constitutional law of England upon the subject? It is a question of the greatest importance, not only to present times, but to future ages; and I do not regret, in the slightest degree, that the question has been brought forward—nay, rather I rejoice that it has been—because, as we have unfortunately so often been ranged in this House in battle array upon this Eastern Question, and we on this side of the House have been so often attacked in such a way as to stir up in our breasts the strongest feelings of Party antagonism, it is a matter of great congratulation to me that we can discuss this question with the coolness rather of lawyers than with the heat of Party politicians. The noble Lord asks us to affirm that the Crown cannot, without the consent of Parliament, raise or keep troops, either in the United Kingdom, or in any part of the Dominions of the Crown, excepting those actually serving in India. Now, I think I can show conclusively that that is not Constitutional law, notwithstanding the able speeches of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich and the noble Marquess. They rest their defence entirely on the Bill of Rights, and they contend that, because by that Statute no troops can be kept "within the Kingdom except those enumerated in the Mutiny Act;" therefore "Kingdom" must be held to include all the Possessions of the Crown. Now, I think those Members who have spoken have omitted to notice that there is something besides keeping troops which is so restricted—the words of the Act are "raising or keeping." What does that show, as read by the light of the contemporary history of the country and of the debates of that period? Why, that Parliament was objecting—and we know it did object—to the diminution of the population available for the agriculture and commerce of the country. It objected to a number of the able-bodied men of England being kept in idleness, and tempted to lead a boisterous and dissolute life, instead of increasing the trade and wealth of the country by adopting peaceful pursuits. It was, therefore, England and English interests that Parliament was protecting, and not the whole of the out-lying Dominions of the Crown, whose interests in those days were always made secondary to the interests of England. Finding, therefore, that the "raising" troops only referred to the Kingdom alone, what is there to show that "or keeping" referred to a different area—namely—England plus the Dominions of the Crown? If you look a little further down the Statute, you will find that the framers of the Act were well aware of the difference between the "Kingdom" and the "Dominions of the Crown," because they use both terms together when, later on in the Statute, but not in reference to the raising or keeping of troops, they refer to the Kingdom and Dominions of the Crown collectively. Besides, we must not forget that, except as affected by Statute, or the principles therein declared, the Prerogative of the Crown to direct the movement of troops, and to make war or peace is undoubted. And, unless you bring the Crown within the Statute itself, or within the principle of the Statute, you cannot limit that Prerogative; neither must we forget that what Parliament was so sensitive about in those periods of civil strife was lest they should be coerced, as they had been, by an armed Force, in the days of the Commonwealth, or lest the Government of the country should be overthrown by Royal troops in the pay of a Sovereign who might come to the throne at heart a Romanist, though by name a Protestant. What they were looking to, therefore, was the protection only of something within the four corners of England. Let us now pass on to the subsequent Statutes which have since been almost annually passed, called the Mutiny Acts, and see if there is anything there to show what was the view of Parliament as evinced year by year from its legislation. If there was any doubt as to its meaning in the Bill of Rights, there can be, I think, no doubt as to its meaning in the Mutiny Acts. Prior to the Union of Great Britain with Ireland, you always find that the words "within the Kingdom," or "within Great Britain" used. After the Union with Ireland, it is always "within the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland." These are the words—

"Whereas the raising or keeping a Standing Army within the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in time of peace, unless it be with consent of Parliament, is against law. And whereas it is adjudged necessary that a body of Forces should be continued for the safety of the United Kingdom, and the defence of the Possessions, of Her Majesty's Crown, that the number shall be, &c., &c."

You also find that the troops which were raised in Ireland by the Crown through the intervention of the Irish Parliament prior to the Union, and the troops raised in other Possessions, were never included in the numbers mentioned in the Mutiny Acts passed by the English Parliament. If the Crown of England were able to use those troops, as we know it did use them—especially the Irish troops—for English wars, how can it be said that the Crown could not keep troops in its Dominions, or move them from one Dominion to another without first coming to Parliament? History sometimes repeats itself, and, singularly, we find, by looking to the debates in the Irish Parliament that took place two years after those debates in 1775 in the English Parliament, on the introducing Hanoverian troops into Gibraltar and Port Mahon, and which have been so often alluded to—namely, on November 27th, 1777, a Resolution was passed in the Irish Parliament, mutatis mutandis—India for Ireland—identical with what has now taken place in reference to these troops. It is this—

"That 4,000 troops, out of the 12,000 voted for the defence of the Kingdom (Ireland), be spared for His Majesty's service, the same to be no charge to Ireland after quitting the Kingdom." Now, as no application was made to this Parliament that I can find, for leave to borrow these troops, the case seems to be identical. "But," says the noble Lord and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, "in the debate of 1775 the Lord Chancellor Bathurst gave up the point, and admitted that 'Kingdom' included 'Dominions.'" All I can say is, if he did say so, I think he was wrong; but, as the report of his speech is contained in about eight lines, it is evidently only what the writer, who very likely did not hear him, thought was the purport of what he said. If we look to what was said by the other great legal authority who spoke against the right claimed for the Crown by Lord North—namely, Serjeant Adair—we find he objected to it, not because of the actual words of the Bill of Rights, but because it was

"deducible from the same principles of law and Constitution as that which induced our ancestors to pass the Bill of Rights as to keeping troops in the Kingdom."

Admitting, therefore, practically, that he did not agree with Lord Bathurst whether it was or was not within the principles of the Act may be a question of opinion which may be open to argument as much now as then. I think clearly it was not; and not one authority has been referred to to show that it was, beyond that debate, which ended in nothing. The difficulty raised by many Members, and which has induced them to affirm the noble Lord's Resolution, namely—

"That the troops, when moved out of India, are subject to no Mutiny Act, and cannot be tried by court martial,"

is entirely fallacious, because Section 4 of the Mutiny Act seems to have been passed for the very purpose of this case, as it alludes to other troops raised by the Crown beyond those referred to in the Preamble to the Mutiny Act, and says that directly any such troops are raised and kept within the Dominions of the Crown, they shall be subject to the provisions of this Act as far as courts martial are concerned. If the Crown has no power to raise or keep troops in its Dominions, beyond the number sanctioned by the Preamble to the Mutiny Act, as the numbers to be kept within the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, there is nothing, and can be nothing, to which this section applies; and it is one of the first canons of construction, that to give a legal construction to a Statute, something must be found on which the words of the Statute are to operate. There is another point which seems to me of importance, but to which attention has not yet been drawn, and that is the language of the Marine Mutiny Act, which is annually passed side by side with the Army Mutiny Act. Now, it is quite clear that our Navy cannot be raised and maintained merely to remain within the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland; but, if the keeping of an Army in foreign parts, or in the Queen's Dominions outside of England, was contrary to the Constitution, why was not the keeping of a Navy and a Force of Marines? Yet the Bill of Rights is silent as to keeping up Marines or Sailors, and you find no reference in the Marine Mutiny Acts to its being illegal to keep them, no reference to the "United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland," but only to the "United Kingdom and the Dominions of the Crown;" nor is there any limit whatever given to the number to be kept or maintained. Yet even in those days it was to our Navy that we mostly trusted for our armed defence, and which would be as formidable as our Army, if the Crown wanted to use it for attacking our foreign Dominions. How can there be any doubt, therefore, as to the meaning of the words "within the Kingdom," as used in the reign of William and Mary, or "within the Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland," as used in our own Statutes, and that the words bear their ordinary meaning, and do not refer to Dominions in foreign parts? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich has made, no doubt, a most captivating speech, in which he has talked very eloquently of unconstitutional and illegal acts, and has carried us back to the days of ship-money and the Star Chamber; but he has utterly failed to grapple with these facts, and has attempted to overawe the judgment of the House by painting to them vivid pictures of the Crown, acting on the advice of autocratic Ministers, transforming, as it were, Lord Beaconsfield into Oliver Cromwell, and commencing wars, and using our Indian troops for weeks, months, and years, without even allowing Parliament to know anything about their movements. What weight can there be in such suggestions? No action can be taken now-a-days but what is at once known. Not a ship, not a regiment, scarcely even a soldier, can be ordered to leave India without its being known in England within 24 hours. In this, however, I do agree with him—that as the Crown cannot get the money to pay the troops so removed from India, and kept in Her Majesty's Dominions without coming to Parliament for the money; therefore, unless the Government can give a good reason for ordering the embarkation of the troops before obtaining the authority of Parliament to pay them, they did do an improper act—an unconstitutional act, if you will—in making the country liable to pay for them; but the mere doing it, the mere embarkation before coming to Parliament, is not unconstitutional, because that is strictly within the Prerogative of the Crown. They did intend to apply at once to Parliament for the money directly the embarkation was a fait accompli; and at the most it would be a question of Censure of the Government for not coming first to Parliament, if they are not able to give, as they could give, and will give, at the proper time, full and satisfactory reason for this—as I said before, the greatest masterpiece of their foreign policy. By so doing, they have shown to an awestruck Aggressor the power of an united Empire, and have prevented such statesmen as the right hon. Members for Greenwich and Birmingham from weakening its effects by first showing to Europe the sorry spectacle of a nation divided against itself. I submit, Sir, that the noble Lord has failed to uphold his alleged reading of the Constitutional history of England, and I maintain that the Government have broken no Constitutional law, but have done that for which they are entitled to, and ought to receive, the best thanks of a united people.

MR. CHILDERS pointed out that the interpretation just put by the hon. and learned Member upon the speech of Lord Bathurst, in 1775, did not accord with the view taken of it by two Members of Parliament both of whom referred to it in the debates of the time, or with the Report of it still extant, and that a reference to the debate of 1775 would show that Serjeant Adair virtually accepted Lord Bathurst's position. Turning to the actual question before the House, he would ask them to go back to the 27th of March, when Her Majesty's Government arrived at two decisions of very great importance. In the first place, they resolved to add to the strength of the Army by 35,000 men through the operation of the Army and Militia Reserves. That decision was made under three Acts of Parliament, and was at once communicated to that House. The other decision was to add 7,000 to the Army, as a draft from the Indian Native Forces. But these 7,000 men, we were told by Lord Strathnairn in his evidence before the Indian Army Committee, were equal only to 3,500 Europeans; so that while the decision to add so large a number as 35,000 men was published to the world, the Government deliberately kept back the knowledge of its determination to bring from India the mere tenth part of that force to Malta. But, if ever there was a decision about which Parliament ought to have been immediately consulted, it was this. On no question had there been a more pronounced expression of opinion, both on the part of Members of Her Majesty's Government, and their military advisers. In 1867 there was a very important debate on the policy of bringing Indian Native troops even as far west as Abyssinia. The speeches delivered in that debate had not, as far as he was aware, been referred to in the course of the present discussion, although they well deserved the attention of hon. Members. One distinguished Member of that House spoke with great vigour in the debate, dwelling at length upon the policy of bringing troops of this particular description from India to the assistance of the European Forces of Her Majesty. That Member of the House spoke of the question as having two distinct bearings. One was in reference to India, and the other was in reference to this country. He said it was a bad policy for India, because, if we had too weak, or too timid, or too facile a Governor General, India might be seriously denuded of troops for the purpose of serving European interests; but he maintained that the greatest danger was to this country, because he did not like India to be looked upon as an English barrack in Oriental seas. The Member who used those expressions in 1867 was Lord Salisbury, who, on the 27th of March last, decided that 7,000 Native troops should be brought from India, and that Parliament should not be consulted until after their arrival in Europe. Surely the House was entitled, when so great a change of policy had taken place on the part of the Ministers of the Crown, to have been promptly informed of the reason of the change. Nor was it only Lord Salisbury's opinion which had changed so suddenly. He had already referred to the Committee which, in 1867 and 1868, inquired whether to any extent it would be feasible to substitute Indian troops for European troops in the Colonies and Dependencies of the Empire. He had the honour of serving upon the Committee, of which Lord Salisbury was the Chairman. Among the military and Indian witnesses examined before that Committee, there was hardly any difference of opinion that such an operation as was now being carried on would be supremely unwise. It was true that some of them thought that under certain circumstances it might be desirable to substitute a larger number of Indian troops for the Regular Army at certain Colonial stations. It was also suggested by other witnesses of less weight, that it might be possible in certain circumstances to bring Indian Native troops as far as Malta, Gibraltar, and the Mediterranean. But all the witnesses, he believed, without exception, agreed that it would be very unwise to adopt any such measure for the first time on the eve or during the commencement of war, although some were of opinion that it might be done as a last resource in case of a desperate war. The utmost recommended by the witnesses was to substitute Indian for European troops in some of the Eastern Colonies, provided the operation were commenced in time of peace and carried out gradually; because, if it were found to be inconvenient, it might be stopped without any danger to the State. He might refer to one or two of the most salient points in the evidence of some of the most valuable witnesses examined upon this question. Lord Strathnairn was afraid that any employment of Indian troops in substitution for English troops would lead to a reduction of the Army; but, if such were to be adopted, he said—

“I do not think that any such change would be good on the eve, or at the beginning of war.”

Sir G. Clerk said—

“I would not, under any circumstances, take a Native regiment to garrison Malta or Gibraltar, or any station in Europe.”

General Pears said—

“It would not be desirable to use Native troops at Malta or Gibraltar; but in time of war, in urgent need, a brigade or two of Sikhs might go anywhere.”

Sir Walter Elliot said—

Sir Hope Grant said—

“I would only substitute Indian for Native troops in time of war as a last resource. Under no circumstances whatever would I send them to Malta or Gibraltar.”

Sir Herbert Edwardes said—

“My judgment is decidedly against bringing Indian troops to Europe.”

He was not now arguing the question, which would come before them at the proper time, whether it would be desirable, in these or any other circumstances, to introduce Native Indian troops into European garrisons in the Mediterranean; but he would say most distinctly that, after the almost unanimous evidence given before the only Committee which, as far as he was aware, had inquired into the matter, and after the speech of the responsible Secretary of State on this very question, this was the very last transaction which ought to have been kept back from the House an hour. So great a change ought not to have been left to be argued here after the event. He had listened carefully to all the speeches from the Government Benches, and he had tried to find out precisely why it was that Parliament had not been informed of the matter. The House had been told that it was very desirable that there should have been secrecy, but they had not been told why. It was admitted that the delay of a fortnight had not had the slightest effect on the preparations of Russia, or obtained for us any diplomatic advantage. The only reason that had been given was, that if the information had been communicated to Parliament at an earlier date there would have been some inconvenience in taking up transports. Now, he would take on himself to say, not on his own authority, but on that of others of greater weight, that if it had been known that the Government required transports, in the present state of the shipping interest, they would have been able to obtain them at least as cheaply as had been actually effected. There never was a time at which shipping could have been had at lower rates. No doubt—he would not call them arguments—but excuses, based upon a number of legal, Constitutional, and administrative considerations, had been given for the delay. He should like to analyze the excuses of the Government. It was alleged on their part that the state of things constituted an emergency which justified them in withholding information from Parliament. But Her Majesty had Herself assigned that very emergency as a reason for coming to Parliament with information in respect to the calling out of the Reserve Forces. Therefore, the same state of things was relied upon as a reason for giving and for withholding information. The second excuse made by the Government was, that the right hon. Member for Greenwich had declared that it was the duty of the Government to take the responsibility of their actions upon themselves and afterwards to come to Parliament for their justification; but they forgot to add that his right hon. Friend said they should do so at the earliest opportunity. Instead of coming to Parliament at the earliest opportunity, the Government had not come to Parliament at all, had done nothing but answer questions, and only proposed to make a formal communication to Parliament when the Native Indian troops had actually arrived at Malta. Thus Parliament would receive no formal information with regard to the intention of Her Majesty's Government on this subject

until that intention had actually been carried into effect. That excuse, he would venture to say, had no weight whatever. He now came to the Constitutional and legal doctrines which had been advocated by some eminent lawyers and politicians. The powerful speech of the Attorney General had been replied to by the speech from the right hon. Member for Greenwich, which would not be forgotten in that House, and the refutation was so complete that he would not venture to travel over the ground again. The Attorney General had come before that House in the character of the boldest supporter of the Prerogative that had been known since the days of Lord Eldon, and had argued that the employment of troops in Her Majesty's Possessions other than England was not a matter dealt with by the Bill of Rights; that its language—to use his exact words—did not extend beyond the Kingdom of England; and that the Mutiny Acts enacted nothing on the subject beyond the United Kingdom; so that the only function of Parliament with respect to troops in British Possessions was voting their cost. The hon. and learned Gentleman contended that the sole object of the Bill of Rights was to prevent Parliament and its Members being overawed, and this, it was evident, would not be occasioned by any number of troops kept in other Possessions of the Crown. The Attorney General and the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India had both based their arguments on the 4th section of the Mutiny Act, which looked at first as if it had some bearing on the question, as contemplating the existence of a Colonial Army. He had with some pains traced the history of this clause, which was inserted during the American Wars, above a century ago, with the sole object of providing that where American Militia were brigaded with the King's troops, under a King's officer for service in the field, they should be subject then, and no longer, to the same military discipline. The Preamble to the clause up to 1810 was fatal to the Attorney General's argument. Again, it was argued that the Indian troops were not the only Army which Her Majesty could employ without having the consent of Parliament, but that there were also Colonial Armies that could be so employed. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had argued that those different Forces were all Queen's troops, and that the Queen was empowered to employ them just as the Indian troops were now being employed. All he could say was that the existence of such troops was entirely unknown to Parliament, the only Return of troops in the Colonies describing those locally raised as Militia. They were told, however, that if they did not exist, they might, and probably soon would; that Canada would soon raise an Army, which would then be at the disposal of Her Majesty, in the same way as the Indian troops were at present. He should like to ask this question—If Canada did raise that Army, under what Act would it be raised? Was there any pretence that the Canadian Legislature could pass any Act exercising authority over troops outside the Canadian boundary? There was no such provision in the Constitution Acts of Canada, of Australia, or of any Colony, enabling them to do more than to raise troops in the nature of Militia for home defence—in fact, to do more than establish a superior police force, engaged under ordinary civil contract. But the Indian Native Forces were raised under an Imperial Statute, which gave effect to their Articles of War, not only in India, but wherever they went. It was idle to contend that this imaginary Colonial Force—the Attorney General's dozen men in buckram—were any justification for the ground which had been taken up with respect to the Indian troops. But it was then said that the Committee of 1867-8 had not referred to the Constitutional point when they discussed the use of Indian troops in the Colonies. No doubt, and for the best of reasons; for the point had been settled by the rule then in force, under which Indian troops in the Colonies were voted, just as British troops were, both as to numbers and pay. Then the Attorney General said that in 1863 some Indian troops were sent to New Zealand, and not specifically voted. Here, again, he was wrong; for, although there was a proposal to send them, they were not sent, but British troops leaving India in the ordinary roster were despatched to New Zealand instead of to other Colonies, and the numbers in the Preamble to the Mutiny Act were not affected.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) observed that he had said that the troops sent forward were on the Indian Establishment and under the Mutiny Act.

Mr. CHILDERS said, that made no difference, because European troops in India were always under the Mutiny Act. As to the particular troops referred to, they were paid out of and came within the Votes of Parliament. They could not expect the Attorney General to be conversant with all that occurred at the War Office 15 years ago; but he must not quote this case again in illustration of his argument. The Attorney General had also stated that the changes made by the House of Lords in the clause of the Bill of 1858 had effected the object of its original Mover. But, unfortunately, if he referred to the debate, he would find that the amended clause was opposed exactly on the same grounds as the original words. The fact was that, although there was some hesitation in 1861 and 1862 to yield to General Peel's protests, in 1863 the cost of Indian troops was separately shown. In the following year the numbers were shown on the Estimates; and since 1865 the number of Indian troops employed out of India, in spite of all the Attorney General had said, had been as regularly voted by Parliament as had been the numbers of troops of the Regular Army. This House had distinctly laid down that it was not sufficient to vote the money, and that when Indian troops were employed outside the boundaries of our possessions in India, the number must also be voted. As the Government claimed to send Native troops from India to Malta without the consent of Parliament, he would ask, whether they also claimed to send European troops from India in excess of the voted numbers? Did they also claim to substitute in India a small number of European troops for a larger number of Native troops moved from India into British Possessions, and not to come to Parliament at all if the latter cost no more than the former? These were questions which the Government were bound to answer. If the law would allow them to do this, the sooner they had a fresh Declaration of Rights the better, for the position was a perilous one, the gravity of which was not diminished by the smallness of the numbers in question. It was by laxity in small matters that dangerous precedents were established, and it was to prevent such a precedent that he hoped the House would accept the Resolution of his noble Friend.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS moved the adjournment of the debate.

(The O'Connor Don, Mr. Richard Smyth, Mr. Charles Lewis, Mr. James Corry, Mr. William Johnston, Mr. Dease, Mr. Dickson, Mr. Redmond.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 16th May.]

Order for Committee read.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 3 (Penalties for selling of intoxicating liquors during prohibited hours extended to whole of Sunday).

On Question, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill?"

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he had most unfortunately informed several hon. Members that this Bill would not come on that night. Perhaps he had no right to repeat a private conversation that he had with the hon. Member who had charge of the Bill; but he certainly gathered from him that the Bill would stand over until the debate on the Eastern Question had finished.

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the hon. Member that the House was in Committee on the Bill, and that the Question was, whether the clause should stand part of the Bill.

THE O'CONOR DON said, that what he intended to state, and what he did state, to hon. Members who had asked him the same question was, that he would not proceed with the Bill on Monday unless the Eastern Debate terminated before half-past 12. He thought there ought not to be much difficulty in making some progress that evening. The clause under discussion was one to which there was no objection. On the next clause the hon. Member for County

Limerick (Mr. O'Sullivan) had put down an Amendment to omit that clause altogether. Although the promoters of the Bill were unwilling to abandon the clause, yet, if hon. Gentlemen really wished it, they would consent to its being struck out. With regard to Clause 5, there were two Amendments proposed—one by the hon. Member for County Limerick, and the other by the hon. Gentleman the Member for County Cork (Mr. M'Carthy Downing). He would assent to both of those Amendments, if they, on the other hand, would allow the Bill to be dealt with in a fair and reasonable manner. But when they came to Clause 6, there was an Amendment to it proposed by the hon. Member for County Sligo (Mr. King-Harman). It would be hardly fair to ask the House to go into the consideration of that Amendment after the very serious question that had been debated in the House that evening. Therefore, he proposed to report Progress when the Committee arrived at Clause 6, the first clause that was of importance. As he had made these concessions, he hoped hon. Members would allow the Bill to proceed quietly.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE observed, that he had not meant to allege anything like a promise on the part of the hon. Member for Roscommon not to bring on the Bill that night. He was only refreshing his recollection of a conversation which he was sorry he had mentioned to others. He certainly understood the hon. Member to say that he had not intended to proceed with the Bill until the debate on the Eastern Question was concluded.

MR. O'SULLIVAN remarked, that they had been told that no fresh Bill would be taken up at a later hour than 12 o'clock, and, certainly, no such obnoxious Bill as this ought to be taken. They could not enter into a discussion on four Amendments and four new clauses at that hour. He, therefore, begged to move that Progress be reported.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. O'Sullivan.)

THE O'CONOR DON hoped that the hon. Member would not press his Motion, because, as he had before said, he had accepted the Amendments as they stood. He did not really understand what it was that the hon. Member wished to be discussed.

The O'Conor Don

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA trusted that the hon. Member for County Limerick would not occupy time by his Motion, when the hon. Member in charge of the Bill was prepared to give way to his Amendments. If there were any difficulty, it would arise on later clauses, and it was obviously occupying the time of the House unnecessarily to move to report Progress under the present circumstances.

MR. FAWCETT could not support the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for County Limerick. He hoped the Motion to report Progress would be withdrawn, for nothing could be more fair and reasonable than that which had been offered by the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Conor Don). The hon. Member for Roscommon stated that he did not like the Amendments to Clauses 4 and 5; but yet he would accept them, and had offered himself to move to report Progress when they arrived at Clause 6. In their own interests, therefore, he asked the opponents of the Bill not to alienate some of their English supporters by opposing what was offered by the promoters of the Bill.

MR. O'SULLIVAN remarked, that there were four Amendments on the Paper before that of the hon. Member for Sligo. If the hon. Member for Roscommon were willing to accept all those, yet that of the hon. Member for Sligo remained. He would withdraw his Motion, only on the condition that the hon. Member for Roscommon was willing to accept those four.

THE O'CONOR DON said, that he had already stated that there was no Amendment to the clause then before the House. On Clause 4 the hon. Member for County Limerick had given Notice to omit it, and to that Motion he had assented. To the Amendments of the hon. Member for Cork, on Clause 5, he assented; and also to the alteration on the same clause, proposed by the hon. Member for Limerick, and when Clause 6 was reached, he proposed to move that Progress be reported.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the Question before the Committee was that Progress be reported. If it were withdrawn he should then put the Question that the clause should stand part of the Bill.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked leave to withdraw his Motion to report Progress.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

MR. R. POWER said, that the Committee would remember that Sunday, in Ireland, was a most remarkable day. Sunday was a day on which great events took place. They were married, they were buried, and they were born, on Sundays. The hon. Member proposed that any policeman should, at any hour of the day or night, be permitted to enter into any public-house in Ireland. It must be remembered that the people who held public-houses in Ireland resided in them. In Scotland it was different, for the people who held public-houses there had also houses of their own. In Ireland, they were not so wealthy as to be able to afford both a public-house and a private residence. By this Bill, the policeman in Ireland was to be allowed to enter into any public-house whenever he chose, and if he found any person drinking he could arrest them. He had thus to draw a wise distinction between a person who was a guest of the publican, and the person who was merely a customer. If a person from a distance—a cousin, niece, brother, father, or mother—came to visit his or her relations, a policeman could enter into that house and arrest such person for drinking on Sunday. Therefore, he moved the rejection of this clause. The ground on which he did so was, that it would have the effect of placing licensed traders in Ireland—especially in the county towns and small districts, who resided in public-houses—at the mercy of the policeman. If a man was found in a public-house, drinking with the publican—no matter whether he was a brother, or any other near relation—he would be liable to be arrested and fined £10. And a policeman might at any time of the night enter into a public-house in order to detect the brothers of a publican of the crime of drinking. He wished to preserve the liberty of every Irishman, no matter who he might be, and for that reason he moved that this clause be rejected.

MR. SULLIVAN observed that the penalties in question were now in force under the provisions of another Act, and were for selling, or exposing for sale, or being, at any prohibited hour, in any public-house on Sundays. If public-houses now opened within prohibited hours on Sunday, then the evils which had been spoken of took place.

MR. MURPHY could not go the same length as the hon. Member who had moved the total rejection of the clause. He could understand that there ought to be a justification for giving such power to a policeman, in order to detect whether "selling, exposing for sale, or keeping open any premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday" took place; but when the section went on to give the same power in case of anyone being present in or upon any such premises during any hours or time on Sunday, he thought the provision very unnecessary and objectionable. The Committee would recollect that this was an Act for the total closing of public-houses in the country districts of Ireland on Sundays. It would also be remembered that those public-houses were the places of residence of the families of the occupiers, and that if these words were to be made law no one present with the publican, however bond fide, would be safe from arrest by the policeman from the mere fact of his being in a public-house. He hoped the promoters of the Bill would allow a Proviso to be struck out, which subjected anyone who was found drinking with the publican in his house, on Sundays, to penalties.

THE O'CONOR DON said, that he believed, according to the ordinary procedure of the Committee, it would be incompetent for his hon. Friend to effect the alteration proposed; because the Question had been put, that the clause should stand part of the Bill. Before he could consent to the omission of the words proposed, it would be necessary for him to look over the existing Acts to see what effect the omission would have. But he might state that he agreed in the principle laid down by the hon. Member for Cork, and would undertake to look into the matter with the view of carrying out, if possible, upon the Report, the suggestion made.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA thought his hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon would be perfectly safe in agreeing to have the words struck out of the clause.

THE O'CONOR DON repeated that he would see in what way his hon. Friend's object could be best attained, although he could not consent to the alteration at that moment.

MAJOR O'GORMAN: The hon. Member for Roscommon has become, forsooth, the arbiter elegantiarum of this House. I beg to say that if my hon. Friend withdraws his Motion, I will make a Motion to report Progress. This Bill is a cursed Bill! It shall not pass while I can obtain a Teller to oppose it.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is my duty to state that the expression used by the hon. and gallant Member, as applied to the Bill, is one which is not in Order.

MAJOR NOLAN observed that the expression had been used before in the House to Amendments, and he thought if rightly applied to them, it could not be wrong to apply it to a Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and gallant Member is not in Order in adverting to what passed on previous occasions in the House. If the words, which I took from the hon. and gallant Member for Waterford, had reference to the Bill, they are unparliamentary, and the expression must be withdrawn.

MAJOR O'GORMAN: I think, Sir, we have very few liberties in this House now. I will not withdraw the expression. It is a cursed Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN: I will point out to the hon. and gallant Member that in this House it is customary to accept the ruling of the Chair. I must again ask the hon. and gallant Member to retract the expression.

MAJOR O'GORMAN: I have never done anything in this House to oppose its will; but I have very strong feelings upon this subject—the strongest that can possibly be entertained, and I am determined that this Bill shall not pass. [Mr. SULLIVAN: Withdraw!] I shall not at the instance of the hon. and learned Member for Louth withdraw the expression; but I do, Sir, in deference to the decision of the Chair. I was elected for the City of Waterford for the purpose of bringing back Home Rule to Waterford, and if I cannot do that I shall cut off this right hand before I bring back a coercion Act to Waterford. I repeat, I withdraw the word I made use of, because you, Sir, have called upon me to do so; but I decline to do so because I have been called upon by Members who come here to support coercive measures.

MR. O'SULLIVAN wished to ask the hon. and gallant Member for Waterford whether he would take the decision of the House upon the whole clause?

MAJOR O'GORMAN moved the rejection of the clause.

Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 98; Noes 26: Majority 72. — (Div. List, No. 143.)

Clause 4 (Construction of Act).

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Major O'Gorman.)

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, that if he understood the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) aright, he had accepted his Amendments to that clause.

MAJOR O'GORMAN said, that if that were the case he would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. SULLIVAN: I should like to explain that the clause has been withdrawn.

THE O'CONOR DON said, that the hon. Member for County Limerick had proposed to omit this clause. When the Question came to be put that that clause should stand part of the Bill, he did not intend to oppose its being struck out.

MAJOR O'GORMAN said, that he did not withdraw his Amendment.

MR. J. LOWTHER hoped the hon. and gallant Member for Waterford would withdraw his Amendment after what had taken place.

MAJOR O'GORMAN: I have no objection to withdraw any Motion on the distinct understanding that this wretched coercion Bill for Ireland shall have an end for this evening at least.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause negatived.

Clause 5 (Exemptions).

MR. O'SULLIVAN: I am sure my hon. Friend will have no objection to my Amendment, in page 2, line 32, to leave out from "liquors" to the end of the clause, and insert "on arrival or departure of trains."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. O'SULLIVAN: I think that the Amendment I have now before the Committee is one, the principle of which, as to the refreshment of bond fide travellers as described in the Licensing Act of 1874, has been accepted, and that I need say no more than that the hon. Member for Roscommon will not object to the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 6 (Commencement of Act).

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(The O'Conor Don.)

MR. KING-HARMAN would appeal to the hon. Member for Roscommon to go on with the Bill that night, as they had gone so far. They were kept there night after night to listen to the discussions on that Bill, and as they were there now, they might just as well sit later.

THE O'CONOR DON remarked that the promoters of the Bill would be most willing to go on then. But he would remind the hon. Member that the other night he refused to allow the Bill to proceed, and moved to report Progress. He himself had stated to the opponents of the Bill that, when Clause 6 was reached, he would move that Progress be reported, and, of course, he was bound to adopt that course; though, for his own part, he would be willing to sit there for the next three hours.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA entirely objected to go on then.

MR. KING-HARMAN said, that what he objected to was having this Bill commenced at a late hour. But he could see no objection to their now going on and discussing the Amendments to the present clause, which were very simple.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, that his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo would recollect that there had been a distinct understanding that they should not go on, and he hoped his hon. Friend would not withdraw his Motion.

MR. KING-HARMAN said, that because there was an understanding between the hon. Member for Roscommon and other hon. Members the Committee was not bound.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that there was no question of a private arrangement between any hon. Members. It was a distinct promise made to the Committee that Progress should be reported at a certain stage, which promise the hon. Member for Roscommon was loyally endeavouring to carry out, and to which course he trusted the Committee would now consent.

DR. WARD asked, if it were convenient to go on then with the Bill, at half-past 1, when they had spent so much time over it the other night? He protested against the adjournment of the House at that early hour, seeing that they had been able to sit till 9.30 A.M. the previous week, when time was merely wasted. He thought the House might go on for an hour or two.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, when an hon. Member who had charge of a Bill stated that at a certain stage he would move to report Progress, hon. Gentlemen who were interested in the Bill would have a right to go away on the faith of such an assertion.

THE O'CONOR DON said, at the commencement of the discussion, he had stated if his hon. Friend who opposed the Bill would allow it to proceed to a certain stage, he (the O'Conor Don), accepting the Amendments proposed up to that time, would propose to report Progress. His hon. Friends who opposed the Bill had carried out their part of the agreement; they had not met him with any obstruction, but had fairly executed their part of the bargain. That being so, could he be asked to break his word, and to try and press the Bill on, despite his having pledged himself to move to report Progress. If the passing of the measure depended upon going on, he could not be guilty of such a breach of faith.

MR. DILLWYN said, the hon. Member who had last spoken had not made his arrangements for reporting Progress in a hole-and-corner fashion. He had openly stated in that House what he intended doing, and those who objected to such a course being pursued should have protested against it at the time.

MR. KING-HARMAN did not wish to detain the Committee, if it was not thought desirable to go further that night; but he must say that he and others had been given to understand that at whatever time the Bill came on it would be proceeded with. A great number of hon. Gentlemen remained, much against their wills, in order to see the matter through, and when the Bill was reached, then, for the first time, they were informed that it was only proposed to proceed as far as a certain clause. He would not press his Motion for proceeding with the Bill, if the Committee did not wish it; but he asked the hon. Member for Roscommon to fix a date to discuss the Bill, and finish it, instead of bringing hon. Members down to the House, night after night, waiting about for this measure to come on.

DR. WARD said, unfortunately, he was not in the House when the hon. Member for Roscommon gave the undertaking not to proceed with the Bill beyond a certain clause. As he had promised that, he (Dr. Ward) by no means desired to see him break faith with the Committee.

MR. SULLIVAN said, on the occasion of the all-night sitting of the previous week, his hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon stated at the commencement that if any reasonable progress were made that night, he would not press the Bill further. But nothing was done on that occasion, whereas they had now made the reasonable progress of which his hon. Friend then spoke; and he was, by the course he was pursuing, carrying out his promise not to proceed to an undue length with the Bill at any one sitting.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

RATING OF TOWNS (IRELAND) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, there was another Bill down on the Paper, entitled the Voters' (Ireland) (No. 2) Bill, the object and provisions of which he believed were nearly identical with that which he was about to bring before the House. In referring to that measure, he wished to assure the House that there was no understanding between him and the hon. Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) on the subject, and that the coincidence was a pure accident. The purport of this Bill was to remove some difficulties which now existed, and which prevented persons in Ireland from enjoying the franchise who were entitled under the law. The Bill involved no extension of the franchise, nor did it in any way give the right to the franchise to any class not now entitled by law to possess it. It solely sought to remove difficulties arising from the practice common in some towns of the owner of premises paying the rate, which at present, owing to oversight in the law, prevented persons from getting upon the register. The means by which he sought to effect that purpose was machinery which had been employed to remedy analogous and similar difficulties which at one time stood in the way of persons entitled to the franchise in England, but which had been removed. As a matter of fact, this was a Bill for the assimilation of the law as between Ireland and England. Since the Act passed in the year

1850 regulating the qualification and registration of voters in Ireland, persons in boroughs, cities, and towns occupying rated premises of £8 yearly value had been entitled to vote. By the 2nd section of the Act it was provided that the clerk of the Union should transmit to the town clerk in each borough, city, and town a list of persons rated as owners or occupiers of premises of that value. By the next section the town clerk was required to make out a list of persons entitled to vote, and one of the qualifications necessary to entitle a person to be put upon the register in any particular year was that before the previous July, he should have paid all the poor rates payable on the 1st of January in that year. Persons who by any accident were omitted from the list of voters were given, by the 34th section, the power to make a claim to be put upon the list; but the difficulties in the way of establishing the right were numerous; and under Section 100, the claimant was bound not merely to pay the certified and ascertained amount of taxes due to the 1st January, but he was bound to pay all poor rates due to the time he made his claim, and it might be difficult for him to ascertain the exact amount. That in itself was sufficient to place the claimant at a great disadvantage; but, in addition, he was bound to comply directly with the propriety of formalities and regulations. The claim must be in writing, and signed by the claimant himself, and he was bound, step by step, to prove his claim affirmatively. In 1868 there came the Irish Reform Act, which gave the franchise in towns to all persons who occupied premises of the rated value of over £4, and declared that the occupation of land, &c., rated over that amount should be as effectual to qualify a man to be registered as a voter as was the old £8 franchise, and the introduction of the word "occupation" showed that the case was contemplated of occupiers whose rates were paid by their landlords. Prima facie, the law stood thus—the occupying tenant was liable for the rates under the Irish law, but if the collector got them from the owner, that was enough under the Act to entitle the occupier to the franchise. In certain towns the arrangement by which the owner paid the rates was very general. In Dublin, in five cases out of six, of a large class of houses, it was the rule for the rates to be paid in the first instance by the owners, when, of course, they were ultimately paid by the occupiers. It was necessary that the rates should be paid in proper time—namely, the 1st of July, or the franchise was gone, and in some cases the landlords would neglect to pay. Usually in Ireland the landlord was of one way of thinking politically, and the occupier another; and though the differences should not often lead to feelings of hostility between them, they made the landlord more or less indifferent to the payment of the rates which would secure the franchise to the occupier. Then, again, the landlord paying the rate was not bound to return the name of the occupier for whom he paid it, nor was the collector bound to ask for it, and thus, in many cases, the occupier did not find his name upon the rate book. Now, about as soon as the occupier discovered that the rate had been neglected to be paid, he could come forward and pay it; but the proper time for paying having passed, he would be reduced to the necessity of making a claim and facing the difficulties of that process. In many cases the occupier would take for granted that the owner had paid, and would only find out when it was too late that the rates were unpaid. The best way to show the effect of this state of things upon the borough franchise in Ireland was to refer to a Return made in 1874, upon the Motion of the senior Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt). The Return showed that in the town of Belfast there were 25,704 premises rated at over £4, while there were only 14,990 occupiers registered to vote. In Cork town there were 7,190 premises rated at over £4, and only 3,737 votes. In Limerick there were 8,200 such premises, and 2,161 registered occupiers. And in Dublin the premises rated at over £4 numbered 23,247, and the registered occupiers 11,000, or less than half. The English Reform Act, passed in 1867, abolished, as they all knew, what was known as the "compound householder." In cases where one man was the landlord of a number of small tenements, the local authorities did not care to go to the trouble to collect the rates from all the occupiers, but agreed with the landlord that he should pay the rates, some deduction being made from the amount to compensate him. The Ministry of that day were disposed to give household suffrage; but to limit the effect of the measure they said—"It is not enough to be a householder; we shall insist that in addition the rates must be paid not by the landlord, but by the occupier." From the Opposition side of the House there came a Motion to give the compound householder a vote, notwithstanding that the rates were paid by his landlord; but the attempt was defeated, and the Ministry of the day stuck to the principle that there should be personal payment of rates in order to give a man the right to vote. The opponents of that principle adopted another plan by which they proposed to abolish the compound householder, and compel everybody to pay his rates personally. That was adopted by the Government, and thus the Bill gave what was practically household suffrage. The Government of that day went out of Office, and the Liberal Party came in. Meanwhile, great dissatisfaction had been felt by the local authorities and the ratepayers at the abolition of the compound householder, and, in 1869, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) introduced his Assessed Rates Bill to supply machinery to remedy the defects which had arisen in England with regard to the registration of voters. That machinery he (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) now proposed should be applied to Ireland. The Assessed Rates Act restored the power of compounding, and, at the same time, secured to the tenant whose rates were paid by the landlord the right to vote; but then came the danger, which had assumed a serious aspect in Ireland, that as a consequence of the local authority coming into contact only with the owner, the occupier would not find his name upon the rate book, and would lose his vote. The Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London provided machinery by which the occupier whose rates were paid by his landlord had secured to him that his name should be placed on the register of voters. That Act was the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 41, and it was meant not merely to meet the case of payment by the owner which arose under the compounding system, but all cases where the owner paid the rates instead of the occupier. If it had been confined to the compound householder, it might have been said that the analogy to the case of Ireland was imperfect; but it went much further, and provided a remedy in all cases where the owner, by agreement, was an occupier, and paid the rates; and when the right of the occupier to appeal upon the list was thereby endangered, Section 7 of the Bill declared that any payment of rates by the occupier, notwithstanding that the amount might be deducted from his rent, and any payment by the owner should be deemed a payment of full rate by the occupier, for the purpose of any qualification for the franchise. By the 8th section, if the owner omitted to pay the rate, the occupier might deduct it from his rent, and Section 9 made the owner liable to a penalty if he failed to give the list of the occupiers to the overseers. The next section provided that notice should be given to the occupier of the rates in arrear, and the 19th, which was the most important, required the overseer to insert the names of all the occupiers in the rate book, which was the foundation of the register of the franchise. Some of the clauses of the Bill were restricted in terms to the compound householders, but these clauses which he proposed to engraft upon the Irish law were perfectly general. He wished by the present Bill to apply the same law to Ireland, and to prevent men whom the law declared to be entitled to the franchise being hindered from getting it in that country through the want of the excellent provisions now contained in the English enactments. He had, therefore, endeavoured in this measure to carry out the principles of the English legislation on that subject. His Bill provided that all poor rates should be deemed to be payable by the actual occupier when made, the immediate lessor, however, where now liable, to continue still to be so; that where the owner omitted to pay the rates, the occupier paying the same should be empowered to deduct the amount from the rent; that every payment of a rate by the occupier, although then deducted, and every payment of a rate by the owner should be a constructive payment by the occupier for the purposes of any rating qualification for the franchise; and that when the rates remained unpaid they should be demanded from the occupiers. Doubts having arisen as to whether occupiers of weekly or monthly

tenements should be entitled to vote, the Bill proposed to enact that such persons were not to be excluded from the franchise. It had been said that these questions of electoral reform were regarded with great apathy by the Irish people; but that was due to a want of belief in the readiness of the House of Commons to comply with their just demands, and they had seen that apathy give way when a question arose which excited strong popular feeling. By passing that measure, the House would do something towards allaying those feelings of apathy and distrust. People in that country would not hold meetings on matters of that kind. They had seen so many Bills thrown out and Petitions rejected, that they did not believe in praying the House for reforms connected with the franchise. Beyond that, he would admit that it was impossible to get up Petitions unless they had a paid and organized body to prepare them. In the case of the constituency he represented, a vacancy occurred, and a candidate of excellent position and ability, and of local connection, was spoken of, and would have been returned, but that a strong voice of popular feeling had sprung into existence, and everybody, voters and non-voters, determined that a man vitally connected with that voice should be returned instead of a member of one of the great English Parties. The hon. and learned Gentleman to whom he referred was, on that occasion, owing to the irresistible force of the popular feeling, returned without opposition; but he had since stood a contest, and been at the head of the poll. It was advisable, on such occasions, to lessen excitement as much as possible, and to encourage strictly constitutional action. That object could be best accomplished by removing the obstacles in the way of hundreds and thousands of men in the towns of Ireland who were legally entitled to be put upon the list of voters, but who were hindered from getting their names upon the register by the difficulties which stood in the way. On very just, reasonable, and constitutional grounds, it was advisable that those difficulties which had been swept away in England should be removed in Ireland also, and, accordingly, he asked the House to agree to the second reading of the Bill which he had brought under their notice.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. O'Shaughnessy.)

MR. MULHOLLAND, in moving, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, that he would not occupy the time of the House very long in showing that it ought to be rejected. He would admit that it had been brought forward in a very moderate way; but, nevertheless, it was very difficult to reconcile some of the statements which had been made with his (Mr. Mulholland's) experience. This question had been brought before the House on several previous occasions, and it had appeared in a different form and under a different name. In the first year of this Parliament, for instance, it came up as a part of the Borough Franchise Bill. That Bill was rejected a week ago. He imagined that the object of bringing forward this Bill at the present time was to get the House to commit itself indirectly to the approval of the principles of the Bill which a week since had been rejected. If that Bill had passed, there would then have been some meaning in producing this Bill; but he contended that with the rejection of the Borough Franchise Bill the necessity for this Bill disappeared. The Mover of this Bill had said that it was intended to remove the disqualifications which existed, and which prevented persons so entitled from being on the register; but, in his (Mr. Mulholland's) opinion, the Bill dealt altogether, from the beginning to the end, with persons not entitled to be on the register; and he entirely denied that there were any persons in Ireland entitled to appear on that register who were prevented from being so by any peculiarities of the law of rating, if they so desired. The Reform Acts of 1867 and 1868 settled the franchise on its present basis. In both of those Acts, the principle by which the borough franchise was regulated in England and Ireland was exactly the same. In both countries that principle was, that the franchise was only to be extended to those who paid the poor rates directly; but there was a radical difference between the Poor Law system of the two countries. In England, the principle of direct personal rating always lay at the foundation of the Poor Law. In Ireland, on the contrary, the large fringe of semi-pauperism which existed was taken into account, and it was felt that it would be absurd to tax, for the support of others, the large class who were themselves bordering on pauperism. A line was therefore drawn below which the occupier of houses should not only not be liable for poor rates, but the landlord was expressly prohibited from recovering them directly or indirectly; and that line was fixed at £4. The legislation of 1867 and 1868 was followed up by registration enactments, which most effectually provided, by officers appointed for the purpose, for the appearance on the rate book in Ireland of the name of every occupier rated at over £4. He denied that there was in Ireland anything approaching to the English system of composition for rates. The circumstances of the two countries in that respect not being at all analogous, they could have no uniformity—any uniformity would be in the letter only and not in the spirit—were they simply to copy the clauses of an Act suitable for England, but wholly unsuitable for Ireland. If the present Bill were passed, it could only apply to occupiers under £4, who were not entitled to the franchise. The Bill had appeared before the House under four different titles—the Borough Franchise Bill, the Voters (Ireland) Bill, the Town Rating Bill, and now the Rating of Towns Bill. Such attempts at concealment of identity looked, to say the least of it, very suspicious. Why should the title be changed on every occasion but to conceal the real character of the Bill? He hoped the House would not allow the law of rating in Ireland to be unsettled—directly, as was attempted by the Bill of last Wednesday, or indirectly, by the present Bill; but that it would adhere to its determination expressed last week, and reject it, in accordance with the Motion he now made.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day six months.”—(Mr. Mulholland.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the hon. Member who had just addressed the House (Mr. Mulholland) had asserted that there was no demand in Ireland for this Bill, and that no persons were deprived of the franchise in consequence of the existing state of the law. For his own part, he was ignorant of the law of Ireland on the subject; but it certainly appeared to him that the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) had made out a prima facie case, which called for a reply. The hon. Member for Downpatrick (Mr. Mulholland) had not supplied any answer; and it was to be regretted that he had not left the opposition, in the first instance, to the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket), who would have informed the House what the law in Ireland really was. Neither could it be said that the hon. Member had displayed any correct knowledge as to what was the law in England under Goschen's Act of 1869. That Act was undoubtedly intended to be of general application, but its operation had practically been limited by the decision of the Court of Common Pleas in the case of “Cross v. Allsop.” In that case, the Act had been held not to be of universal application, but only to apply to the old class of compound householders. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Limerick was, therefore, not right in supposing that the Act of 1869 completely met all the difficulties existing in England, for there were many persons entitled to be on the register in England who were still left out. There was great need for legislation in England to clear up the anomalies that existed on the subject, and if the Government should think it necessary to make any inquiry into the state of things existing in Ireland, he hoped that inquiry would be extended to England also. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick had shown that there was a large class of the poorer rate-payers who in England were enfranchised under Goschen's Act who did not get placed on the register in Ireland. That was a matter which deserved consideration, and he regretted that the Bill intended to deal with the subject had been met by mere opposition.

MR. BRUEN pointed out that the object of the English Act of 1869 was altogether different from that which the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) proposed to attain by this Bill. It had been copied from an English Act, passed to remedy certain grievances, and meant to re-introduce a certain state of things which had before existed in England. On the contrary, such a state of things had never existed in Ireland, and the present Bill was altogether a mistake. Its Preamble stated that it frequently happened that persons entitled to the franchise were practically disfranchised by reason of their names not appearing on the rate book, and the 2nd clause found a remedy for this evil. Now, as a matter of fact, the grievance did not exist, and in every borough in Ireland—except Dublin—in accordance with the provisions of the Poor Law, the rate books had a column in which the name of the occupier was inserted. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick thought that a £4 occupier who was liable to pay rates and who did not pay them should, nevertheless, be allowed to have the franchise. The law was the same in all the Parliamentary cities and boroughs of Ireland, except Dublin. The Parliamentary franchise depended on certain conditions, among which were that a person must have been an occupier for twelve months, of premises rated at a value of more than £4, and it seemed to be assumed by those who copied the Bill from the Act for England, that the occupier was not liable for the rates; but the Irish law made every occupier of premises above £4 rateable value liable to be rated and to pay the rates. In Dublin, however, the law was different, for the Act of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 91, provided that, instead of the rate book in Dublin being made out by the Poor Law authorities, it should be made out by the Collector General of Rates, and also that in the case of all premises between £4 and £8 valuation, the lessor should be rated instead of the occupier. It was said that as far as the poor rates were concerned, this provision had been repealed, and consequently all persons now occupying premises rated above £4 ought to be put on the rate book. He believed, however, that the Collector General, with the best intentions, acted on the opinion that he ought not to put on the rate book weekly and monthly tenants. Whether that was the legal course or not, he would not say; but the result undoubtedly was that in Dublin some persons were not mentioned in the rate book whose names ought to appear there. Still, there was a remedy for this state of things, because the persons aggrieved might claim to be rated and registered, and it could not with justice be said that any person was deprived of the franchise. That point was clearly established by the Committee which, during the last few years, had inquired into the subject of Local Taxation and the Government of Towns in Ireland. The real cause why there existed a discrepancy between the number of persons on the register and the number of tenements was that persons who ought to pay rates neglected to do so. He had an authority for the statement in an editorial article in The Freeman's Journal of June, 1875, calling on the Liberal ratepayers to pay their rates in order not to lose the franchise, and complaining of their scandalous neglect in not thus qualifying themselves. The Freeman's Journal was generally accepted as a fair exponent of public opinion in the Liberal Party, and no doubt the reason for the discrepancy was the true one. With regard to the municipal franchise, the state of affairs was much more complicated; because, in Ireland, there were a great number of different franchises. This subject was under the consideration of a Committee which had been sitting for two years. The labours of that Committee would be brought to a close in the course of a very few days; and he believed the majority, if not the whole of its Members, would report in favour of such an adjustment of the laws as would remove the great differences and discrepancies which at present existed in the municipal franchise in Ireland. With regard to all places in Ireland, except Dublin, there was no ground for the assertion that persons entitled to the municipal franchise were deprived of it by any of the alleged grievances which the present Bill sought to remedy. He desired to call attention to the fact that, with the exception of one or two words, the Bill was precisely the same as another measure—the Voters (Ireland) Bill—which it was proposed to bring under the consideration of the House to-day. This, he maintained, was an evasion of the rule which had been laid down by the Speaker, to the effect that if the same Bill were proposed by two hon. Members, and where both hon. Members put down their names in order to obtain a double chance in the ballot at the commencement of the Session, such a proceeding was not fair to other hon. Members, nor in accordance with the Rules of the House. He submitted that that ruling had been evaded in the present instance.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA rose to Order. He did not think the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Bruen) was in Order in speaking of the merits or demerits of a Bill which was to come on for discussion at a later part of the day.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Bruen) was appealing to the Chair on a point of Order. The hon. Member, as he understood him, had simply called his (Mr. Speaker's) attention to the fact that there were on the Order Book of the Day two Bills which were identically the same. If the statement of the hon. Member for Carlow were accurate, he was bound to say that the proceeding he had described was irregular; and, whatever course the House might take with reference to the present Bill, the other Bill, if in identical terms, should certainly be withdrawn.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, that as far as he was aware, there was no Bill which was identical with the measure now under consideration.

MR. BRUEN said, he had merely drawn attention to the fact that the Bill was substantially the same, with the exception of a few words, as another Bill which stood upon the Paper. He was quite satisfied with the ruling of the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the matter.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, he wished to explain. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlow (Mr. Bruen), regarding the appearance of the two Bills, had very naturally thought that at first sight they raised the supposition that his hon. Friend the Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) and himself had balloted for the purpose of giving themselves a double chance of bringing on the two Bills. He desired to say that they did nothing of the kind. Until to-day he was not aware that the Bill of the hon. Member for Youghal stood on the Order Book. During the last few minutes the hon. Member for Youghal had denied that his Bill was identical with his own, and that was the best proof that there had been no collusion between them, and that there had been no un-Parliamentary arrangement between his hon. Friend and himself. It was a purely accidental coincidence, at which they were both equally surprised.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, that what his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) had stated was perfectly true. When he found that the two measures were nearly identical, he took care that they should both be put down for the same day, so that the House should not be called upon to discuss the same question twice over. Therefore, he and his hon. Friend had done their best to obviate any difficulty which might arise from a certain amount of accidental coincidence. Addressing himself to the Bill now under consideration, undoubtedly it was a Reform Bill in its way, proposing, as it did, to enfranchise large numbers of persons who, if not resident in Ireland, but in England, would enjoy votes; but he contended that it did not attack any principle they were bound to protect. Its object, therefore, must recommend it to the House. If, as had been alleged, it would be practically inoperative because there were no persons who would be enfranchised by its technical provisions, this difficulty might be easily met when the second reading was passed and the Bill got into Committee. He would admit that it was intended to enfranchise a class who were now excluded; but he believed it would be for the interests of the Empire that the class entitled to the franchise should be very considerably enlarged, as it was of advantage to diminish the number of the mob by adding to the number of those entitled to possess civil rights. He denied that those who opposed the Bill were acting in the true interests of the Conservative Party, for it was most desirable to add to the number of those who were interested in the well-being of society. He was not speaking in a Party sense, but in a social and political sense. All persons who had interests at stake in Ireland were Conservative; and, in his opinion, it was the most Conservative principle in the sense in which he spoke, to enlarge the franchise as much as possible, but gradually, and not by taking immense strides any one special time. The Bill was strictly in analogy with the English Reform Bill, and with the Bill of 1869; and, therefore, he would give it his most hearty support.

Mr. Bruen

MR. PLUNKET said, he should not have addressed the House had not a personal reference been made to him by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke), who wished to hear from him (Mr. Plunket) a statement as to the law in Ireland on this subject. He had only to say, in reply, that he entirely endorsed the explanation of the Irish law as laid down by the hon. Member for Downpatrick (Mr. Mulholland). He must congratulate the hon. and learned Gentleman the junior Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) on the clearness with which he had stated his case; but there was one part of it which he had not made out. His hon. and learned Friend had not shown what was the necessity for coming to the House in such hot haste on this subject—and that not with one Bill, but with two Bills almost identical. It could not be maintained that there had been a single Petition, one public meeting, or any strong expression of opinion through the ordinary channels in favour of the Bill. The House deserved some explanation beyond what had been given for these two Bills being on the Paper to-day. On the back of both Bills was the name of the hon. and learned Gentleman the senior Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt); and though he (Mr. Plunket) might acquit the hon. Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) of wilfully disregarding the Rules of the House, on the ground alleged by him that he was not aware that the two Bills were the same, or, he supposed, of the contents of either of them, he could not so easily acquit his hon. and learned Friend the senior Member for Limerick. All he could say was that there must be wheels within wheels in the management under which the Irish Members prepared their annual bundle of Bills and placed them in the Order Book of the House; there must be transactions behind the scenes; and there must be a kind of vicarious representation in the fathering of these measures when two Bills were hurled at the head of the House of Commons, identically the same over five or six pages of print, on the same Wednesday. And now a word as to the necessity for the Bill. He did not dispute that, if Parliament had seen fit to sanction household suffrage for Ireland, there would have been a strong case why a Statute affecting rating in Ireland should be passed analogous to the Act of 1869. But the promoters of the Bill had not proved their case. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick was not able to establish any analogy between the case of Ireland, where persons rated under £4 were not entitled to the franchise, and that of England, where there was household suffrage. The whole matter had been considered in 1868, and there were then found sufficient grounds why the franchise in both countries should be placed on a different footing. Not only was the question with which the Bill, so far as it related to the city of Dublin, dealt under the consideration of a Committee upstairs, but a case was pending in the Law Courts in Dublin, in which it would probably receive a legal decision; and he did not think that the House should be called upon to anticipate one way or the other the conclusions which might thus be arrived at. The only object of this Bill was to do that which the House refused to do last Wednesday—namely, to enlarge the borough franchise in Ireland. As no case had been made out for the Bill, he would support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Downpatrick.

MR. MELDON said, it had been stated by an hon. Member on the other side of the House that mis-statements had been made—no doubt, unintentionally—in regard to matters of fact, by hon. Members supporting the Bill. He (Mr. Meldon) must equally protest against the misrepresentations which had been made by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin as to their intentions of promoting the Bill. It was not fair that an Irish Member should stand up and say that the effect of passing a certain measure would be to enlarge the borough franchise, or in any way to carry out the intention of the Borough Franchise Bill which was discussed last Wednesday. He wished it to be distinctly understood that this Bill would not enlarge the franchise to the extent of giving a single man a vote who was not entitled to it at the present moment, and he hoped such a misstatement would not be repeated. That was not the object of the Bill, and the result of passing it would be to leave the law where it was at the present moment. He must admit that if the argument of the hon. Member for Downpatrick (Mr. Mulholland) was a sound one, the objections he had urged to the Bill would be very formidable, if not fatal. His statement was that the right hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen's) Bill, of 1869, was intended to apply to the case of the compound householders in Ireland. He (Mr. Meldon) emphatically said that was not so. That Bill was intended to deal with two different classes of ratepayers. It dealt, in the first place, with the compound householder, and was intended to deal with the owners who made agreements with the overseers to pay the rates and get certain allowances for the payment of such rates; but it also was intended to deal with those occupiers who made agreements with the owners that the owners should pay rates. There were no compound householders in Ireland, and they only sought to extend the provisions of the English Acts which applied to other ratepayers outside of the compound householders. They wished to have the law remedied in such a way as to insure that, in cases where the value of the premises was over £4, the occupiers should appear on the rate books. Thus it would only affect those persons whom that law declared to be entitled to the franchise. In the rate books there was a column which ought to be filled up with the name of the occupier; but, as a matter of fact, the Guardians, or those who prepared the rate books, did not see that the column was properly filled up. In a recent election in Dublin for Poor Law Guardians, no less than 300 proxy papers were returned by occupiers who were entitled to the Parliamentary franchise, and every one was rejected, because the name of the persons actually in occupation did not appear on the rate books at all. The measure would not extend the franchise beyond the area of those now entitled to it. It simply provided, by one of its clauses, that the Guardians should be bound to see that the names of the occupiers were inserted in the column provided for the purpose in the existing rate books, under certain penalties as the result of non-compliance with the regulation. Three of the other clauses of the Bill were merely declaratory of what the law in Ireland really was. There was no earthly reason why this act of justice to the whole of Ireland should not be passed, except that a certain class of occupiers in Dublin who were already entitled to the franchise would be admitted to it without inflicting injury upon anyone, and it might be the fears of certain hon. Members who chose to assume that their seats would be endangered. The only other effect of the measure would be to facilitate the collection of rates.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, that, looking at this measure, the practical effect of its adoption would be to call upon the owners of tenements in every borough and city in Ireland to pay the rates; while, at the same time, the several franchises would thus be given to the occupiers. He did not say the Parliamentary or municipal franchise, but any franchise that might arise as a consequence of paying rates. Surely, if there were any force in the old adage, that taxation and representation ought to go together, this Bill would cut at the very root of such an arrangement. The measure was very much too wide and sweeping in its character, and, if adopted, would, practically, end in the enfranchisement of every single tenant throughout Ireland for every possible purpose, whether he personally paid a single farthing or not, either to the local burdens or to the Imperial Exchequer. Look at the 6th clause of the Bill, which attempted to provide that—

“Every payment of a rate by the occupier, notwithstanding that the amount thereof may be deducted from his rent, as herein provided”—[that is, by the tenant from his landlord]—“and every payment of a rate by the owner, whether he is himself rated or is liable to pay the same, or has agreed with the occupier to pay it, shall be deemed a payment of the rate by the occupier for the purpose of any qualification which, as regards rating, depends upon the payment of the poor rate.”

A provision which might be broadly said to be without limitation. Hon. Members—if he might venture to say so—took an erroneous view of this question, when they said that there was any analogy between the present state of affairs in England and that sought to be initiated by this Bill with regard to Ireland. As he (Mr. Wheelhouse) understood English legislation on this subject, it was, that where there was any occupation whatever conferring the franchise, the person occupying should be called on to pay the rates, if, as the consequence, or, as he might almost term it, the reward, for the payment of the rates, he received the franchise. It had been said that in Dublin 1,000 votes were lost last year, and that the present Bill would remedy this state of things. If the overseers, or county clerks, or officers, did not now do their duty, had they any reason to suppose that they would perform that duty, even though the non-performance was to be followed by a penalty? While he did not believe very much, if at all, in penalties in regard to civil legislation, and especially for such a purpose as this, he would ask, what were the agents of the several parties about to allow of such a large leakage? But, however that might be, surely the Legislature was not to be blamed, because some overseers had not seen fit to do their duty. If such a state of matters did exist, would it be very difficult to obtain, from the Government for the time being in Ireland, some such order as would be issued, under similar circumstances, from the English Local Government Board, compelling the overseers, or others charged with the duty entrusted to them, to carry it out, and to enter the necessary information on the books. Again, they had been told that the Bill was to be of no earthly service in reference to the franchise, and that it would not enfranchise one single individual. If not, why was it brought in, and pressed forward? The truth was, he could not agree with that idea, and he hoped the measure would not be accepted by the House. What was the object the promoters had in view? If, as he apprehended, it was to give any franchise to those who, according to his contention, had no right to receive and exercise it, then it was not merely useless, but it was one which ought not to be allowed to pass. Looking at it from every point of view, it was absolutely incorrect to allege that there was any analogy between the legislation now proposed and that which affected England at this moment. Surely, it could not be at all successfully contended that the Bill had no object whatever in view? If it were thought desirable to remove some anomalies which affected the city of Dublin, that might be done by a short Local Bill; but to attempt to legislate for the whole of Ireland, merely because something might demand a local remedy in the Metropolis, was to ask for far more than was reasonable; and he could not help repeating that, so far as he could see, the main, if not the only, object of this Bill was to confer some franchise, generally, upon those who ought not to have it, and he, therefore, must oppose the measure.

MR. LAW said, he had listened with attention to the observations of the hon. and learned Member who had just spoken (Mr. Wheelhouse), but must say that he had heard no argument which, in his opinion, should induce the House to reject the measure. He believed that the Bill would redress a substantial grievance, and enable a number of householders to appear upon the register who, as the law now stood, although really entitled to the franchise, did not enjoy it. By the 1st clause it was proposed that the local Poor Law authorities should be forced, by the imposition of a penalty, to insert the name of every occupier in the rate book; as they were already directed to do. The hon. and learned Member for Leeds said that this duty was either a right thing to enforce, or it was not. If it were a right thing to enforce, as the promoters of this Bill contended, why, he asked, was it not done? Well, the answer was, because there were no adequate or ready means of enforcing the duty. The hon. and learned Member, however, protested against there being any efficacy in a penalty. Now, there he (Mr. Law) ventured to differ altogether from his hon. and learned Friend. Let the House just consider the matter for a moment. By the law, as it now stood in Ireland, and as it did stand in England prior to the Act of 1869, it was the duty of the local Poor Law authorities to insert the name of the occupier in a column of the rate book specially provided for that purpose. It was a duty cast upon the overseers in England, as it was on the Guardians in Ireland; but, like many other duties nominally imposed by the law, there were no ready means of enforcing it. Accordingly, in England, when the occupation franchise became a substantial question after the passing of the Reform Act of 1867, and it was found at the end of the next year that the obligation to fill in the name of the occupier was, in many instances, not performed, the Legislature immediately provided, by the 19th section of the Act of 1869, that a penalty of 40s. for every name omitted should be imposed on the local authorities who did not in this respect perform their duty. Now, unlike the hon. and learned Member for Leeds, he (Mr. Law) had great faith in the persuasive efficacy of a penalty like that in making officials do their duty. If, as suggested, it would be of no value in Ireland, why, he (Mr. Law) asked, was such a provision made for England; and that, as he was told, without a dissentient voice? It evidently was thought by Parliament that here, at least, it would be desirable to impose a penalty on such overseers as did not perform their duty; and was it a very extravagant thing on the part of Irish Members to ask that the same means should be tried in Ireland in order to insure that the name of the occupier, which ought to be on the rate book, should appear there? The next clause of the Bill proposed to give certain facilities for the performance of this duty—facilities which were provided in England but not in Ireland—by requiring the owners of houses who paid the rates to furnish the guardians with the names of the occupiers, in order that the rate book might be completed. In other words, the object of the clause was to assist the local authorities towards doing their duty by furnishing them with the means of inserting on the rate book the names which everybody admitted ought to be there. But then the hon. and learned Member for Leeds made a sweeping assertion in regard to the 6th clause, which dealt with the constructive payment of rates. He said this clause would have the effect of giving the franchise to a great number of persons who otherwise would not be entitled to it. If he (Mr. Law) thought that such would be its effect, he would not regard the measure as entitled to the same favourable consideration from the House as he now submitted it was; for hon. Members might not unnaturally think that any extension of the franchise under which they were elected should be proposed as a distinct and substantive measure. But, in the first place, the Preamble of the Bill showed that it proposed to deal only with those already entitled to the franchise, whilst its promoters disclaimed having any such object as the hon. and learned Gentleman would impute to them; and, in the next place, he (Mr. Law) failed to see that the clause in question would have the effect alleged.

Mr. Law

He ventured, indeed, to doubt whether the hon. and learned Member for Leeds had read the clause, or, at least, whether he had compared it with the clause in the English Act, from which it had been copied. It merely sought to provide that the occupier, who was otherwise qualified to have a vote, should be entitled thereto whether he or his landlord paid the rates. It was taken, in fact, word for word from the 7th clause of the English Act of 1869; and he (Mr. Law) asked if it were contended that that clause of the English Act had entitled a number of persons to the franchise who would not otherwise be entitled to it? Surely his hon. and learned Friend would not insist that by the operation of that clause the constituency of Leeds, for example, had been spoiled; and, if not, why should he make the corresponding clause of this Bill the ground of this argument for the total rejection of the measure? Again, a further clause proposed to provide that, instead of general notice posted up somewhere in the town and calling on all occupiers to pay their rates, a special notice should be sent to each person as required here by the 28th section of the Representation of the People Act of 1867. One general notice was originally thought sufficient in England, and, accordingly, having been prescribed by the English Registration Act of 1843, a similar provision was inserted in the Irish Registration Act of 1850. In England, however, experience showed that this general notice was insufficient for its purpose; and, therefore, a separate personal notice to each rated occupier was required by the Act of 1867. And now, when it was proposed to make a similar improvement in the law relating to the Registration of Voters in Ireland, by copying the latest provision of the English law on the subject, hon. and learned Members opposite objected to such a measure. Did it not, then, in effect, come to this—that, whereas in England everything was done to facilitate the enjoyment of the franchise by all those who were really entitled to it, yet, in the case of Ireland, it was sought to withhold all such facilities? Was that, he (Mr. Law) would earnestly ask, a wise, or expedient, or a just course to pursue? He could not, he confessed, see any reasonableness in the objections to the Bill which had been presented to the House. The measure, if passed, consequence, or, as he might almost term it, the reward, for the payment of the rates, he received the franchise. It had been said that in Dublin 1,000 votes were lost last year, and that the present Bill would remedy this state of things. If the overseers, or county clerks, or officers, did not now do their duty, had they any reason to suppose that they would perform that duty, even though the non-performance was to be followed by a penalty? While he did not believe very much, if at all, in penalties in regard to civil legislation, and especially for such a purpose as this, he would ask, what were the agents of the several parties about to allow of such a large leakage? Mr. LAW said, he had listened with attention to the observations of the hon. and learned Member who had just spoken (Mr. Wheelhouse), but must say that he had heard no argument which, in his opinion, should induce the House to reject the measure. He believed that the Bill would redress a substantial grievance, and enable a number of householders to appear upon the register who, as the law now stood, although really entitled to the franchise, did not enjoy it. Well, the answer was, because there were no adequate or ready means of enforcing the duty. The hon. and learned Member, however, protested against there being any efficacy in a penalty. Now, there he (Mr. Law) ventured to differ altogether from his hon. and learned Friend. Let the House just consider the matter for a moment. the House would not give it a second reading. He could not support a Bill which would confer on a class who could not afford to pay taxes the right of exercising the franchise.

MR. MURPHY supported the Bill, remarking that the cardinal principle of the Bill of 1868 was that every possible facility should be given to enable electors to be placed on the register with as little trouble as possible. The executive officials had failed to carry out that Act, and the present Bill was to give facilities for the carrying out of the intentions of the Legislature when they passed the Bill of 1868. Either a man was entitled to be on the register, or he was not. If he had a title to the franchise, it was very requisite that he should be placed on the register with as little inconvenience as possible. At every registration there were many Party contests, owing to the neglect of officers to furnish complete lists, the persons whose names were omitted having to establish their claims at their own expense. In this respect, the machinery of the Reform Bill was not self-acting, as it was intended to be, and the objections of the last speaker to an extension of the franchise did not apply to the Bill, because it would affect only those whom Parliament had intended to enjoy the existing franchise.

MR. O'CLERY refuted the statements of the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney), who had hinted, as his great reason for opposing the Bill, that he feared a spreading of Communistic principles amongst the people. The hon. Member for Tyrone had over and over again in that House struck against his own country—he would not say his own people, because they were not his people—but he never struck at them more keenly than he had done now—

MR. MACARTNEY: I rise to Order. Is an hon. Member entitled to say of another hon. Member — “He has often struck against his own country—I will not say his own people?”

MR. O'CLERY went on to say that Ireland needed no defence against charges of Communism and revolution, as there was no country in the world which had evinced a greater spirit of hostility to anything like Continental Communism than Ireland. The National Members in that House were very often met by the remark — “Oh, we intend to give you local government.” This was a Bill which aimed at local government in the direction of an extension of the franchise, yet Parliament evinced no desire to give it a second reading.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that before the House was called upon to make an alteration in the law, the necessity for that alteration ought to be clearly proved, but he felt justified in saying that no proof had been given of there being any strong feeling in Ireland in favour of a measure of this kind. It had been said that the Act known as Goschen's Act, passed in 1869, conferred upon occupiers in England privileges from which similar occupiers in Ireland were debarred. The hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) stated, as his reason for supporting the Bill, that he was desirous to concede to Ireland the privileges accorded to England; and it seemed that this argument did no doubt influence a great number of hon. Members on the other side of the House, so that week after week they had Bills brought on ostensibly with the object of assimilating the law of Ireland to that in England. No doubt, that was a plausible ground on which to obtain the support of hon. Gentlemen representing Liberal constituencies in England. He knew, indeed, that many hon. Members opposite had intimated their intention to support all Irish measures framed in that spirit; but he thought it would be only right to consider whether the circumstances of the two countries were identical in respect to the matter with regard to which it was proposed to legislate. It was customary on other occasions to say that Ireland was so different a country from England that legislation must proceed with the two countries in quite different directions. Irish Members were constantly telling the House that it was unfair and unstatesmanlike to judge Irish questions from an English point of view. They were constantly informing the House that Irish matters must be judged from a standpoint of their own. If that were so, then before Irish Members could come to that House and ask them to extend to Ireland the legislation for England, they must show the House, as had been pointed out by his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland, that the state of circumstances in the two countries was the same. Now, it seemed to him that the argument of his hon. Friend the Member for Downpatrick (Mr. Mulholland), showed that this was not so in the present case. His hon. Friend had stated that there was no substantial grievance, and that no person in Ireland was debarred from the franchise by the state of the law applicable to rating. Now, he (Mr. Lowther) did not want to open up the compound householder question, because he agreed with hon. Members in deprecating obstruction to the acquisition of the franchise by what he had, in 1867, in this House ventured to stigmatize as the miserable ventured technicalities of rating. He had always said that if a voter were entitled to the franchise, he should have his right in full, and should not be shut out by a side-wind. He did not go back from that; and if hon. Gentlemen could prove that ratepayers entitled to the franchise were debarred by technicalities, that might make out a case for the Bill which had not hitherto been done. Clause 6 of the Bill certainly went far beyond its avowed object. He certainly hoped that the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) would be prepared with some answer to the case that had been made on that point; but he (Mr. Lowther) thought that he was justified in saying that the law in Ireland in regard to rating was essentially different to that in England, and that the circumstances which rendered it necessary to pass the English Act of 1869 did not exist in Ireland. Therefore, the somewhat plausible pretext argued in favour of the Bill, that they ought to extend to Ireland the law already existing in England, did not hold good. He hoped the House would not be led into another of these Reform Bills for Ireland—of which they had already had too many samples. They had disposed last week of what might be called the head of this question—the main measure. They had determined that the question of Parliamentary Reform, as far as Ireland was concerned, was not ripe for discussion, and he therefore hoped that the House would not assent to the Bill.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY, in reply, said, that the object of the Bill was not an alteration of the law, so as to extend the franchise in Ireland, but to give the vote to those who were at present entitled to it, but who were now prevented from obtaining it by the law of rating; and what the right hon. Gentleman said virtually was, that Irish voters should not be enabled to exercise the franchise nominally conferred upon them by the Act of 1869. He must say that the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman seemed to be dictated by a regard to what the Government considered a wise economy of the time of the House than by a regard for the merits of the Bill. The Returns which he (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) had cited proved conclusively that persons at present entitled to the franchise in Ireland were excluded by the law of rating as it stood at present, the number in Dublin alone being 1,500. The first three clauses were absolutely requisite to give the same facilities for the acquisition of the franchise in Ireland as existed in England; but he should not object to the omission of the 4th and 5th clauses.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS REPEAL BILL—[BILL 59.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HOPWOOD: Mr. Speaker, I have a Petition to present from certain Ministers of the Church of England, and of various Denominations in Portsmouth, calling attention to statements made in the Report of the police charged with carrying out the provisions of the Contagious Diseases Acts in that town, and the surrounding district. The Petitioners allege that the police have stated in their Report that only 11 prostitutes under the age of 17 are to be found in those places, and that there is only a gross total of 530 of all ages plying their avocation therein. To that statement the Petitioners desire to give their unqualified denial, and to state that, in their view, the Contagious Diseases Acts have a debasing and hardening effect on the women who are submitted to their operation, and they pray that the House will forthwith repeal those Acts.

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE, in rising to move that the Bill be now read the second time, said: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the House—

MR. CHILDERS: Before the hon. Baronet addresses the House, perhaps I may be allowed to interpose by presenting a somewhat remarkable series of Petitions, with which I have been entrusted, on the subject of this Bill. These Petitions, Sir, are exactly 100 in number, and in them are embodied the views of gentlemen of all kinds of professions. They are signed by 446 clergymen resident in London, by the Cardinal Archbishop, and 116 of the Roman Catholic clergy; by 109 resident members of the Colleges in Oxford, by the Provost and Fellows of Eton, by Professors and others at Cambridge, by 303 barristers-at-law, by medical officers of health, by surgeons, and by other professional men in the country; and their prayer is, that the law may be so amended that a wilful communication of contagious disease may be met by penal consequences.

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE: I can assure the House that it was not from any want of interest in the subject, or lack of conviction as to the objectionable nature of the Acts we are now to discuss, that I refrained last year from bringing the matter under the attention of the House. The attention of those outside the House is steadily increasing with regard to the subject. I am aware that it has been stated that it is easy to manufacture Petitions; but it is evident that the Petition which I have had the honour to present from nearly 114,000 women, does to a great extent testify to the increasing interest taken in the subject, not only by the lower classes in the country, but by those who are in a position above them. The Petition is signed by such ladies as Miss Florence Nightingale, Mrs. Grote, and Mrs. Butler; and, although it may be the fashion of this House to sneer at those women who have deliberately put themselves in a position very painful often to themselves and their relatives, I am bound to say that I consider the extreme necessity of repealing the Acts justifies the line of conduct they have taken. I feel now, that as time is limited, it is impossible for us to expect a full discussion or a division on this question, so that I must ask the House to bear with me at the outset whilst I briefly refer to the last Returns which have been obtained from the Government with regard to the working of the Acts in the several places where they are at present in operation. I had the honour last year of moving for a Return showing the number of cases of disease in Her Majesty's ships and vessels stationed at certain of the Home ports. That Return I have obtained, and if the House will give me its attention for a few minutes, I think I shall be able to show that, as far as concerns the complement of men, a fair comparison can be obtained between ships in the same port, but that it is impossible to say that the Contagious Diseases Acts have produced the effect claimed for them. As to the comparison instituted in this Return between ships in the ports where the Acts are in operation and ships in the ports where they are not, the comparison is not such as any statistician, or any man acquainted with figures, would dream of accepting, because the conclusions are not founded upon any proper method of taking Returns such as we desire. I am ready to state all these facts, if it is necessary, before another Commission or Select Committee; and I will undertake to say that no statistician in Europe, looking at the figures side by side, would ever admit that they bear the interpretation which the Government officials have put upon them. I know there are many hon. Gentlemen in this House who say—"If you could convince us that those Acts are doing no good, we might be disposed to listen to your arguments;" but I do not base my arguments entirely upon Returns. I believe there are greater arguments to be adduced with regard to this question; but to repeat them at this hour would be, I conceive, trifling with the temper of the House, and, therefore, I must confine myself within as brief a compass as possible. With regard to these Returns, I may state that the Government selected their own ports. They did not take the ports which might have been taken, but they took the ports of Dartmouth—with its steady-going Britannia—Plymouth, Portsmouth, Queenstown, and Southampton, as their typical cases; and they compare with Dartmouth and Southampton places like Greenock, Hull, Dublin, Leith, and Liverpool; and I think that everybody will at once see that such a comparison is not founded upon anything like a strict equality of circumstances. Let me take the place of Plymouth alone; and I think I shall be able to show the House, in a few sentences, that, as in the case of different regiments to be found in the Government service at Aldershot, so in the large ports in the Kingdom are there circumstances attaching to each particular vessel, which indicate the existence of the disease year after year, and which the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts does not affect. I will take two ships which, for a time, belonged to the same port. They had the same complement of men, and, in other respects, might be fairly compared. Now, I can show the House that, since 1860 down to the present time, there were continuous circumstances affecting these vessels, which can leave no doubt whatever in the mind of any reasonable man that very much depends upon character, that the disease cannot be looked for like any other ordinary disease that lurks in the hold of the ship, but that the cause of its existence is to be found in the character of the men, as much in the sailors on board a ship as in the soldiers belonging to any regiment in Her Majesty's Service. Now, I will take the Returns as far as Plymouth is concerned. In 1860 there were two ships there, the Royal Adelaide and Wellington, their complement of men was almost the same—namely, 515 and 565; but disease in the Royal Adelaide was 78, in the Wellington 30. Then I will take the year 1861, and the ships Royal Adelaide and Impregnable. The Royal Adelaide had a complement of 600, and the Impregnable a complement of 615. The Royal Adelaide was distinguished for the number of her men who were diseased; the number amounted to 96, while those on the Impregnable were only 30. Then I will take 1862, and I find that the cases belonging to the Impregnable were reduced to 8, whilst those of the Royal Adelaide were no fewer than 226. This shows how disease was of a continuous character on board that unfortunate ship. Then I will take 1863, and the ship Canopus. Compared with the Royal Adelaide, the Canopus had a less complement of men, and yet the number of her men who were invalided by disease was 132, and the Implacable, which had the same complement as the Royal Adelaide, had but 5 men diseased, and the Royal Adelaide 114 men in that condition.

Notice being taken, That Strangers were present.—(Mr. Arthur Moore.)

MR. SPEAKER stated, that it was his intention to follow the course which he had previously taken on similar occasions, and forthwith put the Question, "That Strangers be ordered to withdraw?"—The House proceeded to a Division, whereupon Mr. Speaker called upon Mr. Arthur Moore to name a second Teller for the Ayes.—The honourable Member having stated that he was unable to do so, Mr. Speaker declared that the Noes had it.

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE: I now venture to compare, from the figures for the year 1864, the Cambridge and Indus. The Cambridge was a ship with a smaller complement of men, but yet disease in the Cambridge was as 98 compared with 102 in the Indus, a ship with 40 per cent more men. Before and after the Acts were put in force at Plymouth, the disease in the Royal Adelaide decreased from 114 in 1863 to 41 in 1864 (before the Acts), down to 12 in 1868 (after the Acts); but increased again in 1869 to 36, in 1870 to 144, in 1871 to 248, with 30 per cent larger complement of men, and with 90 per cent more disease. I might go through a series of years, and give the House other comparisons with regard to ships. There is no inflexible law, and you never can depend upon any ships having other than a varying character, owing to the character of their crews; but, in these particular Returns, certain vessels are selected as under the Acts which are really out of the category of those which have disorderly and immoral crews. There is one ship which has notoriously a crew of married men; it is the Victoria and Albert, and is taken alongside of the Asia, and Duke of Wellington, and it certainly is most improper that this ship should be selected by reasonable men as a typical ship. I might say the same of the Britannia, quartered in 1870 at Dartmouth, with its regular complement of trained men, which could not be affected by the same circumstances that affect the average of disease in other places. If we are to have Returns such as these, I would rather argue the question before the Statistical Society than before the House of Commons. I know there are some hon. Members who accept all these Returns as facts; as records and tables drawn up by gentlemen in whom implicit confidence should be placed; but I maintain that, although the authenticity of the figures cannot be disputed, in some respects they do not show any connection between the Acts and the absence or presence of disease, or prove conclusively that the operations of the Acts are to be relied upon as sure to produce good sanitary results. With regard to the Army Return, which was delivered this morning, I have also a word to say. There has not been much time to analyze it. I have had some little opportunity of perusing it, but not so much as I should have liked. From what I have seen of it, I must say that it will not bear examination. The stations brought under the Acts, and certain stations not under the Acts, are compared, but not station with station; so that it is impossible to obtain anything like an authoritative percentage from the figures. I know that this is a dry matter, and not of a kind to be brought before the House at this hour of the Sitting, but a great deal of unpleasant feeling has been aroused in the towns where the Acts are in operation, and my object in speaking of the Return just now is, to show to the House that the figures so entirely mix up one station with another of an entirely different character, that it is impossible, on the face of it, to accept the figures for one moment as correct. For instance, in the Army Report, all the stations under the Acts are taken, but only some stations not under the Acts are selected for comparison with them, and if the average amount of disease at all stations is really reckoned, the Government statistics are wrong to the extent of 25 per cent. So much for their statistical value! Then, I wish to mention to the House that the Army doctors themselves have admitted in former Returns—namely, in their Reports of 1873 and of 1875 and 1876, this important fact, which makes those Returns of no value whatever. They admitted that, in 1873, during Mr. Cardwell's time, a new Army Warrant was issued—which punished men for being diseased and thus induced them to conceal it—under which a state of things sprang up such as invalidated all statistics of disease from that time. I maintain that these Returns are too apt to mislead, as, being stamped with the sign of officialism, they are really taken and accepted as correct by people living in the country. I am ready to lay these figures before a Select Committee of this House, and I will pin my faith to this—that they are not reliable as Government statistics, and they will be disproved at some future period. There is an impression amongst the Members of this House, owing to the weight and strength which is accorded to a Government Return, that the Home Office statistics also are most reliable—

MR. A. MOORE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to Order. I beg to ask if it is competent for a Member to move that the Ladies' Gallery be cleared?

MR. SPEAKER: That is a matter for the House itself to decide; the Gallery is open for ladies, and they are admitted by the order of Members of the House. If any Members of this House have given orders for the admission of ladies to the Gallery, I am not at liberty to interfere with those orders without the consent of the House itself. I wish to point out that the course I have formerly taken, when this question has been brought on, has been to desire the attendant to intimate to ladies who may present themselves for admission, that a discussion of a delicate question is likely to take place, and to put it to them whether they desired to remain or not. I was not aware, indeed, I did not believe, that this Bill would come on to-day. Had I thought so, I should have taken that course on the present occasion. ["Move!"]

MR. A. MOORE: I beg to move that the Ladies' Gallery be cleared.

MR. C. S. PARKER: I ask, Sir, if it is competent for an hon. Member to move that when another Motion is before the House?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member proposes by his Motion to set aside one of the Regulations of the House, and I should not be justified in putting a Motion of that character to the House without Notice.

Sir Harcourt Johnstone

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE: The House will observe——

MR. A. MOORE: I beg, Sir, to draw your attention to the fact that there are Strangers in the House.

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE: However desirable this interruption may be in the minds of some hon. Members, there is little time——

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Member for Clonmel that he has already taken that course; the decision of the House has been distinctly declared; and in taking that course a second time he is, I think, trifling with the House.

MR. A. MOORE: It is not my custom to trifle with the dignity of the House at any time, much less is it my wish to do so on the present occasion; but I feel——

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Member that he is not in Order.

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE: Sir, I am anxious to say a few words on the subject of the Home Office Returns. The Home Office Returns for years past have been framed on a well-known form. They show that the Metropolitan Police are employed at stations under the Act, and that marvellous power is given to them by the law. I find, to my astonishment, that, year after year, the Metropolitan Police—admirable as they are in keeping order in London—are employed by the State in towns and municipal boroughs, to do that which municipal authorities can do without their aid. We are told that in some of those towns the efforts of the police have been so effectual that they have succeeded in “doing away with numbers of houses of ill-fame” by virtue of the Acts! It would seem from the Reports that the police were competent, not only to suppress brothels, but to reclaim unfortunate women who have strayed from virtue into vice. There are many towns in this Kingdom, especially in the North of England, which protest against these Acts. I am bound to say that their very introduction was a direct interference with the powers and privileges of municipal authorities, and no step has been taken more objectionable than that of allowing the central police to administer the law where there is already local government, administered by and responsible to local authority. The idea of the police being made the special guardians of public morality is of itself so absurd, and the result of their efforts so often contradicted by the officers of the Rescue Society itself, that I need not trouble you with any more remarks upon it at this time. With regard to the diminution of brothels, important evidence was given before the Irish Sunday Closing Committee, last year. It came out that, in the City of Glasgow, where they had no Metropolitan Police, the authorities had succeeded in reducing the number of houses of ill-fame from 204 in the year 1874, to 38 or thereabouts in 1876. Therefore, the argument that the Metropolitan Police alone are doing the work, ought to disappear. With respect to the number of women who are reclaimed and go back to their friends, I should like to know how the police can tell that they go back? How can any man in his senses accept such a statement as that? Many of these women go about with regiments, and how can the police tell always where they live? It is likely enough that, in many cases, women take themselves off, disgusted with the operations of the Act, to another part of the world, and that when they are missed it is assumed by the police that they have gone back to their friends. I think such statistics as are here given ought to be left out of the Government Returns, as they are calculated to mislead from the weight of the authority that is given to them. Then, with regard to another remarkable body of statistics which have been brought forward, showing that in some large towns and cities there was a considerable amount of disease in consequence of their not being protected districts—a larger amount than was to be found in places which were protected. I will give you an instance. There are several regiments quartered in London, comprising sometimes as many as 7,000 men. I will take the Horse and Foot Guards. It is not for me to say which of these regiments does or does not consort with the less degraded class of women; but it is a fact that there is always more disease among the Foot Guards than there is in the Household Cavalry, taking man for man, quartered at the same stations. The Returns of the averages of disease per 1,000 men of the Household Cavalry was only 48 per 1,000, while among the Foot Guards it was 162 per 1,000, from 1867 to 1872 inclusive. Therefore, I say that, as in the case of ships, so it is with the Army. The surgeons at Aldershot affirm that disease varies in certain regiments, so in London one of the regiments may have 20 men diseased, whilst another has 80. This is not an isolated typical case of one particular year, but it goes on year after year; for it is the character of the men, or the accident of consorting with the lower order of women, that really influences these Returns. Now, I want to say a few words to my Friends above the Gangway, who are difficult to convince. They go down to Plymouth or Devonport, or the nice little Cathedral City of Winchester, or Chatham, and Rochester, and are told by those who advocate the Acts that they are doing a great deal of good. I will ask any hon. Gentleman to go to Paris—as I myself did a fortnight ago—and judge for himself from what he will see there. In the most outwardly respectable City on the face of the earth, they will find none of that solicitation which more or less prevails in a free City like London, and yet there is more vice and more disease. Go to Hamburg and Stockholm, where this system of legalized prostitution has been carried on for many years, and you will find that the amount of disease is infinitely greater than in a place like London which is unprotected. There were many medical men examined before the Royal Commission; and, considering the statements that they made, I am only astonished that the Commissioners had the courage to make the recommendations that they did. I want to point out that the Royal Commissioners sat eight years ago, and that, since they reported on the matter, nothing, or next to nothing, has been done in the direction that I am now advocating. There was some distinct recommendations which nobody could overlook, and made, too, by Gentlemen who are still Members of this House, and whom the House would like to hear. These recommendations are towards the end of the Report, and the first recommendation amongst many was this—“That the periodical examination of public women be discontinued.” We are now in the year 1878. That Report was addressed to this House and to this country, and I am bound to say that, considering our own Friends were in Office for some time after that Report was issued, and considering that hon. Gentlemen opposite have been in power all these years, I think it is not creditable to either Government that there should not have been some notice taken of that recommendation. I know that in the time of the Liberal Government there was a Bill introduced; but, through lack of time or some other cause, it was found impossible to proceed with it. But, at all events, things do not grow better by being kept on too long; and if this is a disagreeable subject, and distasteful to the Conservative Government, I would recommend them, while there is yet time, to grant a further inquiry; because a further inquiry I am convinced there ought to be. Now, as to this charge of fanaticism that has been brought against us. I have been connected myself with many practical works, and I do not think that I have been a fanatic. I have a very great regard for the exact sciences, and especially for figures, and I am not easily influenced by varnished statements calculated to mislead. I will say no more about myself; but I will rely upon four or five typical men who gave evidence before the Royal Commission in favour of the repeal of these Acts. I will take a man like John Stuart Mill, or Professor Maurice. [Cries of “Oh, oh!”] Well, then, I will take the evidence of an honoured man like Mr. Henley. Mr. Henley was one of those old-fashioned Gentlemen who are rather out of date. In the House of Commons there used to be a great many men of that kind 25 years ago; but I am afraid that they may soon become as extinct as the dodo. But between the years 1870 and 1876, that right hon. Gentleman never lost an opportunity of denouncing these Acts. I will not trouble the House with extracts at this time of the day; but one comes to my mind which I will give to the House. In speaking of these Acts, and, speaking of the relative positions of the men and the women, he says—

“It is long since I looked into any matter of heathen ethics (the Prime Minister will correct me if I am wrong), but I do not think ‘that in any system of heathen ethics’ you can find that those who tempt are less blameable than those who are tempted.”

That is the opinion of many of us to-day. If you are to carry out the system to its legitimate conclusion, you have no alternative left but to allow the medical men to examine all the men as well as all the women. It is not only a question between the men and the women, but it is rapidly becoming a question in this country and outside this country, whether it is not a case of the rich against the poor? In this particular case, the working-classes of this country are beginning to find out that these Acts are specially levelled against women of their own class—that their class supplies the unfortunate women who are the subjects of this legislation. It is nonsense talking about legislation if, in legislating for women, you leave out the magnificently attired women who drive their carriages in the protected towns, while you compel the wretched girls on the streets to be subjected to these Acts. Why, the police in Paris state that the higher class is the most dangerous in the whole of France; that, so far from this being the class that men can associate with without suffering any physical harm, it is by far the most dangerous class. The head of the police there, who has full arbitrary power over the poor girls in the streets, is always lamenting not having power over that more dangerous class, the clandestine class. This high official is always lamenting the diminution of women on the register. They used to claim a great deal of praise for increasing the number; for he argued, of course—"If I had all these women on the register, I could cure them." He wished—Caligula like, who desired that all his people had but one neck that he might destroy them with a single blow—he wished that he could, by a complete register, abolish the evil wholesale. M. Lecour gives the number of prostitutes as 30,000, and out of these 27,000 escape his clutches. As to the effects of these Acts upon the diminution of disease, I know that one particular disease has been lessened by the introduction of the Acts. [Ironical cheers.] I grant you that; I never denied it or disputed it. And what is that disease? Does any hon. Gentleman know, who has ironically cheered my admission? It is "not" the dangerous class of disease. It is a class of disease which may be easily cured, and which leaves no hereditary taint behind it; and I will vouch for the accuracy of this fact—that the hereditary disease has increased 4·6 per cent since the Acts came into operation; and I maintain, moreover, that there was a greater diminution of this hereditary disease, as it is called, before the Acts came into operation than there has been since. There was one thing I noticed with reference to my right hon. Friend, Mr. Henley, and that was that, after leaving this House, he was presented with a testimonial from gentlemen in his own county. But one of the leading Conservative papers—and there are some who still uphold the good old Tory tradition of Tory papers—praised Mr. Henley because he never was in favour of compulsory legislation, and never did anything to interfere with the liberty of the subject; and it went on to say that he was opposed on this ground to the Contagious Diseases Act, thinking it right that this question, which is a moral question, should be dealt with by moral means and by Christian charity. In fact, he was "a popular Tory of the old stamp." I leave that to the consideration of the popular Tories of the old or of the new stamp. But I trust that the words and the witness of an old man with one foot in the grave, whose labours in this House have been manifold, will be held worthy of some attention from this House. Then we have Mr. John Stuart Mill, who may not, perhaps, be considered a great statesman, and Mr. Maurice, with his Broad Church views. If these were not statesmen, at all events I must claim for Mr. Henley some small reputation in that respect. But I will take the case of a woman—a woman who, 20 years ago, devoted her life and sacrificed her health for the good of the soldiers of England. That woman was Florence Nightingale. She was in charge of the Government hospitals in the Crimea, sent out by Lord Herbert. She has been in charge of soldiers, and knew soldiers well, and yet she was the first to sign that roll of Petitions against the Acts; and she said that she felt sure that the system of Government regulation of vice and examination of women is contrary not only to the rights of woman, but to the general liberty of the State. She has seen hundreds of people cured under her own hands. She is not one of those who think that it is improper to sign the Petitions, or who are too squeamish to have this matter discussed. Now, I will take another typical name, the President of the Royal College of Physicians. You may quote instances against me; but do not run away with the impression that we have no supporters, that we are all fanatics; for there are several hundreds of medical men in this country, and in every town in England, who hold that the examination of these wretched women cannot be depended on as a certain test whether they are diseased or not. I believe no medical man is absolutely certain on the subject; and one of the highest physicians in the country has recorded it as his belief that, in 33 per cent of examinations, the examiner, who often—aye, usually—examines very rapidly, would fail to detect the more serious disorders; and, therefore, the State is in this peculiar position—that it gives its seal and imprimatur to this system of periodical examination, which can only be relied upon, at the most, in two out of three cases, and which the Royal Commission has recommended should be discontinued. The examination says to the women—not called “the Queen’s Women” now, as they used to be—“You are safe; you may go.” But hear what Dr. Routh says—

“Not only are these examinations outrageous, because made under compulsion, but very often useless, because they do not ensure the safety of any man who may afterwards consort with these women.”

I say this—that by the operation of these Acts some disease has been checked. It is impossible to have the examinations and re-examinations without being able to do some good. I always granted that. And more than that, I say that it is desirable, and in the highest degree essential for the health of this country, that there should be infinitely more done for the treatment of this disease. I agree with the recommendation of one of the medical men examined on the Royal Commission, that there ought to be Lock wards in every hospital in the Kingdom. This thing will be always better done under the voluntary system than under the State system. But some people are impressed with the idea that nothing can be done without the assistance of the State; that you must have the State to find religion for you, and in some countries the State finds theatres, and they think that the State must be everything and do everything. Time alone will solve this problem. But of this I am satisfied—that year by year will bring conviction to the minds of those who are still undecided, and I trust will confirm those who are already convinced, that it is impossible to maintain these Acts in the face of the public feeling of the country which, whether right or wrong, has pronounced—and I believe rightly pronounced—that these Acts have not been proved to be of any appreciable sanitary value; but that they have outraged the sense of decency, of equity, and of freedom in the minds of thousands of our countrymen and countrywomen. With these few words, I beg to move the second reading of the Bill.

MR. STANSFELD seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Sir Harcourt Johnstone.)

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sorry that the hon. Member has brought this most painful subject before the House. It is certainly one of the most painful subjects that could be discussed in the British House of Commons. I am very far indeed from depreciating or in any way calling in question the motives of the hon. Baronet, or of those who take a very deep interest in this question. I am sure that they do it from the deepest sense of duty, and from the consciousness that they are dealing with a matter that it is their duty to deal with. But I cannot help feeling myself that they take but a very partial view of the question, and it is one which, from its nature, they are not able carefully to study for themselves. I say that they are not able for themselves carefully and thoroughly to study it. But it has been my duty, occupying the position which I fill, to visit some of the hospitals in which these poor creatures, who are the subjects of this Bill, are incarcerated. I have been to Portsmouth and Devonport, and I have taken care to walk through the wards of the hospital with those who had the management, and to examine, as far as possible, into the practical operation of the Acts which are now under review. Well, Sir, I own in going down there in the first instance I was inclined—and I believe most hon. Gentlemen would be inclined—to favour the view which the hon. Baronet himself proposes to the House. But upon experience and examination, I came to the conclusion that these Acts are beneficial to public morality, beneficial to the persons who are intimately affected by them, and beneficial to the State. Some regard must be paid to the testimony of the clergymen, magistrates, and officers who are themselves engaged in carrying out, most tenderly, I think, and most carefully, these Acts, as they affect the women who are now the subject of this debate. If the hon. Baronet will take the trouble to visit these hospitals, to enter into a personal communication with the clergymen, who themselves are acquainted with the operation of the Acts—not those who remain outside, and merely speak in general terms of this matter—and see the patients in the hospitals, and examine the Returns, I think that I can say that he will come to a different conclusion from that which he has now stated to the House. The time is very short, and therefore I am obliged to compress my observations within a very limited space indeed. But I cannot help referring to one set of questions placed in the hands of clergymen, and very largely distributed by a body which is not often referred to in this House; but, at the same time, I think it must be admitted, whatever the views of hon. Gentlemen, that at least the object they have in view must be the preservation of morality—I speak of Convocation. Convocation printed certain questions which they sent around to clergymen and persons who, in their judgment, could give an answer to them which could be relied upon as to the operation of these Acts. I hold now in my hands the replies given to those questions by Mr. Grant, the Vicar of Portsmouth, who is, I believe, known to many hon. Gentlemen in this House. He is a gentleman who has devoted himself to the duties of his position, and who is at least capable of giving strong and trustworthy answers to any questions put to him. He is chairman of the committee of the hospital at Portsmouth, and it is known to the House that the Admiralty do not administer these Acts by their own officers, and the medical officers are appointed by the local authorities; and it is not too much to say that they have discharged their duty with zeal and care. The first question which was asked of Mr. Grant was—

“What is your opinion of the result of the Contagious Diseases Acts in increasing or diminishing prostitution?”

The answer is—

“In diminution of prostitution; for whilst in 1865 there were 789 prostitutes on the register of Portsmouth, there were in December 31st, 1876, 476.”

[Ironical cheers.] Well, I see hon. Gentlemen notice that statement as one which they perhaps think is not quite to be relied upon. This is not a statement of a mere statistical fact by Mr. Grant; but it is a statement out of the abundant local information which he possesses as to the condition of the town of which he is Vicar, and which may be relied upon. It is scarcely to be conceived that Mr. Grant would make a statement of this kind without he conscientiously believed it to be true. The next question is as to the amount of disease. The answer is—

“It diminishes the amount of disease in a remarkable manner. Whereas in 1875 the ratio of disease, upon their examination, was 70·56 per cent, it has been gradually reduced, until in December, 1876, the ratio was 4·84.”

So that you have a smaller number of prostitutes in this abominable trade, and you have, in that smaller number, a vast deal less of ratio of disease. These are answers which are at least of some value, coming from the source which they do. The other questions are—

“Q. What do you consider has caused these results?—A. The general working of the Contagious Diseases Acts. Q. Has the number of brothels been increased or decreased?—A. The operation of these Acts has reduced the brothels by one-half. In 1865 there were 263, and in 1876 there were 133. Q. Have any police regulations been in favour of this result?—A. There are no special police regulations beyond those which obtain, I believe, in all towns. The result has been entirely due to the general working of the Contagious Diseases Acts. Q. What is your opinion as to the effect—”

And it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

THE PREACHERS IN ST. PAUL'S.
QUESTION.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY reminded their Lordships that on Friday last he put a Question to the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of London) as to whether a clergyman who had refused to yield obedience to the law—the Rev. Mr. Edwards, Vicar of Prestbury—had been invited to preach at St. Paul's? and on that occasion the right rev. Prelate stated the inquiries which he had made and promised to make further inquiries, as some of the canons were absent. The John Bull newspaper had taken it upon itself to throw discredit on the whole matter, and stated that no such invitation had been made. He now wished to ask, If the right rev. Prelate had made further inquiries, and could give any information on the subject?

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, that when the noble Earl asked him the Question on Friday, he could only reply that having communicated with the Dean and Chapter he was informed that they had made no such appointment, and were not aware that it had been made. In two or three days after he received a letter from Canon Liddon, who at that time was absent, who said he had read the report of the Question and Answer in the debates of Friday last, and begged to inform him that some time in the month of April he asked Mr. Edwards to preach at St. Paul's on Sunday, December 15, and did so in consequence of his recollection of the great ability of Mr. Edwards as a preacher, and in consequence of the recommendation of a friend. The invitation thus given had no reference to recent circumstances. Canon Liddon added that for the last four years he had had Mr. Edwards's name on his list of the clergymen whom he intended to invite to preach. The appointment had not been laid before the Dean and Chapter, and was not likely to be so laid till near the time when Mr. Edwards was to have preached. However, Mr. Edwards had withdrawn his acceptance of the invitation and there was an end of the matter. He could not help expressing his regret that any circumstance should have arisen which should be capable of the construction that one of so high a character and position as Canon Liddon had given his sanction to a clergyman now under condemnation for repeated acts of disobedience to the laws and courts of his Church.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

METROPOLIS WATERWORKS (PURCHASE) BILL—[BILL 58.]

(Sir James M'Garel Hogg, Sir Andrew Lusk, Mr. Grantham. Mr. Rodwell.)

SECOND READING. BILL WITHDRAWN.

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG said, that in rising to ask leave of the House to discharge the Order for the second reading of the Bill, he hoped he would be allowed to express his regret that the lateness of the Session and the opposition the Bill had experienced rendered it impossible to proceed with the Bill with any hope of success. He took this course not in consequence of any change of opinion on his part, or on that of the Metropolitan Board, in regard to the merits of the Bill; and he ventured to add that, when the matter was concluded, the cost would be found to be much greater than if there had been a decision this Session.

Order for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment on Second Reading [12th March] read, and discharged.

QUESTIONS.

POOR LAW—ROMAN CATHOLIC NURSES IN WORKHOUSES.—QUESTION.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the President of the Local Government Board, If his attention has been called to the proceedings of the Board of Guardians of St. Saviour's Union at a meeting held on the 16th instant, at which a day nurse chosen by the Workhouse Committee was rejected by the Board on the express ground that she was a Roman Catholic, the mover of the rejection arguing that the appointment of Roman Catholic nurses was objectionable, and the Chairman laying down the principle that Workhouses are Protestant institutions; and, whether there is any provision in the statute law, or in the Local Government Board's regulations, making it objectionable to appoint Roman Catholic nurses to workhouse hospitals, or imparting to Poor Law institutions a denominational character; and, if not, whether he will address to the St. Saviour's Board of Guardians an official correction of the misconception under which they seem to labour as to the theological status of London workhouses?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: My attention was called to this case by the Question of the hon. Gentleman, and I have made inquiry respecting it. It is true that the Guardians of St. Saviour's Union, at their meeting on the 16th instant, declined to appoint a nurse who had been recommended by the Committee because she was a Roman Catholic, and it appears from a newspaper report which I have seen that expressions were made use of as stated in the Question. There is no provision in the statute law, nor in the regulations of the Local Government Board, against the appointment of Roman Catholic nurses, nor is there any provision imparting to workhouses a denominational character, except in so far as the Guardians are required to appoint a chaplain who shall be a member of the Established Church. The clerk to the Guardians informs me that the chief officers and chaplain being Protestants, it was expected that difficulties would arise if subordinate officers of other denominations were appointed who, in the ordinary course, would require leave of absence, probably at inconvenient periods, for attending to their religious duties. I am happy to give this public answer to the hon. Gentleman's Question; but seeing that the Guardians were acting within their right in declining to make this appointment, and that the language quoted was the language of individuals only, I do not consider that it is competent for me to address them officially on the subject.

POST OFFICE—DOVER AND CALAIS MAIL CONTRACT.—QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury,

Whether, in order to enable the House to form a just opinion of the Contract submitted for its approval between the Postmaster General and the London and South Eastern and London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Companies, laid upon the Table on the 6th of May (No. 157), for conveying the Mails and passengers between Dover and Calais and vice versâ, he will, previously to moving his Resolution approving the said Contract, lay upon the Table a Statement of the name of each vessel employed during the last twelve months by the Companies, giving the size of each; the highest number of passengers actually conveyed by each; and the day in each month in which each vessel was employed?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, the Government had no such information in its possession as the hon. Baronet required; but, owing to the courtesy of the Directors of the Companies, he had been furnished with a statement, which he would lay on the Table if the hon. Baronet wished it.

SALE OF FOOD AND DRUGS ACT, 1875 —SCOTLAND.—QUESTION.

MR. W. HOLMS asked the Lord Advocate, If he is aware that by a recent decision of the High Court of Justiciary "The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875," has practically become inoperative in Scotland; and, if so, what steps he proposes to take to remedy this state of things?

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in reply, said, his attention had been called to the decision in question. The result of that decision was rather too strongly put in the Question. It only affected the 6th clause of the Act; but he admitted that it would have the practical effect of stopping prosecutions under that clause. The Act, however, was one which applied to England as well as to Scotland, and the same point which had been decided by the Judges in the High Court of Justiciary had been raised by an appeal from a decision of the magistrates of Sheffield. He understood that that appeal was now pending before the High Court at Westminster; and, under these circumstances, he thought it better, before taking any steps in the matter, to wait and ascertain what the decision of that Court might be.

MILITARY FORCES OF THE CROWN— THE INDIAN CONTINGENT.

WITHDRAWAL OF NOTICE.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN, who had given Notice that he would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, How many men of all ranks of the Indian Army it is proposed to include in the Estimate which he has announced his intention to ask the House to vote? said: The Constitutional course taken by Her Majesty's Government in including in the Supplementary Estimate—"Order!" [Mr. HUSSEY VIVIAN: I am in Order.] The course of the Government in including in that Estimate the number of Indian troops brought to this country has entirely removed the necessity I felt of putting this Question. I therefore beg to withdraw it.

ARMY—SIEGE GUNS.—QUESTION.

MAJOR NOLAN asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, If the shooting of the Armstrong six-inch breech-loading gun has been found to be very superior to that of the present muzzle-loading siege guns of the same calibre; and, does he intend to prosecute early and extensive experiments with guns of this new pattern?

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: The official Reports of the experiments now going on are not yet fully completed, but any comparison would be most misleading; as, although the service siege guns and Sir William Armstrong's are of the same calibre (6 inches), the weight, length, and charges are very different, the weight of the service siege gun muzzle-loader being 64 cwt., the length 9½ feet, and the charge 12 lb.; while the weight of Sir William Armstrong's breech-loader is 78 cwt., the length 12 feet 1 inch, and the charge 33 lb. A muzzle-loading gun chambered to take a larger charge and of the same weight and length as Sir William Armstrong's gun would probably give the same result; and Sir William Armstrong is of this opinion. Until the present experiments have been fully considered, it cannot be decided what further experiments will be desirable.

PUBLIC HEALTH (IRELAND) BILL.

QUESTION.

MAJOR NOLAN (for Mr. GRAY) asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether, in view of the urgent necessity of giving to Ireland a sanitary code similar to that given to England three years ago, he is in a position to fix a day for the consideration in Committee of the Public Health (Ireland) Bill, which is on the Paper for this day, and which has now been for three Sessions before the House; whether he will consider the propriety of including in the Irish code the provisions of "The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875," which were omitted from "The Public Health Act (England), 1875," because the Bills were only passed the same Session, and also of including the provisions of "The Public Health (England) Amendment Bill," which has just passed through the House; and, whether, in view of the present state of public business, the large number of amendments now upon the Notice paper, and the importance of making the measure a complete sanitary code for Ireland containing the latest amendments in the English Law, he will, if not in a position to fix an early day for its discussion, consider the advisability of again referring the Bill to a Select Committee, or of withdrawing and reintroducing it with such amendments as may commend themselves to him, or of taking some other practical step to remedy during this Session the present unsatisfactory condition of Irish Sanitary Law?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON): I propose, within the next few days, to go into Committee on this Bill pro forma, which will give me the opportunity of adopting, in the reprint of the Bill, some of the Amendments which have been suggested, and so facilitating the passing of the Bill during the present Session. I do not think it would be proper to include in the Irish code the provisions of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, because that is an Imperial statute, and not peculiar to one country. Before, however, committing the Bill, I shall carefully consider the other Act named, with the view of adopting in the Public Health (Ireland) Bill any clauses that might seem suitable to Ireland.

POLICE SUPERANNUATION FUND (SCOTLAND).—QUESTION.

MR. J. STEWART asked, Whether the Government intended, during the present Session, to take steps to provide a superannuation fund for the benefit of the police forces of Scotland?

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in reply, said, that the Home Secretary was exceedingly desirous to deal with the question of superannuation, not only for Scotland but for England; but, at the same time, he was quite unable to hold out any prospect of introducing a Bill on the subject during the present Session.

INDIA—NATIVE INDIAN FORCES— TERMS OF SERVICE.—QUESTION.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether there were any Order or Orders by Her Majesty in Council, or by the Governor General of India in Council, altering the terms and conditions of service of men entering the Indian Forces from what these terms and conditions were on the 2nd August, 1858; if so, if they had been laid before Parliament according to the 52nd section of 21 & 22 Vict. c. 706; and, if so, whether he would state the dates on which such Order or Orders were laid on the Table of the House?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Since the date mentioned by the hon. and gallant Member there has been no change in the terms of enlistment and service of the Native portion of Her Majesty's Indian Forces.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE WHIT- SUNTIDE RECESS.

NOTICE OF QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN: I beg to give Notice that I shall to-morrow ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when it is proposed that the House shall adjourn for the Whitsuntide Recess, and for how long?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers that Question, I shall be glad if the right hon. Gentleman will inform me when he will afford the House an opportunity of discussing the question of the Supplementary Estimate?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have to state that the Question referred to by the hon. Member for Swansea will be brought forward to-morrow. In answer to the noble Lord, I beg to say that I gave Notice some time ago—and in answer to a Question, I think, from the noble Lord himself—that I proposed to take that Estimate on Monday next, the 27th, and I think that will be the day which will be the most convenient to take it.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. [THIRD NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [20th May],

“That, by the Constitution of this Realm, no Forces may be raised or kept by the Crown in time of peace, without the consent of Parliament, within any part of the Dominions of the Crown, excepting only such Forces as may be actually serving within Her Majesty’s Indian Possessions.”—(The Marquess of Hartington.)

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “this House, being of opinion that the constitutional control of Parliament over the raising and employing of the Military Forces of the Crown is fully secured by the provisions of the Law, and by the undoubted power of this House to grant or refuse Supplies, considers it to be unnecessary and inexpedient to affirm any Resolution tending to weaken the hands of Her Majesty’s Government in the present state of Foreign affairs,”—(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)—instead thereof.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, I am not going to be led by the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), who addressed the House at the close of the debate on Tuesday night, into any discussion as to the policy of Her Majesty’s Government in the management of these Eastern Forces. That, as I understand, is a question which hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite have not thought it right at the present moment to bring before the House. I am quite content that the Government should rest, as it does, on the approval of the vast majority of the House of Commons and of a still larger majority of the country; and when the time comes for the discussion of the policy of the Government, I, in common with my Colleagues, shall be ready to defend it whenever it may be attacked. But the right hon. Gentleman made a considerable number of observations on that policy. He alluded to the 35,000 troops added to the Forces of the Crown by calling out the Reserves, and remarked that at that time we had followed the proper and Constitutional practice of sending a Message to each House of Parliament; and he went into an elaborate calculation as to how much English and Indian troops were respectively worth, coming to the conclusion that the 7,000 Indian troops were worth only 3,500 of English, and asking if we could act Constitutionally with regard to the 35,000, why did we not act in the same Constitutional manner in reference to the 3,500? I should have thought that he might have thought of this argument—namely, that from the manner in which the Government acted with regard to the larger Force, in which respect their conduct was wholly in accordance with the Act of Parliament, it might be presumed that they would not willingly act contrary to what they believed to be the law with regard to a smaller Force. The right hon. Gentleman then went on to say that there was very much dispute in regard to the employing of these Indian Forces at all in concert with European Forces. That really was discussing a question which I have not the slightest intention to discuss. He went into the matter with considerable detail, and quoted to us the evidence of a great number of persons who were examined before a Committee; and all that, to my mind, shows this—the great inconvenience, to say the least of it, of having a Resolution put before us of such a character as the noble Lord has placed before the House; because that being, as he himself stated, a matter connected with the Constitutional and legal bearings of the question, it has formed a peg upon which hon. Gentlemen have hung a series of accusations against the Government, and if we answered them at length, the debate would be interminable. One of the accusations of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract, which he enforced as strongly as he could, had reference to the secrecy which the Government observed in regard to these Indian troops. I am quite ready to meet that accusation. It was a question on which we might have been challenged, and were not challenged. It forms no part of the subject-matter which was offered to the consideration of the House. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies gave an answer which undoubtedly had great weight with the Government—namely, that this was a step the Government did not want to take unless they thought they were absolutely driven to do so; and when we came to our decision we found that there were local difficulties with the winds and waves that made it absolutely essential that it should be carried out by a certain time; and, as there was still a doubt whether some practical difficulties could be got over or not, it would, as my right hon. Friend said, have been the height of folly if we had told the world what we were going to do, and then found out that there were local reasons why it could not be done. There are reasons why, even at the present moment, we cannot be entirely explicit, for the right hon. Gentleman must know that this must be a time the most inopportune to go at any great length into what has taken place in the deliberations, not of England alone, but of Europe, at the time in question. I may say, on behalf of the Government, that the most absolute secrecy was essential, for negotiations of the highest importance were going on, and at that time of good promise; and, on the other hand, we had received certain information from a high authority which has since, happily, turned out untrue. No one was more glad of that than myself; but there were rumours, which came from such an authority that we were bound to pay respect to them; and it would have been the height of rashness and folly if we had induced Parliament, at that moment, to enter into excited debates on the subject. To my mind, the secrecy which the Government observed at that time was absolutely necessary for carrying on the affairs of the Empire. I am aware that we are responsible for that; but I believe that we would have betrayed our trust, and been unfaithful to our high duties, if we had not kept that secrecy. All this leads me to one further observation as to the Motion of the noble Lord. He says—and I am bound to admit that in his speech he kept as far as possible to what he said at the outset—that he was going to treat this matter simply in its Constitutional and legal bearing. That may be so; but the noble Lord must remember that the House is not a mere debating society, and it is not a question whether we ought to discuss a dry and abstract point of law, which might be discussed in the Courts of Law; but it is absolutely certain, in discussing a Motion of this kind, though you do not want to attack the general policy of the Government, this House, being filled with men of practical business-like habits, and men of common sense, must see that the Resolution of the noble Lord has no object whatever unless it is to be considered in regard to the acts of the Government; and that it is the acts of the Government that must be considered by the House if it is necessary to take up the time of the House at all with the discussion. And when we came later on in the debate we found that that certainly was so, for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), though he praised the noble Lord for not discussing our policy, made a speech of which the whole tenour was not the discussion of a Constitutional abstract question, but an indictment of the gravest possible character against the acts of the Government. [Cheers.] I am glad to hear that cheer; this is exactly what I say—if you mean to discuss the acts of the Government, and to pass a Vote of Censure upon them, why do you not do it, instead of introducing this Resolution as a means of discussing them in a by-way, without calling upon the House to form an opinion practically as to the Government's acts. When I come to consider the terms of the Resolution, I must remind hon. Members, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich in particular, not simply that there is a Resolution, but that there is an Amendment also; and I recommend the House to take into consideration, not only the terms of the Resolution, but the terms of the Amendment. I quite admit that, supposing the Government had chosen, in spite of all statutes and all practice, in a time of profound peace, to take the whole Indian Army to garrison all the places in Europe with Indian troops, in order to set free English soldiers for service elsewhere, and had deliberately concealed that from Parliament till it was necessary to come to Parliament for Supplies, and had then made a request for those Supplies without rhyme or reason, then the Government would have been guilty of a gross breach of the Constitution. That is the imaginary state of facts on which hon. Gentlemen argue. They magnify the acts of the Government, and then think it high time to pass their Resolution. But that is not the real state of the case. In the first place, what we did was not done in a time of profound peace; on the contrary, what we did was done in a time of profound danger; and the Government never raised one single man or Native troop whom they were not authorized to raise by the consent of Parliament. There is no question of raising troops without the consent of Parliament; not a single man has been used who has not been enlisted with the absolute free will and consent of Parliament and the country. But what, then, has the Government done? They have advised Her Majesty, in the exercise of Her undoubted Prerogative, to move a portion of Her troops from one portion of Her Dominions to another. Have they done this with the deliberate intention of concealing it from Parliament? Why, the very first day Parliament re-assembled the Chancellor of the Exchequer came down and said that he was going to present to Parliament the Estimates which would practically provide funds for these troops; and the day on which the Estimates were to be considered was actually fixed before Notice was given of the Motion of the noble Lord. What we did was done not in a time of profound peace, but in a time of imminent danger; indeed, so serious did even Parliament itself consider the situation, that it had some time before sanctioned a Vote of Credit, and by that Vote practically sanctioned the calling out of the Reserves. At all events, it was the opinion of Parliament that a great emergency had arisen; and when hon. Gentlemen proceeded to a discussion of the actions of the Government, they should not leave those facts out of consideration. With reference to the movement of these Indian troops, we had no intention or design of concealment. The moment they were moved—the moment when the secrecy which, in our opinion, was then essential was no longer necessary—and I am bound to say that, from military considerations, it was not intended that the movement of the troops should be known so soon—that moment, if Parliament had been sitting, the House would have been informed that the Government would come down and ask the necessary Supplies. Now, these are the acts of the Government, and I do not believe they have been guilty of any dereliction of duty, or that they can be justly charged with having broken any Act of Parliament. Having done what they have done with, I think, the full approval of the country, I contend that, looking at the exigencies of the case, they were only performing their duty, and that, in the words of the Amendment, there is no necessity for passing any such Resolution as that of the noble Lord, which he knows must, if carried, tend to embarrass the Government. I do not wish to detain the House long; but I am anxious to place before the country the acts with which we are charged, and to call the attention of the House to the state of things which existed not only in England, but throughout Europe, at the time the Government took the course which they felt bound to adopt. In considering the Resolution and the Amendment I say that, unless the acts of the Government are such as to call upon this House for censure, there is no occasion to pass such a Resolution. I go further, and contend that the noble Lord must make out that there have been acts done by the Government which imperatively call upon the House to pass a Resolution of this kind, to prevent such action in the future, before he can fairly ask the House to assent to it. In that case, it is not only this House which ought to interfere, but Parliament; and I maintain, therefore, that it is idle and ridiculous to bring forward in the House of Commons a Motion, abstract in its terms, but disputing by a side-wind the action of the Government, and at the same time, in the other branch of the Legislature, to bring forward something totally and distinctly different, as if the matter were one of no importance, and one with which Parliament ought not to deal. With all deference to the noble Lord, I cannot understand why he assented, in common with his advisers, to pursue such a course of conduct. I have alluded to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr.

Childers), and I need hardly say with what great pain, as a Member of the Government, I listened to another speech—I mean that of an hon. Friend of mine, for whom I entertain the highest regard—the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate.) I cannot think my hon. Friend has viewed this matter in its true light, or that he has taken into consideration the state of England and Europe at the time at which the measure to which he objects was adopted. He bases his opposition to the act of the Government, so far as I can make out, on the effect of the clause which was introduced into the Government of India Bill in 1858. Now, my observations on that point I will, with the permission of the House, defer for the present; but I feel assured that if my hon. Friend had before him the true facts of the case, he would not have been so ready to listen to the indignant observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone). That right hon. Gentleman has made some serious charges against the Government. He has charged us with illegality in two matters, and when that charge broke down—as I believe it did utterly—he said that we had acted unconstitutionally in two ways. Here, again, comes in the difficulty of dealing with this Resolution. If we have done anything illegal, why not put it down and say distinctly what it is? If we have done anything unconstitutional, why, again, not say clearly what it is, and take the opinion of Parliament on the subject? Instead of doing that, however, the right hon. Gentleman says—“You have done something illegal; you have done something unconstitutional; or, at all events, you have done something uncivil;” but in making charges in such terms as these, he is really putting us in a difficulty under which no Ministers of the Crown ought to be placed. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, however, is of opinion that we infringed the Bill of Rights; but I should gladly leave that part of the subject to those hon. Gentlemen who are learned in expounding the law. I must, at the same time, protest against the charge that we have broken the Bill of Rights in any form or shape. I cannot help thinking, I may add, that the right hon. Gentleman was rather hard on the Attorney General the other night when he denounced, in the strongest terms, not only the law as laid down by my hon. and learned Friend, but the danger from such an exposition of the law to the liberties of the subjects of this realm. The right hon. Gentleman accused my hon. and learned Friend of having stated that the Bill of Rights was not a declaratory Act, and that it made the law. Now, it is no part of my business to contend that the Bill of Rights did not expressly declare the law. The right hon. Gentleman laid great stress on the word “declare,” because it was to be found in the statute. There is, however, no magic in that word, and it does not, it seems to me, bear out the right hon. Gentleman’s contention. But if there was one part of the Bill of Rights with respect to which more than another he blamed the Attorney General for saying it was not the common law, it was that relating to the raising of Forces by the Crown. The right hon. Gentleman, in the course of his speech, quoted a sentence from Mr. Hallam. Now, no one values more than I do the authority of Mr. Hallam. Any statement of his is entitled to the greatest weight. It is, at the same time, I think, to be regretted that, when such a violent onslaught was made on the Attorney General, we were not favoured with the benefit of Mr. Hallam’s opinion on the particular point to which that onslaught was directed, especially as it is to be found not only in the same book, but in the same page—almost the same sentence—from which the right hon. Gentleman quoted. Let us first see what the right hon. Gentleman, with all the eloquence at his command, puts in the mouth of my hon. and learned Friend. This, it must be borne in mind, is not only an attack upon the Attorney General, but an attack upon the Government, and I must protest against the actions of the Government being dealt with through the action of the Attorney General. [Ironical cheers.] Pardon me for a moment. I say that the acts of the Government are one thing, and a sentence which may fall from a Member of the Government quite another thing; but when that sentence, after a long series of manipulations, comes out in a totally different shape from that which it first presented, no one, I think, has more reason to complain than my hon. and learned Friend himself. The

[Third Night.]

Attorney General, seeing his own innocent words through what I may call the magic lantern of the right hon. Gentleman's eloquence, reminds me of a country person coming up to London for the first time who is shown what seems to him to be a glass of pure water, which he afterwards perceives to be filled with all sorts of hideous forms, and in which he can no longer recognize the pure drop of water he first saw. "The Government," said the right hon. Gentleman, "according to the Attorney General, has the power to maintain what Forces it pleases, and to use them as it pleases, and when it pleases and where it pleases, and as long as it pleases, until it is under the necessity of finding money for the services; but as to the time of that necessity it can exercise its own discretion, and there is no limit as to the time at which it is under an obligation to come and take us into its counsel." Well, I hope the action of the Government is not to be read by the light of that version. It only shows how apt people are to be led away by eloquence, when really and truly there is not so very much in it. Well, Sir, what is the opinion on this subject of Mr. Hallam, whom the right hon. Gentleman quoted? Mr. Hallam says—

"Except in this article of the dispensing Prerogative, we cannot say, on comparing the Bill of Rights with what is proved to be the law by statutes, or generally esteemed to be such on the authority of our best writers, that it took away any legal power of the Crown or enlarged the limits of popular and Parliamentary privilege. The most questionable proposition, though at the same time one of the most important, was that which asserts the illegality of a standing Army in time of peace, unless with consent of Parliament. It seems difficult to perceive in what respect this infringed on any private man's right, or by what clear reason, for no statute could be pretended, the King was debarred from enlisting soldiers by voluntary contract for the defence of his dominions, especially after an express law had declared the sole power over the Militia, without giving any definition of that word, to reside in the Crown. This had never been expressly maintained by Charles II.'s Parliaments, though the general repugnance of the nation to what was certainly an innovation might have provoked a body of men who did not always measure their words to declare its illegality. It was, however, at least unconstitutional, by which, as distinguished from illegal, I mean a novelty of much importance, tending to endanger the established laws. And it is manifest that the King could never inflict penalties by martial law, or generally by any other course, on his troops, nor quarter them on the inhabitants, nor cause them to interfere with the civil authorities; so that even if the proposition so absolutely expressed may be somewhat too wide, it still should be considered as virtually correct. But its distinct assertion in the Bill of Rights put a most essential restraint on the Monarchy, and rendered it in effect for ever impossible to employ any direct force or intimidation against the established laws and liberties of the people."—[Constitutional History, chap. 15.]

It will be seen from this, that the one point which the right hon. Gentleman pressed upon my poor Friend the Attorney General, with the greatest possible force and violence of his eloquence, was this which Mr. Hallam says is the only point which was doubtful. I should be curious to hear from the legal Gentlemen who may speak in the course of the evening how far, in their opinion, the ancient common law of England extends. The right hon. Gentleman says the Bill of Rights extend over not only the United Kingdom, but all the Dependencies of the Crown, like the common law. Well, I have every respect for the common law; but I must confess my surprise to hear it asserted that it extends to all the Dependencies of the Crown. I thought it had been decided over and over again that it did not. Blackstone says—

"There is a difference between these two species of Colonies with respect to the laws by which they are bound, For in conquered or ceded countries that have already laws of their own, those laws remain in force until changed by competent authority, and the common law of England as such has no allowance or authority there."—[Sec. iv.]

In Jamaica a statute was passed in which the common law of England was made to be the law of that country, but that statute did not receive the Royal Assent. Where would slavery have existed if the common law of England had been in force in all the Dependencies of the Crown? As to Lord Bathurst's views, I have only to say that the report of them is of the most meagre description, and that hon. Members who discuss this question in future years will have the advantage of studying the law as laid down by another Lord Chancellor—namely, Lord Cairns—whose views I am debarred at the present time from quoting. So much for the Bill of Rights. As I have endeavoured to show the House, we have not infringed it, and until the doctrine which has been laid down on the other side is carried further, we are not liable to any charge of illegality. Now we come to the second charge of illegality, in making which the right hon. Gentleman says he feels more at home in history than in law. I hope to be able to show that, if he was wrong in law, he was still further wrong in history. The account which he gave of the clause in the Act of 1858 would not, I am sure, lead hon. Members to form a just and proper conclusion as to what occurred at the time of its passing; for, curiously enough, on that occasion the doctrine now laid down by the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends was not advanced by any speaker. Now, what was the history of the clause? The Bill, as brought in—not by the Government which passed it, but by a previous Government—contained a provision that Indian troops should not be moved out of Asia. Subsequently, however, that provision disappeared, and the right hon. Gentleman introduced a new clause—this, namely—

Then he appealed to the Members of the late Government to say—

“Whether it was not a most dangerous precedent that it should lie in the discretion of the Executive to make use of what might be called extraneous finance and an extraneous Army for the purposes of making war, the expense of which was hereafter to be borne by the British people?”—[Ibid. 1011.]

Well, as the right hon. Gentleman says very fairly, the clause was objected to by Lord Palmerston and Earl Russell. Earl Russell thought the clause unconstitutional, because it interfered with the movement of troops by Her Majesty. The noble Earl said—

“Supposing we had a war with some European Power, and that, this war being supported by the House of Commons, it was considered desirable for the Indian Army to attack the possessions of this enemy of the Crown, it appeared to him the clause would prevent the employment of those Forces without the consent of Parliament.”—[Ibid.]

That is the very point we are now discussing. The clause, however, passed the House of Commons; but the objection taken to it was so serious that, on the second reading in the House of Lords, the Earl of Derby made use of the following words:—

“It has been objected to this clause that it appears to interfere with the Prerogative of the Crown, inasmuch as it provides that none of Her Majesty’s Forces maintained out of the revenues of India shall be taken, except in cases of urgent emergency, beyond the frontiers of that country without the previous consent of Parliament. . . . Your Lordships will recollect that, although there is no prerogative of the Crown more indisputable than that of making war or peace, the Constitution has provided an equally indisputable check on the practical exercise of that Prerogative by rendering it necessary for the Crown to come to Parliament for the Supplies necessary to raise and maintain the troops, without which it would be impossible to carry on a war.”—[Ibid. 1458-9.]

The clause having been withdrawn, he brought it forward in a new form—namely—

“Except for preventing or repelling actual invasion of Her Majesty’s Indian Possessions, or under other sudden and urgent necessity, the Revenues of India shall not, without the consent of Parliament, be applicable to defray the expenses of any military operation carried on beyond the external frontiers of such Possessions by Her Majesty’s Forces charged upon such Revenues.”—[Ibid. 1696.]

There is the exact point of difference, and no one puts it more strongly than Earl Granville himself, for, on the second reading, he says—

“The clause as it originally stood was as follows:—That, except in cases of great urgency, the Army in India shall not be employed beyond the frontier of Her Majesty’s Indian Possessions without the consent of Parliament. Now, that appears to me to be altogether unconstitutional.”—[Ibid. 1470.]

The whole point at issue under the clause was, whether the Prerogative of the Crown in moving troops was to be interfered with or not, or whether there should simply be a check upon the Prerogative of the Crown in the shape of power to refuse Supplies if it moved the troops improperly? I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say he approved the alteration; but there must be some mistake in the matter, judging from what occurred when the question was previously discussed in Committee in the House of Commons. The Solicitor General suggested an alteration in the clause, so as to make it read—Her Majesty’s Forces “maintained out of the Revenues of India” shall not be employed, &c.; but Mr. Wilson urged that, instead of "Her Majesty's Forces in the East Indies shall not be employed," &c., the clause should provide that "the revenues of India shall not be employed for such purpose, except with the consent of Parliament" — an alteration which, he said, would leave the Prerogative of the Crown in respect to the employment of Forces unimpaired. Well, that was the view the House of Lords adopted; but the right hon. Gentleman, who had brought forward the clause, said that, while he had no objection to the alteration proposed by the Solicitor General, he did not think Mr. Wilson's proposal a desirable one.

MR. GLADSTONE: I changed my mind on further consideration.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I am very glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman did change his mind.

MR. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman misunderstands me. My objection to Mr. Wilson's clause was that it would not answer the purpose it had in view. When we came to consider Lord Derby's proposal, on the contrary, I saw that the consent of Parliament — by which I always understood, and now understand, the previous consent of Parliament — would be an efficient check, and that the clause would not be open to the objection, which I admitted, of interfering with the Prerogative of the Crown.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Having changed his mind once, the right hon. Gentleman I hope, on looking over these debates, will change it again. As I have said, the point discussed in both Houses in 1858 was, whether or not the power of the Crown to move troops should remain unimpaired, and the argument used against the proposed change was, that in the case of military operations in Java, Egypt, or other places, the consent of Parliament might not be obtained in time. No Minister under the sun would think of using these troops without coming to Parliament as soon as he could; but before he could get the money he was to have the undoubted Prerogative of the Crown at his command for the movement of the troops. Well, I say that that is exactly what we have done. I see that the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire shakes his head. I grant you may say that the circumstances which led us to move the troops before coming to Parliament did not constitute an emergency, but that is not the point at issue now. In our opinion it was an emergency. What I want to put to the hon. Member for North Warwickshire is this. We are dealing with the question of legality or illegality. Can the hon. Member say that in no case under that clause could the Crown move the troops without the previous sanction of Parliament?

MR. NEWDEGATE remarked that he had never said that. Those who were in the House when he spoke would remember that he read the speech delivered by the late Lord Derby in moving the 55th clause. The noble Lord said that an emergency dangerous to Her Majesty's Possessions was distinctly excepted from the operation of the Act.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: The one point on which we are at issue now is, whether the action of Her Majesty's Government was legal or not. It was for the Government to determine whether an emergency had arisen; but as to the question of legality or illegality, I say that the hon. Member has given up his point at once.

MR. NEWDEGATE again rose, but

MR. SPEAKER said: The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department is in possession of the House, and must be allowed to proceed to the end of his address. If at the end of that address the hon. Member wishes to explain, the House, no doubt, will give him an opportunity of doing so.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich went on to refer to two Constitutional questions, one of which is so closely connected with the Office of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that I would rather leave it to be answered by my right hon. Friend. It was said that we incurred a charge in respect of the Indian troops at the very time that we were carrying our financial measures for the year without proposing Ways and Means for meeting that charge. I will leave the Chancellor of the Exchequer to deal with that. But I understood the right hon. Gentleman also to say, that if at that time we could not lay Estimates upon the Table, at all events we need not have preserved secrecy as to our proceedings. He seemed to think that we might have come down to the House of Commons and said—"We want a million of money for something we cannot tell you about." Would not the right hon. Gentleman have declaimed against us in the strongest possible manner, and would he not have been the very first man to take the matter up? The right hon. Gentleman also says we have acted in an unconstitutional manner, because we have, practically, compelled Parliament to meet the expenditure which has been incurred without its sanction and knowledge. He said, in effect—"Parliament must give the Queen the money She has asked for, because, otherwise, the Government of India will come before us in forma pauperis, and say the expenditure will fall upon this poor country of India." Then the right hon. Gentleman said—"When we were in Office, and had the Crimean War on our hands, we were content with Constitutional action, and we came and asked for a Bill, although it was in time of war." Well, of course they did; if they had not, they could not have had a single soldier in their service without it. It was, therefore, absolutely necessary, and I do not think they can take much credit for that. But when it comes, as it now does, not to a question of law, but a question as to how soon we are to ask Parliament for money to repay the Indian Service, it becomes much more like the cases of 1859 and the Abyssinian Expedition. I really do not want to detain the House at any greater length; but I hope I have shown that the accusations which have been made against the Government are, practically, untrue, and have been raised in the most inconvenient form that they could have been. I have shown, I think, good reasons why the Amendment should be preferred to the form of the Resolution of the noble Lord; and I cannot help thinking that the declamation about the liberties of the country being in danger, about dashing the Constitution against the rocks, and about the people standing up for their rights and liberties, will, when it has been considered, wear a very different complexion to what it was supposed to do on Tuesday night. I say there is no action of the Government that has called for any Resolution of this kind. I say that there has not been one single man raised who was not raised under the distinct authority of the Imperial Parliament. I say that the Queen has moved Her troops, as She has an undoubted right to do, and that, therefore, there has been no infringement of the Bill of Rights. I say, with reference to the second point, that there has been no infringement of the Indian Government Act, and that the Government have come down at once to ask Parliament to vote the money, as we were bound in duty to do. That is the check placed by the Indian Government Act against an ambitious Government or an unconstitutional Sovereign, and we have never violated the spirit of that Act. If it comes to a question as to the day when we should bring forward this matter, we may be asked, although we are not asked by the form of this Resolution, to give an answer on that point. But I am bound to say, as regards this whole matter, you know at the present moment, as well as anyone does, that it is absolutely impossible for the Government to enter fully into discussion of all the negotiations that are going on. If there is one moment in the negotiations when it is desirable to maintain silence on this part of the matter, the present is the moment. You know that no word must fall from my lips that would in the slightest degree provoke anger or jealousy, or tend to disturb the friendly relations which exist between us and other Powers, or that would in any way tend to prejudice that agreement of Europe, which, we hope, will be eventually come to, and by which not only peace, but lasting peace, will be preserved, and the interest and good government of the European peoples secured. I say it is unfair to press us on the point as to what we have done under an emergency. There is quite sufficient to show that there is an emergency, and, I think, the country will say we have done nothing but what that emergency absolutely warrants. I believe the people of this country will throw the accusations made against us by the right hon. Gentleman on those rocks on which he wishes our action against the liberties of the people to be thrown, and I am quite sure the verdict of the country will, in the long run, be in favour of the Government.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he had quoted on the last occasion Lord Derby's own speech; but as it seemed that he was liable to some misinterpretation, he would read the 55th clause of the Government of India Act, which was as follows:—

"Except for preventing or repelling actual invasion of Her Majesty's Indian Possessions, or under other sudden and urgent necessity, the revenues of India shall not, without the consent of Parliament, be applicable to defray the expenses of any military operation carried on beyond the external frontiers of such Possessions."

The words which the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had challenged were not his words, but those of the late Earl of Derby. The object of the clause was to impose certain restrictions on the Prerogative of the Crown.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member was passing beyond the limits of an explanation.

MR. HERSCHELL thought there must still remain on the minds of hon. Members who had attended to this debate considerable doubt as to what was the position which the Government really intended to maintain. Some Members of the Government insisted that all that had been done, or was being done, was strictly in accordance with the laws and Constitution of the Realm; while, with regard to others, it was very difficult to say whether they agreed with that proposition or not. If it was contended that all that had been done had been in accordance with the law and with the Constitution of the Realm, this raised a question of very serious import, and involved principles which to some at least on the Opposition side seemed novel and dangerous. On the other hand, there were Members of the Government who seemed to rely not so much on the contention that what had been done had been strictly within Constitutional limits, as upon the contention that the Government were justified in overstepping those limits by the emergency in which they found themselves. That was a different question, but even as to that, considerations of no mean moment arose; because, suppose the Government were driven from strict Constitutional limits, it was important to consider what was the course they should take, and what was the course the House ought to take, to secure from danger the Constitutional principles violated. One thing was clear, that in discussing this matter these two things must be kept separate. That he intended to do. The House had been distinctly challenged by the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon this question of Constitutional right. The right hon. Gentleman said the fact that troops were being sent to Malta had become public sooner than he anticipated; but that even had the Government known that the intelligence would have been communicated to the public so soon, they would not have considered it necessary, under the circumstances, to communicate it to Parliament. That he (Mr. Herschell) considered was an ostentatious assertion on the part of the right hon. Gentleman of the right of Her Majesty's Government to act in this matter behind the back of Parliament. The Opposition would have abandoned their functions if they did not protest against a proposition which was, in their opinion, opposed to the Constitutional rights and privileges of the people. The acts of to-day became the precedents of to-morrow, and might be used hereafter under different circumstances, and by other persons, for very different purposes. Therefore, it was their duty to see that unconstitutional rights were not claimed by the Government, or, if they were claimed, that they were not acquiesced in in silence. He (Mr. Herschell) maintained that the proposition in the Resolution of the noble Marquess had not been displaced by the arguments which the House had heard. What was the claim set up? That the Crown had the Prerogative in a time of peace of increasing indefinitely, beyond the number voted by Parliament, the Forces kept in its Dominions, and of keeping up a standing Army in time of peace, without the consent of Parliament, anywhere outside the United Kingdom. The Attorney General laid down that claim with startling clearness. The Home Secretary had said the Government were not to be judged by the words of their Attorney General; but he wished the Home Secretary had told the House how far he agreed with the Attorney General, and how far he disagreed. He listened with the greatest attention possible for the purpose of discovering that, but was wholly unable to do so, though there fell from the right hon. Gentleman at the end of his speech expressions which seemed to state the propositions in terms not very different from those used by the Attorney General. What he (Mr. Herschell) and the other Members of the Opposition maintained was that the principle of the Resolution proposed by the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Boroughs was established not merely by the Bill of Rights and by the Mutiny Acts, but also by two centuries of Constitutional precedents and practices. The Attorney General had told them that the Bill of Rights did not declare the law, but made it; but surely the framers of that famous Statute must be supposed to have known what they meant by enacting it; and when they asserted that it was a declaration of the Common Law as it existed up to that time, he would prefer their interpretation of it to that of his hon. and learned Friend. As to the argument that it was limited to the Kingdom of England properly so called, he would rather rely on the opinion expressed by Lord Camden and Lord Bathurst than upon the dictum of the present occupant of the Woolsack, however eminent he might be; for there was this difference between them—that Lord Cairns was delivering judgment in his own case, whereas Lord Bathurst was admitting a doctrine which assailed the Government of which he was himself a Member. With respect to the argument of his hon. and learned Friend, that owing to the urgent character of the emergency in which the country was placed the present time could not be regarded as a time of peace, he could only say that his hon. and learned Friend was living behind his time, as he would have been an excellent adviser of the Stuart Kings, since there was never a time in the history of the country when the Monarch might not have similarly justified the maintenance of a standing Army without the consent of Parliament. It was an error to think that this question could be decided by the strict language of the Bill of Rights. The operation of many remedial Statutes had been often extended beyond their strict terms by the manner in which they were acted upon. It was important to see how the Bill of Rights was understood by those who framed it, and how that compact between the Crown and the people was carried into effect immediately upon its becoming law. Immediately after it became law two steps were taken for the purpose of carrying it out—one was the passing of the Mutiny Act, and the other the voting of the men to whom that Mutiny Act would apply. The effect of the first was to enable the Sovereign to have a standing Army, for without the Mutiny Act the men, of course, would have been an undisciplined rabble. The effect of the other was to fix the number of men to whom the Mutiny Act was to apply. The Mutiny Act applied not only to troops within the United Kingdom, but to the troops of the Crown, wherever they were, in the Sovereign's Dominions outside the Kingdom. Parliament voted the number of men to be employed outside the Kingdom and the money for their maintenance in the same way that it voted the number of men to be employed in the Kingdom and the money for their maintenance. And since the time when the numbers were inserted in the Mutiny Acts, the number of the Forces which the Crown was enabled to keep as a standing Army was determined in terms not with reference to the wants of the United Kingdom, but of the Empire at large. In fixing the number, Parliament took into consideration the fact that the Crown must keep a large part of its Forces outside the United Kingdom. But what was contended for now? Why, that the Crown might from other sources replace every man outside the United Kingdom and bring the total number judged by Parliament necessary for the protection of the entire Dominions of the Sovereign within the United Kingdom with perfect legality and in accordance with Constitutional law. Did that carry out the compact between the Crown and the people? Was that consistent with the course which had been followed by Parliament for nearly two centuries in voting the men, fixing the numbers, and passing the Mutiny Act? Was it consistent with the course which had been pursued ever since Parliament had established its control over the limits and numbers of the standing Army? Precedents had been relied on upon the other side; but it was easy to have precedents, if one was not particular about the facts. No doubt, in many respects, India was in an exceptional position. Since the Forces of India had become entirely the Forces of the Crown, the Queen had in India a large standing Army under no control of Parliament and under no annual Mutiny Act. But the question was, what could the Crown do with that Army? It was one thing to say that the Crown, by virtue of its Prerogative, had the power to move the Indian troops out of India; it was another thing to say that the Crown could bring them within its other Dominions. No doubt, it was within the Prerogative to move them to Abyssinia, for example; but was it within Constitutional right and principle to bring them into Her Majesty's Dominions outside India, thus extending indefinitely the number of men entitled to serve in those Dominions? The precedents of the Indian troops serving at Singapore and Hong Kong were against hon. Gentlemen opposite, because those troops were voted by Parliament as well as the Supplies for them. From 1865 to 1871, the number of these men was every year voted by Parliament, and the voting of the men by Parliament was the authority—and the only authority—given for some years after the Bill of Rights for keeping them within, as well as without, the Kingdom. The Attorney General had put cases in which he said it would be idle to wait for the consent of Parliament. He quite agreed with his hon. and learned Friend. But, because there might be cases when it was desirable to overstep the limits of the law, it did not follow the law was not as stated; and yet that was the argument of his hon. and learned Friend. It was said that this was a case of emergency; and that, in cases of emergency, it was absolutely necessary sometimes to step outside the law. If the Government put it on that ground, many on that (the Opposition) side of the House would feel the greatest satisfaction. If the Government would abandon the unconstitutional doctrines which some of them, at least, had put forward; if they would not seek to convert this step into a precedent which might have dangerous consequences; he and many who agreed with him would be extremely glad. But, instead of taking that course, they put forward a doctrine the logical consequence of which was that if Parliament refused to pass the Mutiny Act, and thereby destroyed the standing Army in the United Kingdom, the Queen might keep a standing Army of any number anywhere else in Her Dominions—say, for example, in Guernsey. If the Government would put their case on the ground of emergency alone, it would be a very different thing, because it might often be the duty of a Government, in circumstances of emergency, to step outside the strict path of the Constitution. He did not dispute that for a moment, and he believed that nobody on his side disputed it; and if hon. Gentlemen opposite would only abandon their unconstitutional doctrines, there was, he was sure, no desire on the part of those sitting near him to make the difference between the two sides of the House more extensive than it need be. They had been informed that evening that the troops had to be secretly brought because of matters which could not be communicated to the House. But what said the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the eve of their adjournment at Easter, and on the very day before the announcement was made that these troops were to be moved from India? Why, they were assured that there was nothing new, no fresh cause of apprehension; that they might depart to their homes calmly, without delaying their holidays for a day or an hour. There was surely a great discrepancy between those two distinct representations. Assuming that this was a case of emergency, what ought the Government to have done? They ought not to have stepped further beyond the strict limits of Constitutional right than was absolutely necessary; and if they did step beyond those limits, they ought to have returned within them as soon as possible. When the House met again after the Recess, what was there to prevent the Chancellor of the Exchequer from laying at once on the Table a Vote for the men, and saying that, although it was impossible before to communicate to them the fact of the ordering of those troops to Malta, now it was known, he would urge the plea of necessity, that he proposed to ask them to vote 7,000 additional men within the Dominions of Her Majesty, and also to vote the money to pay for them? But was that the course taken, or the tone assumed? Nothing of the kind. They were told, on the contrary, that it was not necessary that any such communication should be made to Parliament at all. That was the way in which Parliament was treated. Surely, it was at least incumbent on the Government to have shown as much deference as was possible in the circumstances to Parliament? It was, therefore, the duty of those on his side—whatever course hon.

Mr. Herschell

Gentlemen opposite might think fit to take—to stand up for the rights and privileges of Parliament, and see that they were properly asserted. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had found fault with the particular terms of the Resolution; but he shrewdly suspected that any other terms would have been unsatisfactory to the right hon. Gentleman, except those of unequivocal support and admiration of the Government. He must protest against the doctrine that, whenever they criticized a departure from Constitutional right, they were to be called upon to formulate a Vote of Censure. What was that but virtually telling Gentlemen on his side—“It may be that we cannot refute your argument, but we may, at least, be able to out-vote you?” When a greater emergency than the present existed, and the country was actually at war, the present Prime Minister himself made speeches of a severe and trenchant character against the acts of the Government of the day, without following his criticisms up by a Vote of Censure. The Resolution now before the House had not been put down with the intention of embarrassing the Government. [Laughter.] He knew the belief of Roman Catholics in the infallibility of the Pope was as nothing to the belief of hon. Members opposite in the infallibility of Her Majesty’s Government. He should be the last to desire at a time like this to embarrass the Government. [“Oh, oh!”] Well, he did not care whether he was believed or not by those who apparently were unable to conceive that anyone could honestly differ from them. There were many on his side of the House who were fully conscious of the deep responsibility which rested upon Her Majesty’s Government, and would not wish to embarrass it in the least. But they were not on that account to abdicate their right to vindicate the principles of the Constitution and the Privileges of Parliament. Even now many of them would be very glad to be saved the necessity of affirming that Constitutional principle by finding it admitted by the other side. They seemed to be charged with faction. A similar charge had been made in the debates of 1776 against Edmund Burke, a man whose name would live in the memories of his countrymen, while few cared or knew anything about the Minister who uttered the charge. Again, they were charged with a want of patriotism. It might be as factious and as mischievous to the country to exaggerate and misrepresent the difference between them, as it was to give utterance to the differences. In supporting the Motion they had no desire to diminish the real Prerogatives of the Crown; but they desired to preserve those checks and limitations which the wisdom of their ancestors had imposed on them as being essential to the just balance of the Constitution and the well-being of the nation. And it was by cherishing those safeguards, not by disregarding them, that they would best maintain not only the liberties of the people, but the security of the Throne.

MR. ROEBUCK: It is, Sir, with great reluctance that I rise to take part in this debate. It appears to me that the debate itself is most inopportune, and that the mode in which it has been conducted, as well as the origin of it, is exceedingly mischievous. Why is the debate inopportune? Let us look at the exact state of the country when this matter was brought before Parliament. I do not wish, Sir, to enter into a sort of discussion which is more fit for a Court in Banco than the House of Commons. I wish to look merely at a political action on the part of the Executive Government; and I ask myself whether that political action is for the benefit of the country, or not. What is the state of things? It is said that we are in a state of profound peace. Does anybody believe that? It may be that to-morrow—aye! to-morrow—it may be made manifest to the people of this country that we are on the brink of war; and in this state of things, when the whole interests of the country are concerned, and when she is standing up for a great principle of European conduct, when she is the Representative of the great light of Europe, our country is to be assailed—how? Not by the Great Powers on the Continent who may be opposed to us, but by her own people. Is it not of the utmost possible importance at this moment that our opponents abroad should know and believe that the people of this country are a united people? But can it be supposed that the Monarch with whose Government we are now negotiating, does not listen to everything that is said in this House, and does not ask himself how the great men on the front Opposition Bench can speak as they do, if they believe that the people of this country are prepared to defend the interests of Europe in the way in which I think they ought to be defended? Does not everybody know that every sentence, every word which is uttered here, goes by telegraph to St. Petersburg; that it is there weighed, not merely by the Monarch of that country, but by his Executive Government, and that the one great thing which animates them throughout, in their opposition to England, is the notion that we are a divided, and therefore a weak people. I would ask the House, and I would ask my country, to weigh in the balance the conduct of the two sides of this House. On the one side we have the Executive Government, and will anybody say that they are not desirous to maintain the true interests of England? Will anybody say that they are not conversant with all the difficulties of the position in which they are placed, and that they have to meet not merely the difficulties abroad, but the difficulties at home? And yet, notwithstanding that, they stand firm in their determination to maintain the interests of Europe against an overruling and a despotic Power. That is the conduct on that side of the House. But what is the conduct on this side? Why, that when the Government are in this difficult position, when the interests of England are at stake, and when every word said here will either strengthen or weaken their power, hon. Members on this side come forward—with what? With a vague, general proposition on some point of technical law, which the House of Lords do not dare to call in question. And for what purpose is that done? The hon. and learned Gentleman who preceded me has said that it has been supposed, and said that it has been done for the purposes of faction. If it is not done for the purpose of faction, for what purpose has it been done? It is said that it has been done for the purpose of maintaining the great principles of the Constitution. What is the real point in debate?—because that is the question. Where is the danger to this country, to the liberties thereof, or to the power of this House? Why, it is reduced to this—On that side of the House, Ministers, looking at the resources in hand, have asked themselves what they could gain in the way of assistance from the great outlying Possession of India, and they have found, as they believe, that in the Army of India they have the means, not merely of strengthening themselves, but rather of terrifying their enemies. The Government, on that side, say that it is the undoubted Prerogative of the Crown to move any portion of the Army of the Sovereign of this country to whatever place the Sovereign may determine, the Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland only excepted. Now comes the point upon which the great question turns. Gentlemen on this side say—"No, the Crown has not that power, without the consent of Parliament." But where is the danger? If the troops are moved, and they are now being moved, what will be the result? They must be paid; they cannot exist a month without pay. Can they be paid without the assistance of Parliament? [Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] Aye! hear, hear. I want to know whether this is not the real question at issue? Is not the power of the House what it was before? And if it should turn out that Parliament decides not to pay the troops, I want to know what would be the consequence? Why, the Government opposite would be driven out of power as chaff before the wind—they could not exist there for a moment. They would not only be reduced to the level of us private people, but they would run great risk of being impeached. But is there any danger on either one side or the other? Do Ministers fear impeachment, or that what they have done will be condemned and punished by the people or by the Parliament of this country; or do they think that hon. Members on this side believe that the Government ought to be impeached? It appears to me, Sir, that when a man has risen to power and exercises sway over the minds of a great portion of his countrymen, he ought gravely and strictly to weigh every step of his conduct; and when in a grave crisis like this such a man comes forward and talks the wild talk he does, and renders people almost terrified by his vaticination, does he not believe that he is injuriously affecting the mind of a great portion of the people and strengthening the enemies of his country? You talk about patriotism, and you stand up for the rights of the people and the Privileges of Parliament, and you talk of the danger of being trampled upon by the Crown. I ask for a moment, is there a man of sane mind in this country who believes in any one of these cries? Does he believe that because 7,000 men have been removed from India to Malta without Her Majesty's Government previously telling Parliament what was about to be done—does he believe that the interests or the liberties of the people of this country are in the least danger of being infringed? Does he believe that the power of this House is less to-day than it was the day before the troops were moved? No, Sir, he does not believe it! I will describe what I think ought to have been the conduct of the Opposition at this time. It is the duty of the Opposition to watch the conduct of the Government. When this thing was discovered, they ought, in my opinion, to have come down to the Government and said—"We learn that such and such has occurred, and we believe that you have acted in a way that is contrary to the Constitution of this country, and we want you to explain what you have done." The Government would then have said—"We have acted in a great emergency; we think that secrecy is a matter of great importance. There are great difficulties, and everybody must know those difficulties, in moving those troops; and we do not at the present moment wish to discuss this question, because we believe that it is for the interest of this country that it should not be discussed." What ought, then, to have been done? The Leaders of the Opposition ought to have said—"We give you credit for what you have said; but, mind, we shall call you to account. The time will come when Parliament will step in, and will ask gravely why you have done this; and if you are not able to give us a satisfactory answer, then we shall move a Vote of Censure." That would have been straightforward and honest conduct. But what have you done? Not wishing to call in question the policy of the Government—no, not openly—you bring forward an abstract Resolution, which, if passed, would be a censure upon the Government, and you throw difficulties in their way on all points which prevent them from bringing forward a complete defence of their policy—that complete defence which I hope they will make, but which, if they do not make, they will find me as much opposed to them as any right hon. Gentleman on the front Opposition Bench. When they come to make that defence, they will make it with respect to their policy. They will say—"We thought, and we now think, such-and-such to be the law; but if we have overstepped the law, these are the grounds which induced us to do so." If those grounds are weak and insufficient, punish the Government; but do not interfere with them at the very moment when the interests and vitality of the country are concerned, and at the very moment when there is a crisis in the negotiations which are going on. While we are debating in this House, the Envoy of Russia is possibly laying before the Government the things he has to say on the part of his Sovereign, and negotiations are going on of the most delicate description. Yet in this state of things you come down and embarrass and trouble the Government with a Resolution of this sort. That is not what honest and patriotic men would do. But, Sir, this is not a departure from the rules of conduct adopted by the Opposition in this House. During the whole of the Napoleonic wars there was an Opposition in the House of Commons which did precisely the same thing—they hampered the Government, they abused the General, and until the battle of Salamanca, it was the one grand purpose of the Opposition to decry the Duke of Wellington. That is exactly what they are doing now. It is the same narrow Party spirit which guides their conduct. They feel themselves in the position that they cannot assail the Government directly; they cannot rush into their camp and say—"We will burn your camp over your heads by a Vote of Censure. Nay, we cannot do that, but we can trouble you; we can weaken the influence of your country, we can make England less powerful than she is, and we will do it." Yes, they are doing it to the utmost of their power. What other good—if that can be called a good—could result from the course of conduct which has been pursued? Does anyone believe that England will suffer from the debate which is now proceeding? I, for one, certainly do not think so; but I can easily imagine what has been passing through the minds of those who support the line of action which has been pursued by the noble Marquess who leads the Opposition in this House. They will have argued with themselves in this wise—"Oh, the Government is weak, and therefore we are delighted; the people of England may suffer, but our Party will gain." These were the only reasons I have heard during the three nights of the debate. There has been no generous conduct or generous feeling on the part of those who have opposed the Government. No one has come forward and said—"Though we think you have done wrong, the country is under your charge and the interests of it are in your guardianship. Therefore, we will not weaken your hands; we will do everything we can to aid and assist to maintain the power and dignity of England, but, mind you, we shall call you to account when the proper day arrives." If this had been done, the Opposition would have deserved the approbation and applause of the country. They might have said—"We have performed the duties of an Opposition; we have not weakened the country, but strengthened the forces of the Constitution. We have made Ministers aware that they have been under great difficulties as regards the Constitution of the Realm, and that there are men here who will never suffer that Constitution to be injured or weakened." If they had done this, they would have deserved and received the approbation of their countrymen; but, not having done it, I say, without hesitation, that they deserve, and will receive, their most severe reprobation.

MR. HALL said, that there would be no one who had heard the patriotic words of the hon. and learned and venerated Member who had just spoken, but would applaud them from the bottom of his heart, and desire that they should reach the environs of the Empire and be re-echoed by the patriotism of the English people. He trusted that hon. Gentlemen opposite would be satisfied with the exposé by the hon. and learned Member of their conduct. The more moderate opponents of Her Majesty's Government did not, he thought, so much object to what had been done, as to the manner of its doing; and this was the same complaint that hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House had to make in reference to the Motion of the noble Marquess which was now under consideration. He recognized the great advantage of having a Party in opposition which should, in the exercise of a responsibility second only to that of the Ministers of the Crown, criticize the course which the Government might take on on any particular occasion; but he counted it a great disadvantage that the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons should come down at a critical moment like the present and submit a Resolution calculated to embarrass the action of the Government and thereby to imperil the peace of Europe. It had not been proved that Her Majesty's Government had committed any breach of Constitutional law, and it could not be so proved; because, on grounds of policy, the Government had not explained their reasons for the course which they had taken, and therefore the grounds on which a judgment could be based were not in possession of the House. He remembered an occasion on which a Vote of Censure was passed upon the present Prime Minister when the House was not in possession of the facts on which the Motion was based, and he also remembered that when the facts became known, the House ate its words and revoked the Vote of Censure which had been passed by it. It might be said that the Resolution was meant to lay down a principle of Constitutional law which was to rule the action of the country for all time; but he warned the House against the tremendous responsibility which it would undertake if it consented to accept a vague Resolution drawn and placed upon the Paper, after very brief consideration, under the circumstances to which he had alluded. It was admitted that the Government might act as they had done in a great emergency; but if this Resolution was to become law, it would be quite impossible for the Government to act without the previous concurrence of the House and the country. If, in time of war, it was the duty of the Government to act without the consent of Parliament, how much more was it their duty to act on their own responsibility in time of peace—or rather in time when war was not actually declared—to avert war? How inconsistent was the Opposition. They said, why did not the Government come to the House and ask for a Vote of Credit, as it would have been granted?

Mr. Roebuck

But they knew what would have happened. The Opposition would have debated that proposal for a long time, and the Government knew it was their bounden duty not to waste more time than was possible in the course which they felt they must pursue. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) had drawn a lurid picture of England's liberties crashing in red ruin around us in consequence of the action of the Government; but the Leader of the Opposition Party, to which the right hon. Gentleman belonged, had not seen it necessary to ask the opinion of Parliament upon the subject. He had simply spoken in the House of Lords upon a Motion referring to a point of Constitutional law, and had not asked his Peers to accept a Motion such as certainly would not be accepted by the House of Commons. His hon. and learned Colleague said the other night that he approved the policy of Her Majesty's Government. He (Mr. Hall) was delighted to read that announcement in the papers, and he could not help asking himself how ancient was that conversion, and what had it to do with the public opinion out-of-doors? [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: I never said anything of the kind.] His hon. and learned Colleague must, then, settle his account with the reporters of The Times. He certainly was so reported. But if his hon. and learned Colleague did support the policy of Her Majesty's Government, it was a thousand pities that, during some of the crucial divisions which had been taken, he did not go into the Lobby with them, instead of leaving the House, thus setting a bad example to smaller men. Well, the country quite agreed with that opinion as to the policy of Her Majesty's Government, and the real practical question which would be asked by every common-sense Englishman was this—Is the end in view not sufficient to justify the movement of the Indian troops, which is one of the means of attaining that end? It was clear that that movement was on all fours with the grant of £6,000,000 and the calling out of the Reserves, each of which the House approved. It was one of the means by which Great Britain showed her resolve to stand upon Treaty obligations at all costs. The noble Lord opposite might, of course, question the propriety of employing Indian soldiers to settle European difficulties; but he ought not to forget that one of the principal aims of Her Majesty's Government was to safeguard other than merely British interests; that they had interests, perhaps primary interests, in Asia; and that, therefore, it would have been the height of folly to ignore Asiatic soldiers. Our interests were Imperial, and they must be Imperially defended. Did the noble Lord and his Friends mean to say that England was to tie one of her arms behind her back, on the principle divide et impera, in the interests of Russia? Were they to tell Indian soldiers that they were never to be employed except against their own fellow-countrymen? Was it not wiser to tell them they were free to help us to safeguard our interests in India or in Europe? History would so regard the matter. Lord Beaconsfield, notwithstanding all that his enemies could say, had proved himself to be a great statesman, and the loyalty of India was never so firmly riveted as it was on the day when the order went forth that the Native Indian troops of the Queen were not unworthy to stand side by side and shoulder to shoulder with Her European soldiers in defence of Her Empire. If the Government was right in maintaining that the Treaty of San Stefano ought to be subjected to a revision by the European Powers, let that determination be sustained with the resources of the Empire. Firmness at a great national crisis was often the harbinger of peace; discord—and more especially House of Commons' discord—might be the sure forerunner of war. Signs were not wanting that Europe approved the firm attitude of England. The French Press was almost unanimous on the subject, and the public opinion of that enlightened country approved the unflinching attitude of Her Majesty's Government. Owing to that firmness the Russian mission to Austria had signally failed; and now, the eyes of Russia, having searched in vain through Europe for sympathy, were fixed with feverish earnestness on Her Majesty's Opposition. Well, was the old game to be played a little longer, or would the noble Lord and his Friends adopt the advice of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck)? He feared they would not. They would press this wretched Resolution—an act which he regarded as a deliberate attempt to embarrass the legitimate action of Her Majesty's Government. He wanted to know what was the compact that existed on the Opposition Benches, under which the noble Lord was to hunt not only with those above, but with those below the Gangway? They talked of a dual Government; but was there one Opposition above the Gangway going to vote for this Resolution, because it did not condemn the foreign policy of Ministers; because it would not pledge the noble Lord and his friends to any opposite course, and another Opposition below the Gangway going to vote for it; because it did condemn that policy, and because it would pledge this House, if adopted, to the tactics of the Birmingham League, he feared it was useless to appeal to the noble Lord or to his Friends. It would, however, be an extraordinary thing if they were able to persuade the English people that it was of no advantage to this country that she should find a latent power which no one had thought of, and which in time of war or under the apprehension of war would be to her of inestimable value, and which in time of peace cost the British taxpayer absolutely nothing. Surely, in the history of Parliamentary Government no Party had ever made so serious and extraordinary a blunder as had the noble Lord and his supporters? What fatal counsellor had the noble Lord taken to his bosom? What clever fellow had devised this expedient, and persuaded the noble Lord that the English people would not see through it. The English people would see through it. They would not be misled by all those legal technicalities. The Resolution of the noble Lord opposite he boldly arraigned at the bar of English common sense—public opinion; first, because it was unpatriotic; and, secondly, because it was ill-timed; and it was unpatriotic, simply, because it was ill-timed. If there were the smallest hope that the Resolution would be withdrawn, they might offer the olive-branch to hon. Gentlemen opposite, and forget the past; but, alas! there was no such hope, and therefore they must condemn it in no measured terms. If the noble Lord had waited until the existing strain was lessened, until the present tension was passed, and then come down to the House of Commons and asked them to carefully consider anything he thought he had discovered in the conduct of Her Majesty's Government which was fatal to that Constitutional discipline which they all desired to see maintained, the House would have given a careful and candid consideration to his Resolution; but to move it now was needlessly, at a most critical moment, to embarrass the action of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. WADDY: As time is of great importance, and we have a serious matter to discuss, I shall not follow the hon. Member for Oxford, who has just sat down, through the somewhat excited irrelevancies in which he indulged; nor will I refer at any length to the observations of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, who, from his years, is possibly entitled to more respectful consideration than he would otherwise have received at our hands. We cannot help rejoicing that the old spirit still exists, even though there be some diminution of the old strength. At the same time, we can only bewail that the charming impartiality with which he formerly dealt with both sides of the House has disappeared, and that the hon. and learned Member reserves his favours entirely for those among whom it is his pleasure to sit. Times change, and, of course, people change also; but it is on record that the hon. and learned Member, in 1857, spoke strongly in reference to the employment of Indian troops in a war in which we were then engaged, describing it as an unconstitutional proceeding. On that occasion he strongly denounced the conduct of the noble Lord then at the head of the Government, and declared that it had been reserved for a Liberal Prime Minister to cast a slur and stigma upon the House of Commons, and he even went to the length of bringing forward a definitive Resolution condemning the conduct of the Ministers. If the hon. and learned Member had been in his place, I should have read extracts from his speech, but in his absence I refrain. The question actually before us is one of the deepest importance—it is one of principle—and does not, as has been suggested, depend on the existence of a supposed emergency, or on mere financial considerations. The question of emergency might afford ground for an attack on the policy of the Government; but this is comparatively unimportant. The matter is far too serious for Party struggles, or a Party division. I care little what may be the result of the debate with regard to numbers. I care not whether a Vote of Censure is passed on the Government or not; but it is an important matter whether a breach has been made in the Constitution. We have pursued precisely the course which the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield says we should have adopted. When we were informed of the novel action of the Government, the question was fairly and frankly asked, whether the number of men allowed by the Mutiny Act has or has not been exceeded? What answer have we obtained? It is admitted that such is the case; but, instead of pleading emergency—a plea which, if made, should, in my opinion, be received with great consideration—the Government replies that the Resolution to call Indian troops to Malta was taken some time ago, and that it was not necessary that such a decision should be communicated to Parliament. Now, that answer lays down a most serious, and as we think, a most unconstitutional and dangerous principle. It propounds an issue which the Opposition were therefore in duty bound to accept. But it should be accepted and fought in no factious spirit. The view taken of the matter by myself, and—as I have reason to know—by many of my Friends near me, is not factious. It is simply this—By some means or other the Government has been misled, and they have stepped over the lines of the Constitution, but no actual and serious mischief has been done, and the breach has not been committed wilfully; if, therefore, the Chancellor of the Exchequer now comes forward and admits that there has been a transgression of the law, relying for his justification on the emergency which some of his Supporters seem doubtfully to plead, we should be ready to do anything to save the Government from annoyance and trouble. But, if this ground be not taken, then we must earnestly contend that the act of the Government is utterly illegal and unconstitutional. They have practically increased the standing Army of the country by 7,000 men without consulting Parliament, and, when called upon to account for it, they answer—not, “There is an exigency,” but “the movement of the troops is quite within the Prerogative of the Crown; you have nothing to do with it, except that if you bide your time, you will have the pleasure of paying the bill.” No doubt, an Army when raised is under the care and management of the Crown; but the raising of an Army belongs to Parliament, which has always restricted its strength by mentioning either the number of men or the money to be expended—which is practically the same thing—or both. It is said for the Government, that the Crown has two Armies, the Forces of which can be interchanged in any way, although the result might be that you might fill every Colonial garrison with Indian troops, and so liberate the whole domestic Army for any purpose the Crown pleased. As the Indian Army is practically unlimited, there would be no restriction on the augmentation of the domestic Army for purely political purposes. In the view of the Opposition this is not a question of finance, but one of the liberties of the country. It was no question of finance at the time of the Bill of Rights. James II. kept 30,000 men out of his Civil List; he did not ask for a farthing on their account from Parliament; but he had no right to have them at all without the consent of Parliament; that was the complaint made against him; the country would not submit to it; and, practically, the Government is doing the same thing now. It is true that in the list of charges against James, contained in the Preamble of the Bill of Rights, there was a double complaint with respect to these Forces. It was declared that James had done wrong by raising and keeping a standing Army within this Kingdom without the consent of Parliament, and by quartering soldiers against the law. Afterwards, when the Declaration was embodied in the Act, nothing was said about finance or about quartering; but the thing forbidden was the having the men. We do not anticipate any danger now, but we are bound to provide against their future occurrence. The argument against the legality of the movement of these troops is based on several grounds. It has already been stated, repeatedly, that we hold it to be a clear infringement of the Bill of Rights; that it contravenes both in letter and spirit the provisions of the annual Mutiny Acts; and I shall also contend that it is a direct breach of the very Act passed for the regulation of our Indian relations. I do not propose to add anything to the observations which have been made by hon. Members on this side of the House on the subject of the Bill of Rights, for those arguments have not been met by the Supporters of the Government, and they are, practically, unanswered. The only attempt at a defence was that which was made by my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, and it is a remarkable proof of the propriety of our contention that, finding it impossible to support his arguments by history, he has ingeniously provided a new history to fit his arguments. The reply of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich has exhausted that part of the subject, and I turn to the consideration of the Mutiny Acts, because I think there are certain views of them which have not been adequately developed, and certain quotations which it will be useful to make. The Supporters of the Government have two modes of avoiding the restriction on the Prerogative which we say is contained in the Mutiny Acts. They rely on the form of words. They are—

“Whereas the raising or keeping a standing Army within the Kingdom in time of peace, unless it be with consent of Parliament, is against law.”

The Government points to the words “within the Kingdom,” and to the words “in time of peace,” and they found an argument on each of those expressions. They say—first, that those Acts refer only to the Kingdom of Great Britain, and not to the Colonies or to troops employed in foreign operations; and, secondly, that the Acts provide only for times when we are at peace with other nations. I contend that both these suggestions are totally unfounded. I shall show, I believe, that the Acts cover all Her Majesty's Dominions at home and abroad, and that they provide not only for “time of peace,” in the sense in which those words have hitherto been used in this debate, but for all periods and exigencies of external war. Of course, if any part of our territories should be assailed, the principle would apply—that inter arma legis. But a careful analysis of the Preambles of the Acts, and especially of the earlier ones—to which no reference has hitherto been made in the course of the debate—will show that the “peace” there mentioned is only peace as opposed to civil or internal war, and, with this exception, they provide for all the contingencies not only of threatened, but of actual conflict. It would occupy the time of the House unduly, if I were to deal with these questions separately, and to read the Acts twice, to support first one contention and then the other; and I will endeavour, as briefly as possible, to show now their bearing on both points. The language of the Mutiny Acts was borrowed, in the first instance, from the Bill of Rights. It was obviously desirable, then, to cleave closely to the precise expressions used in that great Charter, and it was equally important to preserve the same formula in succeeding years. But, to appreciate the meaning of the word “now,” we must ask, what did they mean “then?” and it has been admitted by the Lord Chancellor in “another place,” and by the Attorney General in this debate, that the word “Kingdom” originally included all the Dominions of the Crown. And, as those Dominions extended geographically, the political meaning of the word extended with them, until 1858. There never have been two Armies—one for our home, and one for our foreign possessions. The one Mutiny Act has been the only authority under which any Army has existed, and it has contemplated the defence of all our territories and the maintaining of our wars in all parts of the world. The Attorney General has argued with great energy, and amongst the cheers of his Friends, that danger of war should be considered tantamount to war, and justifies a breach of the Act. He would not have committed himself to such an argument, if he had referred to the very first Mutiny Act, passed in April, 1689, which, after reciting that it was against law to raise or keep a standing Army in time of peace without the consent of Parliament, says that it was adjudged necessary to maintain Forces “during this time of danger.” But the case is far stronger. Not only is “danger” no ground for extending the Prerogative, but even actual war is provided for specifically, showing that both peace and war are supposed to exist together, and that the peace so mentioned is, as I have said, only peace from internal war. For, in the same year—1689—there was a second Mutiny Act passed six months after the first. At that time the danger had become a reality. The war had actually broken out with France, and the words of the Act were “during this time of war"—and we shall find that this, or a similar form, has been constantly adopted since that time. Another amazing statement was made by the Attorney General—that though, after the Revolution, troops were maintained in Ireland for many years, these were outside the Mutiny Acts, and were never provided for by them. Why, the very first Act sets forth that the Forces it allows are "for the safety of the Kingdom, for the common defence of the Protestant religion, and for the reducing of Ireland." The same form is repeated in the second Act. In 1690, the words are "for the reducing of Ireland, and for the carrying on of the war against France." Similar language is found in the successive Acts, and the same principles have governed Parliament from that time to this. I shall not detain the House by multiplying examples, but will come at once to later times, pausing only for a moment on the year 1814, when, in the very height of our struggle with France—when, if ever, an excuse might have been found for neglecting the law—the Act will be found to prescribe every man that was to be enrolled for the defence of the Kingdom, our Colonies and Dependencies. The next year to which our attention should be specially directed is 1857, the year before India was transferred from the control of the Company to the sole Dominion of the Crown. Up to that time we claimed no jurisdiction over the Native Army, and much of the confusion that has marked the arguments of hon. Members on the other side, arises from their not having distinguished between the Indian Native and the Indian European Armies. The Mutiny Act of that year provided for our entire domestic Army, carefully excluding any of the European regiments that should be in the territorial possessions of the East India Company, but as carefully including all those which were recruiting at home. The state of things, therefore, at that time was this—The European Army in India might be transferred to this country, or elsewhere, for the Service of the Crown; but, if so, it must appear in the enumeration in the Mutiny Act; but the Native Army was not at our disposal for any purposes whatever outside the possessions of the Company. I will show, immediately, that this is still the law; but I will first challenge the other side to accept a simple and conclusive test. We are told that we may move these 7,000 Native soldiers to Malta, because the Imperial Army and the Indian Army are now one, and the Crown has the power to transfer its troops at pleasure, to or from any part of Her Majesty's Dominions. Then, can you bring back to England or Malta, or place on the Imperial Service and Revenue 7,000 European troops, not included in the Mutiny Act, because they come within the excepted troops in India? Most, if not all, of the instances which have been given on behalf of the Government do not touch this question at all, for the simple reason that they are cases in which the troops have been employed within the territorial possessions of the East India Company, and are, therefore, clearly outside the Imperial jurisdiction. The geographical limits of those territories were defined by Charters, and have been repeated and ratified by Acts of Parliament down to the present reign, and include all the territory between the Straits of Magellan and the Cape of Good Hope; so that the Expeditions to China, Abyssinia, and so forth, are quite beside the question. The test to which I invite the Government is simple enough. You are authorized to have within the Dominions of the Crown a certain number of European troops. That authority expressly excludes the European Army of India. Do you maintain that you are entitled to bring over 20,000 Europeans in addition to those allowed by the Mutiny Act? I do not think anyone will be found bold enough to assert that right. Then, if you cannot bring Europeans, by what right can you bring Sepoys? If they are one Army, one argument applies. But the fact is that they are not one. The Native Army is entirely governed by Articles of War made by the Governor General, while the European troops are governed by an annual Mutiny Act and distinct Articles of War; and yet we are bravely told that Indian Native troops and European troops are convertible terms. It remains for us to ascertain what new powers have really been conferred upon Her Majesty in consequence of Her taking the place of the old East India Company. What are the powers which the Governor General and the Company possessed, and to which the Crown has succeeded? The military power of the Company was founded, or, at all events, consolidated, by its most important Charter in 1698, and was recognized and ratified by the East India Mutiny Act, 26 & 27 Geo. II. c. 9. Both the Charter and the Act restricted the use of the Indian Army to the defence of the Settlements, Plantations, and Factories within the limits of the Company, and evidently never contemplated the possibility of the men being called upon to serve elsewhere. An attempt has been made to extract from some words in the Act of 1833 an implied, but not an expressed, justification of the action of the Government. That Statute gives the Governor General certain powers with respect to the troops, "wheresoever they may be serving." But those words must, of course, be interpreted by their meaning at the time they were used. In 1833, they could only be employed by the Governor General within his own jurisdiction. He could not send them to take part in any operations outside that limit. The "wheresoever," therefore, cannot extend the authority of the Governor General, or the duties of his troops, beyond the territories confided to him by Charter and Statute. This, then, was the state of things until 1858, and in that year the Company expired, and the Crown took its place. India became a Colony or Dependency of this country on one of two principles—either its relations with us became the same as those of our other Colonies and Dependencies, or they were modified by its preceding history, Charters, and Statutes. No other terms have ever been sanctioned by Parliament, and without such sanction no others can exist. And on neither of these hypotheses can the present claim of Prerogative be based. There is, however, a very important fact still to be observed. The conditions of our rule were authoritatively settled by the Act of 1858, to which reference has already been made. But the most important section of that Act has not hitherto been cited. We have had a long discussion about Section 55, and the implied arguments to be based upon it; but, after all, it is merely a financial section, and does not directly affect the question of the troops. But the next section is precisely in point. It is as follows:—

"The military and naval Forces of the East India Company shall be deemed to be the military and naval Forces of Her Majesty, and shall be under the same obligation to serve Her Majesty as they would have been under to serve the Company, and shall be liable to serve within the same territorial limits only,"

&c.; and such Forces were to be and continue subject to all Acts of Parliament and laws of the Governor General and all Articles of War relating to the East India Company. It is true that the 57th section gives certain powers to the Governor General of India in Council; but that does not affect our present argument, for two reasons. In the first place, those powers can only be exercised within his jurisdiction; and, in the second place, no such powers have, in fact, been exercised with regard to the Native Army, though they have with respect to the European troops. So that, apart from all financial considerations, there is a distinct provision that the only condition on which Parliament has sanctioned the authority of the Crown over this large Army is that it should not be used for purposes other than those for which it was designed, and should not become a factor in domestic politics, or a possible danger to our national liberties. Will any man in his senses, in the face of that clause, say that the Government was entitled to take these troops to Malta, Canada, or to any other part of the world? It cannot be said that the Act only applied to the then existing Army, for the clause goes on to say that it should apply to Forces hereafter to be enlisted. Thus it is clearly shown, that it was never contemplated that these Forces should pass from the jurisdiction of the Governor General. There is, in fact, a definite warning against the step taken by the Government, who have decidedly acted in an illegal and unconstitutional manner. I entreat the Government to admit that they have overstepped the law, and I, for one, if they fall back on the plea of emergency, will not inquire too closely into that plea. It would be wrong on the part of the Opposition to needlessly criticize the action of the Government in a time of emergency and peril; but what I insist on is that, if the occasion appears to them to demand exceptional measures, they should not attempt to defend them on statutory authority, and to set up a dangerous precedent. The Attorney General has said that in the financial check which it can exercise, Parliament has almost complete control over the action of the Crown in these matters; but Parliament will not be satisfied with anything short of complete control. It has been stated that these Indian troops have been moved to Malta for the sake of making an impression, as to the great power which this country possesses, on Russia, or that they may be in readiness in the event of war breaking out. But if we are to commence operations by making a great breach in the Constitution—for such I maintain the act of the Government is—even though we should by that breach bring Russia to her knees and make her our vassal for centuries, such a result would be dearly bought. Whatever may be the consequences of the war, it is the safer course far to be true to ourselves and to the great principles of the Constitution.

“This England never did, nor never shall Lie at the proud foot of a conqueror;
But when it first did help to wound itself.

Come the three corners of the world in arms,
And we shall shock them: naught shall make us rue,

If England to itself do rest but true.’

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he hoped that, before the debate was brought to a close, some explanation would be given in regard to Clause 56 of the Act, which appeared to limit the services of Her Majesty's troops in India to Indian territory. That was the only point on which he had a doubt in connection with this part of the subject. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), when he declaimed against anyone venturing to find fault with the Government at a critical time in the history of the country, seemed entirely to forget what occurred in 1854-5, when he himself moved for a Committee to inquire into the conduct of the Ministry of that day in regard to the Crimean War. Bearing in mind that fact, the hon. and learned Gentleman ought, he thought, to have some consideration for those who deemed it to be their duty not to vote blindly for the Government on the present occasion. For his own part, though he had been told that, as holding a position in the Army, he ought not to vote against the Government, yet he felt that it was because he had had the Mutiny Act before him for 40 years that he was somewhat qualified to form an opinion on the question under discussion. He had, he might add, the same doubts as to the legality of the step which had been taken by the Government which had been so well explained by the hon. and learned Member for Barnstaple (Mr. Waddy). He had listened to the debate with great attention, but he was still at a loss to know whether the Government rested their justification of the step they had taken upon its legality, or upon its necessity. He based his view of the matter upon the ground of its illegality and its violation of the provisions of the 55th section of the Act of 1858, whereby these troops were to serve only within the territorial limits of India, to which reference had just been made. He had carefully examined the whole of this question, and he believed that when these troops arrived at Malta very considerable difficulty would be found to arise in connection with trials by court martial. It was admitted that those troops were only kept in discipline by the Indian Articles of War, and the Articles in question, framed by the Governor General for Indian territories, did not apply to Malta. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Colonies thought it was necessary to keep the knowledge of the intended movement of these Indian troops secret on military grounds. He (Sir Alexander Gordon) had supposed there might be a diplomatic difficulty, but he could not see how there could be any military difficulty; and it was, he could not help thinking, somewhat alarming to be told, when we might be on the eve of embarking on one of the greatest wars of the century, that the practical difficulties, in a military sense, in the way of transferring 7,000 men from India to Malta were so great that the Government might have had to abandon the whole scheme of employing Indian troops at all.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: The question was one of time. The occurrence of the monsoon had to be considered.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he could not conceive how that difficulty could arise, because the monsoon did not begin in Bombay till the first week in June, and on the South coast of Madras it was a little earlier—about the end of May—and the decision of the Government was come to in April. He was glad, however, to find that it was not the military difficulty which had operated on the minds of the Government. It ought to have been stated, he thought, as a naval difficulty. He came to the House to give an opinion on points upon which he believed he possessed some slight information. He did not come there to walk or crawl in a narrow groove cut out for him by any Party Leader, but to state his views freely and honestly; and he trusted such further explanations would be given on behalf of the Government as would enable him to have the pleasure of going into the same Lobby with the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. J. HOLMS said, the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield had rebuked that side of the House for embarrassing Her Majesty's Government by the course they had taken on that occasion; but the hon. and learned Gentleman himself, in 1855, brought forward a Motion which in no small degree embarrassed the Government of that day, although he knew perfectly well that our Army was in the face of the enemy, and that the difficulties of the Executive were very great. No doubt, the hon. and learned Member brought forward the Motion from a sense of duty, and when he charged the Opposition with embarrassing the Government, he ought to remember that they, too, were acting from a sense of duty. He admitted that any Government in time of difficulty had a right to expect from the House of Commons not only great consideration, but complete indulgence; but when a Government asked for such indulgence, the House might fairly expect to have been treated with courtesy, frankness, and consideration. There were two points which they had now to consider—first, did Her Majesty's Government, in moving the Native Indian troops, contravene the spirit of the Constitution? and, secondly, how far did they, by withholding information, treat the House with disrespect? If the contention of the Attorney General was correct, that the power which had been exercised by the Government was a proper one under the Mutiny Act and India Act, the inevitable result would be that next year, in discussing the number of men, the House certainly need not be troubled with any Motion for reducing the numbers, for the Government would be able at any time to increase the number to an indefinite extent. Moreover, in that case, it would be necessary to discuss the question of the whole military services of the two countries—not only as to the number, but as to the quality of the men. The movement of the Indian troops was an infringement not only of the Mutiny Act, but of the Indian Government Act of 1858. With regard to the First Class Army Reserve, the Government had also done that which required some explanation. According to the Act of Parliament, no one was to be engaged in the First Class Army Reserve who was over 34 years of age. He had reason to know that men who, when they asked for re-engagement, were told that they could not be re-engaged in the Reserve, because it would be illegal, as they were over 34 years of age, were afterwards sent for and re-engaged.

GENERAL SHUTE rose to Order. The hon. Gentleman was discussing a Question which had nothing to do with the subject before the House.

MR. SPEAKER said, that as the Question before the House was, that so Forces might be raised or kept by the Crown without the consent of Parliament, he did not think the hon. Gentleman was out of Order.

MR. J. HOLMS said, the Government had treated the House rather as a voting machine than a Representative Assembly; they sought to rule without Parliamentary control, and did not give the House information of which they were in possession, and which it was absolutely necessary that the House should have. The only explanation which the House had got from the Government was, that it was their humour to do as they had done. Acts of that kind came upon the country with a surprise which was quite unnecessary. No doubt the intention was to alarm Europe; but it was absurd to suppose that five great Powers, who together could bring 4,000,000 men into the field, would be alarmed by our bringing some 7,000 troops from India. The result, however, was greatly to alarm the commercial community. When the Government declared they had nothing to tell the House, telegrams were the same day in the hands of merchants in the City stating that troops were to leave Bombay. The consequence of this want of candour was, that the trade of the country became paralyzed. He, for one, rejoiced at the resolute stand made by the noble Marquess the Leader of the Opposition, and he believed that the House would give the Motion now before it very considerable support.

GENERAL SHUTE said, his hon. Friend who had just sat down suggested that an Army of 10,000 English and 20,000 Natives would be sufficient for India. Did the hon. Gentleman know the vast area of our territorial possessions in India, our great extent of frontier, the warlike tribes on our frontiers? Did he know that the aggregate forces maintained by the semi-independent States within our own Empire amounted to upwards of 300,000 men; and, if so, how could he advance such an argument? He was puzzled to think what could be the object of all the laborious special pleading which the House had heard that evening, unless it was to reduce the power of England and to weaken our foreign policy. He had hoped, after the common-sense and most admirable speech of the veteran of the House (Mr. Roebuck), of whom they ought to be proud, followed by the most eloquent and able speech of the hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Hall), they would be able to get away from the quibbles of the law and that most questionable logic. Confining himself to the common-sense point of view, and avoiding legal quibbles, he would speak of the diplomatic and military exigencies of the case. Russia had always less power than desire for aggression. Her great territorial space, and the thinness of her population, rendered her military power less formidable in proportion to her extent than that of other countries; but the Crimean War showed her what was necessary, and her railways had now been constructed with a view to strategical and original, rather than to other purposes. England was in a state somewhat similar to that of Russia, until the great political mind of the Prime Minister had solved the problem. He had shown us that we could concentrate speedily, though not so secretly as was desirable, for military purposes all the power of England—from her Colonies, Dependencies, and great Indian Empire—upon an important strategical point. Mere common sense forbade us to believe that this newly-developed power could ever threaten England's Constitution or England's liberty. Hon. Members opposite were animated by a sort of feminine vexation and spite that they were not let into a particular secret before the Recess, and a few had adopted a tone highly disapproved of by the majority of their own Party. One leading Liberal, in his constituency said to him the other day — "General, I am fast becoming a Tory;" and another, who owed a Baronetcy to a Liberal Government, had told him that the conduct of a certain section had made him ashamed of his Party. He should have liked to see the advanced guard of our Indian Army established at Malta before the intention to move them had become known to the House, and, consequently, to Europe; because he believed that that would have greatly increased the power and the influence of this country in favour of peace. Campaigns were so quickly decided now that it was dangerous to draw too marked a line between great danger of war and actual war. In military affairs it was always dangerous to show your hand, and how often had the Opposition endeavoured to force the Government to show their hand? To gain their political ends, some Members opposite would positively rejoice in the diplomatic failure of the Government, and even in a military disaster. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER said, that the hon. and gallant Member had exceeded the limits of Parliamentary debate in imputing such motives to Members of this House.

GENERAL SHUTE begged to apologize for having used the language in the heat of debate, and to withdraw it. Still, however, he must say that he believed that there existed a very small section of the Opposition who cared little what happened, provided it might facilitate the passage of those straits [pointing to the floor of the House], and their occupation of this Constantinople [pointing to the Ministerial Bench]. It had been urged, on the one hand, that Indian soldiers would conduce to our defeat if they engaged the Russian troops; and, on the other, that it would be a very dangerous thing if we were to gain a victory by their aid. In the first place, the Indian troops, when well officered by British officers, would be able to hold their own against the Russians; and, in the second place, without those British officers, they would be powerless against ourselves. A full complement of officers, however, they must have—instead of seven there should be 27 a regiment. Why should we not use thees Native soldiers, rather than more of our Reserve men, the loss of whose skilled labour in civil life would inflict damage on the trade of the country? It had been urged that no extra Supplies were needed; but he had strong reason, drawn from personal experience, of the Crimean War, for believing that it was as disgraceful to the country as to humanity to send out troops, either for possible or actual warfare, unless they were well found in the necessaries of life and comfort. He was at the Russian manœuvres at Warsaw a few months before the Crimean War. At Count Orloff's table it was remarked—"Great friends as we are here, we may be even now at war in the East." A General Tanshaw remarked—"No; the House of Commons won't allow the means." Another Russian General said—"No; there can be no war; you are making no preparations." Our supposed forbearance was imposed on, and we drifted into war. Had we then showed a determined front, there would have been no war. Although he hoped and believed in the present crisis war would be avoided, yet he maintained that it was our duty to be prepared for it. The nation whose foreign policy was influenced more by fear of war than love of peace was as much to be despised as the man who, in regard to his moral and religious obligations, acted more from the fear of the Devil than the love of God. Loving peace, permanent peace, as she did, England, by her present preparations, had virtually put herself to forbid war.

Mr. SYNAN condemned the Government for having pursued two distinct policies in regard to this question—one of peace on the floor of Parliament, and one of war outside. It reminded him of the character of Trinculo in the play, with his two voices—the one a backward voice, uttering denunciations and threatening war, in the person of the Prime Minister; and the other the forward voice, promising peace, in the person of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He would not have taken any part in the debate but for the Constitutional question which had been raised, and for its bearing upon the law of Ireland, and he thought that question had been discussed in ignorance of the law and Constitution of Ireland. The noble Lord had told the House that he intended to confine himself to a discussion of the Constitutional question, and to obtain, if possible, such an opinion from the House as would prevent any Government in future from pursuing the course which Her Majesty's Government had followed, and he (Mr. Synan) would follow the same course. And the Home Secretary had that evening repeated the same statement, that he would confine himself to the Constitutional question. Now, in discussing this question of Constitutional law, he did not think that any hon. Member could doubt what was the real position of the case. As early as the time of King Charles I., it was declared that the government of the Army was under the control of the Sovereign, and he thought it was impossible to deny that, subject to the power of the House, Her Majesty's Prerogative was a substantial part of the Constitution, and that She had the supreme command of the Army. That Prerogative had been approved of by Mr. Fox, and by the celebrated Lord Chatham, and it still existed. That Prerogative was subject to two checks—first, the Mutiny Bill under the Bill of Rights, and secondly, the power of the purse in voting the Supplies. Then, had the Government infringed the Bill of Rights? In regard to the Bill of Rights, he would ask what was the meaning of the word "Kingdom?" It was contended that it meant England, but he thought that could not be a sound construction. It must mean something wider. The word "Kingdom" meant the Dominions of Her Majesty where the Common Law existed, for the Bill of Rights was a declaratory Act, and the Mutiny Act was founded on the Bill of Rights, and was co-extensive with it. It had been argued that Ireland was a Dependency of the Crown, like India, to which the Mutiny Act did not extend. That argument was founded upon a complete misapprehension. Ireland was within the Bill of Rights, and included in the Mutiny Act. Until 1780 the English Mutiny Act extended to Ireland, and in 1780 an Irish Mutiny Bill was passed in the Irish Parliament, and the Army there was regulated by the Irish Mutiny Act until 1800. He should submit that the Bill of Rights applied to all part of these Dominions.

General Shute

The question was whether the course which the Government had taken was a violation of the Bill of Rights? and that would depend upon this—whether the standing Army in India had been made subject to the same checks by the Act of 1858 as the Army in this country. If the Indian Army was not under the absolute control of the Crown, the Government had no right to send the men to Malta. He contended that if the Bill of Rights extended to Malta, the removal of the Native Indian troops to that island was illegal, unless it was warranted by the Act of 1858. Was it so warranted? It had been pointed out that evening, that the 56th clause of the Act prohibited the employment of Native Indian troops beyond the boundaries of India. It was true that the Act, in another section, gave the Crown power to remove the troops from India; but it limited the exercise of the power to the case of invasion, or to great and sudden emergency, and such a state of things had not been proved to have arisen. So far as the opinion of Ireland was concerned its sympathies were entirely anti-Russian. The Irish people trusted that the time had now arrived when the aggression of Russia would be controlled by this country, acting in conjunction with the other Powers of Europe. He held that, on the grounds of secrecy and urgency, the Government had made no defence for its conduct, and he must give the Resolution his support.

Lord ROBERT MONTAGU: Sir, I crave the indulgence of the House for five minutes, while I endeavour to indicate the course which I intend to take, and the grounds for taking it—a course which I determined on before coming down to the House this evening, and which has become firmly fixed in my mind by the first part of the Home Secretary's speech—a course which some of my Friends in this House, to whom I have spoken on the subject, also purpose to follow. It is not my intention to dabble in the Constitutional lore, which has already flooded the House to a baneful degree. There are two grounds for that intention. The first is that, although I have studied the legal aspects of the question, the House will not care to hear a layman's conclusions on the subject, after so many able lawyers, on both sides, have spoken their opinions; and the second ground is, that the real question before the House is not to be found buried under the musty lumber and dusty lore of law. The point at issue lies in the question whether there is an emergency or not—whether the step taken was necessary or not. The Chancellor of the Exchequer knows the answer, and will doubtless inform the House, if he can do so consistently with the requirements of the public service and the interests of the country; or, if he feels that it will not be safe to do so now, then, when the present state of affairs has passed away, and the prevailing tension has become relaxed, he can be called upon to make the required disclosure, and be brought to account for the step which the Ministers have advised Her Majesty to take. I desire, Sir, to recall the House to an examination of the two propositions which are before us. I must premise that, by the word Constitution, I mean the laws, the constituted laws of the Kingdom. I know no abstract thing called “a Constitution” apart from the laws, written or unwritten, under which we live. What, then, is the Resolution of the noble Marquess?—

“By the laws of this Realm, no Forces may be raised or kept by the Crown, in time of peace, without the consent of Parliament, within any part of the Dominions of the Crown;”

and so forth. My study of the legal question has not led me to such a conclusion. Moreover, it seems from actual facts that the assertion cannot be true. For there are Forces in Canada, which have been raised in the Colony; and at the Cape, in Australia, and in New Zealand. These have not been raised, and are not maintained, with the consent of the Imperial Parliament. Or, if you say that, as they have been raised under the Acts of Parliament which govern those Colonies and permit the maintenance of Colonial troops, then I reply that in India the troops are raised and maintained under the Act of 1858. What, then, can be the meaning in the qualifying words of the Resolution, “excepting only such Forces as may be actually serving within Her Majesty's Indian Possessions?” Sir, I do not think that the Resolution is a true statement of the law, and, therefore, I cannot support it. Look at it, moreover, in this light. It certainly is the law, or it is not. If not, then why endeavour to place it upon our Journals to eke out its ineffective and dishonoured existence? The law is stronger than a Resolution of the House, and a Resolution which is not in accordance with the law must be unavailing out-of-doors. If, on the other hand, it is a true statement of the law, then why place it on the Journals of the House? The law is there, in the Statute Books on the Table, and may be appealed to and enforced without difficulty. The only aim of the noble Marquess must, therefore, be to censure the Government. But, if so, why not censure them openly and boldly, instead of covertly and under a cloud? I shall return to this point again. In the meanwhile, let us turn to the Amendment. Again I shall use the word "legal" for "Constitutional." How does the Amendment run?—

"This House is of opinion that the legal control of Parliament consists in [the exact words are 'is fully secured by'] the provisions of the law."

Of course! It needs no angel from Heaven to tell us that. No apostle need preach on earth to make us believe such a doctrine as that. It is a truism which no one can contradict. How does the Amendment continue?—"And by the undoubted power of this House to grant or refuse Supplies." This little phrase contains the whole point of the Amendment, and I shall ask the House to consider it presently. But, let me first ask, why does the Amendment not stop there? Is that not enough? I will tell you why. Because such an Amendment is not the contradictory of the Resolution. Contradictory propositions are such that every person must affirm one of them and deny the other. But, in this case, every person may, with perfect consistency, vote for both Resolution and Amendment; or he may vote against both, and hold some third opinion. In order to withdraw attention from this defect, certain words have been added, which plead with the House not to weaken the hands of the Government. Having devised this acute scheme, what did the Government do? They did not take some Member below the Gangway on the Liberal side to plead with the House in favour of the Government, and say—"Have patience, and they will pay you all." They did not select an independent Member below the Gangway on their own side, but they sent down the youngest Member of the Cabinet, the Secretary of State for the Colonies—at least, I suppose he is the youngest Member; the Secretary of State for War opposite to me will pardon me if I err—they send him down to the House in a white sheet, and with the candle of penance in his hand, to drop on his knees, and clasp his hands in entreaty, and utter this humble and even groveling plea, ad misericordiam—"This Eastern Question is difficult, very difficult; it taxes our powers to the utmost; it exceeds the grasp of our intellects, and the reach of our abilities. For Heaven's sake be quiet! do not talk and make a noise, or you will bother us and put us out, and we shall make some grievous blunder." That is the unworthy ending, the un-English ending, of the Amendment proposed by the Government. I will not support it. But, it may be said, there is the short phrase about the control of Parliament in granting or refusing Supplies. The Bill of 1858 has been alluded to, and the new clause of the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone). That clause was opposed by Lord Palmerston, by Lord John Russell, by Sir George Cornewall Lewis, and by the Liberal Party. But it was supported by Mr. Disraeli, who said—

Lord Robert Montagu

"If the power of declaring war and peace were left entirely in the hands of the Sovereign in India, there were not the means of controlling its exercise that existed in this country, and a policy might be pursued extremely injurious to the national interests."

Then, stating that he would support the clause, he added—

"Some provision of this kind would, therefore, he thought, be salutary as regarded India."—[3 Hansard, cli. 1014-15.]

We have here to observe two things—first, the object of the new clause was to restrict the Prerogative, to impose on the Crown a control which, in the opinion of Mr. Disraeli, and of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, did not then exist. In spite of your declaration of rights, it did not then exist. Secondly, we may learn from it some of the mind of the present Premier. It was he who originated that liberty which the Liberal Party are now, as they think, defending, but which the Prime Minister would be the last to infringe. He, and not the Liberal Party, saw the danger to our liberties, and the remedy which could be secured by a slight modification of the new clause. He, then, is not the man to employ the Army contrary to the law, except an urgent necessity compels him. This is still more shown by the words of Lord Derby, in the House of Lords, when an improvement of this clause was under discussion—

Sub intelligitur, of course, the words—“unless there should be any urgent necessity.” I allow the force of that which was urged by the last speaker, that consent must be previous to action, and that consent cannot properly be asked or given after an act has been done. Yet the act may be done, without consent, in a case of necessity; for necessity knows no law. The safety of the people may demand a violation of a law, and such violation would not be wrong; for, salus populi suprema lex. The real point at issue is, then, whether there is now such a necessity? The Government can only know that; and, if the safety of the nation requires it, the Government will be justified in withholding that information for the present. I have already said that there can be no grounds for the Resolution of the noble Marquess, except it be as a censure upon the Government. But, if it be so, it is very improper. He says that the Government have violated the Constitution, that they have broken the law. If so, they have committed a grave crime. When the law has been broken, what is always done? That which should always be done—namely, a judicial investigation takes place. A judicial inquiry—not a debate between two parties, which is determined, not according to truth and right, but by the relative number of noses in this Party or that. After the judicial inquiry, and after judgment has been arrived at, punishment is awarded, if guilt has been found. No one is content with censure; punishment is demanded. In the case of a guilty Government, the same rational course should be pursued. We should not debate their conduct, and propose a Vote of Censure, and decide it by votes; but they should be impeached. [Laughter.] That is the law; that is the Constitution. Those who pretend to stand up in defence of the Constitution are now laughing at the Constitution. Why was there no laughter when the Home Secretary was speaking? He said—“If the Government are guilty of breaking the law, not the House of Commons, but Parliament should have interfered.” That was a dark saying, of the meaning of which I had only a faint suspicion, but that suspicion was confirmed when he warmed on his subject, and grew bolder, and added,—“You should have impeached us.” But, if that be the mind of the Home Secretary, if he can dare the Opposition to arraign him before the House of Lords, how can he vote for the miserable and craven plea ad misericordiam of the Secretary of State for the Colonies? I, for one, will not do so. Nor yet can I support a Resolution which I do not regard as true. I hold that you should wait until you can prepare Articles of Impeachment against the Members of the Cabinet, to try them judicially in the Constitutional manner.

MR. W. E. FORSTER rose to continue the debate, leaning for support on crutches.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER instantly suggested that the right hon. Gentleman should be permitted to sit while addressing the House.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: When I find I cannot stand any longer, I will take advantage of the kind suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman; but at present I think the House has a material guarantee that I shall not detain it very long. If I had not cared very much for this question, which vitally concerns the Privileges of the House, I should not have asked permission to make a few remarks upon it. With regard to the Amendment, to which I will refer at the outset, it appears to me very ingenious, for it enables the Government to claim the Votes of their Supporters without asking them to assent to any attack upon their Privileges or upon the Constitution, and it also evades entirely the question at issue. The House has been asked to express an opinion, and then to come to a conclusion. Well, I suppose it is our opinion on this as it is on that side of the House that, in the words of the Amendment—

“The Constitutional control of Parliament over the raising and employment of the Military Forces of the Crown is fully secured by the provisions of the Law, and by the undoubted power of this House to grant or refuse Supplies.”

Our contention is not that the Law, as embodied in the Statutes, or that the Privileges of Parliament, as established by the common law of Parliament, or acknowledged by precedent, are at fault; but our contention is that the Government have disregarded both one and the other. While asking us to vote the Budget, they kept us in ignorance of the demands they were going to make upon the purses of our constituents, and they have thus set at nought the power of the House to grant or refuse Supplies. It is because my noble Friend thought that, by bringing these troops to Malta, the Constitutional control of Parliament has been infringed, that he brought forward this Resolution. In its wording it is as moderate as it is possible to make it. We have no wish to embarrass the Government at this particular moment. There is no censure in this Motion, and our object in bringing it forward is to put upon the Records of the House such a Resolution as would prevent the infringement of the Privileges of this House, which we think the Government have committed, from being established as a precedent. How should the Government have met it? They should have either declared that there had been no infringement on the Privileges of the House or of the Constitution, or they should have set out that there had been an infringement which had been justified by necessity, and that being so justified, care should be taken that it should not be treated as a precedent. They have taken neither of these courses. By pleading no justification, they have admitted the charges against them; and yet they have not taken the course of Lord North, in 1775, and asked condonation of their action on account of the necessity of the case. Of course it is inexpedient to pass a Resolution weakening the hands of the Government at the present moment; but how can a Resolution, merely asserting the Privileges of this House, be open to such an interpretation? My noble Friend would have been recreant to the principles, which he may be said to have inherited, if he had not stood out on behalf of our Privileges. Nor do I think that he and those who have acted with him can be charged by Her Majesty's Ministers with having, in the whole course of these Eastern negotiations, done anything to increase the difficulties of the Government. At no slight sacrifice to our opinions—at the cost of much misconstruction of our actions—at the cost of complaints, not unreasonable, of many of our friends, we have avoided expressing disapproval when we felt it, because we have been determined to do nothing that would embarrass the Government in the conduct of these negotiations. But, when we come to this Resolution referring to our ancient rights and liberties, it would be humiliating, if it were not absurd, to say that our relations with Russia or Turkey, or any or all the Powers of Europe, were to prevent us from giving that question our full consideration. I hope the Government are going into a Congress on the Eastern Question; but that Congress will not discuss the English Constitution, and we have a right to express our opinion, and are not to be told that England is so weak or so powerless, that we must not assert our Privileges for fear of weakening the hands of the Government. It is my belief that the Government will be strengthened by Russia knowing that it acts with the knowledge and consent of Parliament. If it be possible to weaken the hands of the Government, it would be by allowing Russia to suppose that the Government found it necessary to act without the knowledge of Parliament, to hoodwink us by concealment, and to cheat us into consent to their action by presenting to us a fait accompli. It has been said that this secrecy was necessary. I cannot see that that assertion has been proved; and if it should be proved, I shall be even still less able than I am to understand the answer which was given me by the right hon. Gentleman the day before the Easter Recess. If there was a great emergency, I should wonder why there was such an extraordinary power of reticence on the part of the Government, that no sort of hint was given to us. I believe that publicity would have enhanced the effect of the introduction of these troops into Europe. We have been told that there would have been a difficulty in regard to transports. My strong impression is that

publicity would have increased the supply of transports. But what are a few pounds owed in freight, compared with the preservation of the Privileges of the House? If there were no emergency, and no hint of one had been given on the part of the Government, there are only two other explanations for their concealment. The one is, that in the great pressure of this Eastern Question, the Government lost sight of the Constitutional question, and that this is, in fact, a casus omissus. The other is, that the Government have really come to the conclusion that it is desirable to strengthen the Prerogative of the Crown at the expense of the Privileges of this House. I think and trust that the first explanation is the correct one, but I do fear and believe that the tendency and effect of this step will be found in the other explanation. What, after all, is the chief Privilege of Parliament, and especially of this House? It is that we thought we had, and still think we have, a share in the Government of the country, and that we have a right to prevent the carrying out of any policy, either at home or abroad, of which we disapprove. But what becomes of that right, if policy, as important as it is new, is to be carried out without consulting Parliament? I should not have thought that any Government, much less a Conservative Government, would have taken upon itself, in the name of the Crown and of the Crown only, to bring about what seems to me the greatest possible innovation—either as regards the relation of the United Kingdom to India, or of this country to Foreign Powers, or of the Crown to the other Estates of the Realm. I cannot understand how it is, that in the name of the Crown, they have brought in what seems to me the greatest possible innovation. Why do I conceive this to be a grave innovation? I do not know that I can describe the magnitude of the step which has been taken better than by referring to the language of many of its supporters. I am not now speaking so much of its supporters in the House, where there appears to have been rather an attempt to minimize the step, as of its supporters outside. What have we been told? We have been told that Russia—that Europe—has been startled by the sudden discovery that we are not only the greatest Naval Power in the world, but one of the greatest Military Powers. When I say a great Military Power, I mean—and all Europe so understands it—a great Military Power, not merely for defence, but for offence, not merely for potential, but for immediate action. We are told that we can now match the greatest Armies of the Continent without conscription, and that, by a stroke of his pen, the Prime Minister has increased our Reserves by all the Indian Army, and has made it possible to call to our aid every fighting man amongst the millions of India. That is a very flattering prospect, but it has its dark as well as its bright side. With an increased power of offence, there will be more temptation to offend. We must not suppose that fresh powers will not bring fresh responsibilities. At all events, the taxpayers of England will have to pay for the Sepoys they hire; and it is quite possible our action may have the effect of leading to an increase of the Armies of the Continent, already so very numerous. There are those who think that the action of the Government can have no result, except in increased Estimates and in undue meddling with affairs that do not really concern us; but I am well aware that this is not the occasion to debate the policy of this measure. All I say is that this policy involves a great change; and if we are the great Council of the Nation, we ought to have been consulted before it was made. Hitherto, we have supposed that we fixed how many troops should be raised and maintained at the cost of our constituents—for that was the question—for these Islands and the Possessions of the Crown; but it appears we were mistaken. We are to have a Supplementary Estimate, and I am glad to find we are to discuss it next Monday; but that Supplementary Estimate might have been postponed. But, whether postponed or not, it was quite certain we could not refuse to pay for services that had been rendered. Gentlemen might say a Supplementary Estimate was sufficient. Our ancestors would not have used that argument. They knew it was right to have many checks and safeguards for Constitutional Government, and that it was necessary that the House of Commons should have not merely the power of the purse, but the deciding of the number of men. Well, it might be thought that safeguard had better not be maintained; but my argument is, that it is, at any rate, a most important change of policy, and that the House ought to have been consulted upon the subject. Turn again to our relations with India, and we find that the change of policy is as momentous as it is novel. Hitherto, it has been our boast that India has been governed not for English, or even for Imperial purposes, but solely for Indian interests. Why, it may be asked, should we maintain that self-denying policy? But that is a question to be argued in this House; and have we not a right to complain that the Government, by the steps they have taken, have done the utmost they could to prejudge the question? Let it not be supposed that, because the Queen is Empress of India, She can wield the resources of India and call upon the millions of Her subjects in India to fight just as She pleases, or even as Her Parliament pleases. We shall find that we shall have to consult Indian feelings and Indian interests. True, we, the people of England, are the despotic rulers of India; but even despots must consider the feelings of their subjects; and our Indian despotism is no exception to that rule. Depend upon it, in gaining this help from India, we shall be called upon one day to give something in return. If India is to help us in carrying out our foreign policy, we shall have to consult Indian feeling in framing that policy; and, in my opinion, we shall have to treat India rather as an Ally, than as a Dependency. That would be a great change; but, supposing I am wrong, is it no change to rely not upon the patriotism and spirit of our own people, but upon the power of our money bags, to get Ghoorkas and Sikhs and Mussulmen to fight for us? Then, look at the effect upon the actual Administration of India. I hope these Indian troops that have been moved to Malta will be sent back to India without being called upon to fight, and I am one of those who believe that, if they do fight, they will fight well. But are we sure that when they return to India they will make India easier to govern? Surely, the House ought to have been consulted before a step was taken which affects India so deeply and closely. I may be told it is the Prerogative of the Crown to declare war, and that no one of these results would be of equal importance; but I would gladly rest the whole of my argument upon the analogy of a Declaration of War. Without doubt, it is the duty of Ministers to advise Her Majesty to declare war when they think fit; but would the present or any Government for a moment think of declaring war without giving this House an opportunity of expressing its opinion as to whether war should be declared? Before the House adjourned for the Easter Recess, the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave me, and gave the House, the impression that nothing unusual would occur in the Recess. The right hon. Gentleman will not contend that during the Recess a Declaration of War might have been issued without consulting Parliament; but this moving of the Indian troops, which has been adopted without consulting Parliament, is almost, if not quite, as important, as a Declaration of War. Neither during this Session, nor during the whole of this Parliament, as far as I know, has there been the slightest allusion by any Member of the Government or of the House to the possibility of employing Indian troops. There has, indeed, been much talk about it outside, but there has been complete silence inside the House. We know what happened in the Crimean War, when, although there was a great pressure for men, the Sepoy troops were not used. In this debate there has been much search made for precedents, but none have been brought forward of the use of Sepoys or of Indian troops, except in what might be called Oriental Wars and in Asiatic Enterprizes. In 1863 there was some intention of sending Sikh regiments to New Zealand, and it became my duty to question Lord Palmerston's Government on the subject. Lord Palmerston, it is true, justified that intention; but, within a month, counter-orders were sent, and his Cabinet gave it up. This novel and momentous step is one, therefore, which has been suddenly taken, and for which not the slightest warning has been given to Parliament. I have not attempted—it would ill become me to do so—to dwell on the legal bearings of the question, which have been dealt with by those competent to do so. But, even if the provisions of the law have been kept—and I do not think they have—and even if the letter of the Constitution has not been infringed—and I think it has—I maintain that the spirit of the Constitution has been disregarded, and that our Privileges have been attacked. If we are to hand down to our successors those Privileges as ample and secure as we have received them, the least we can do is to vote for the temperately-worded Resolution of my noble Friend, which affirms that this step ought not to have been taken without first obtaining the consent of Parliament.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir HARDINGE GIFFARD) said, he thought that the inconvenience, otherwise than in a Party sense, of the Resolution of the noble Lord opposite had been abundantly illustrated in the course of that debate. It was hardly possible to revert to any matter connected with the Eastern Question which had not been touched upon in the course of that discussion. And yet, when he looked to the language of the Resolution itself, it appeared designedly to have been framed with a view to avoid anything but the consideration of an abstract question. The Resolution stated—he thought inaccurately—a proposition of Constitutional law. But it was manifestly aimed at certain conduct of the Government; and he supposed that the tactical excellence of the Resolution as it stood was, that the noble Lord could obtain a certain number of votes from hon. Gentlemen who were not ready to pledge themselves that the Government had done anything wrong, but who would accept the proposition of law that involved a matter of fact which they did not venture to express in words, but which they were all thinking of. He ventured to think that that was an extremely inconvenient course. He admitted that there were two questions to be solved—first, whether there had been an infringement of the letter of the law? and, next, and above all, whether there had been an infringement of the spirit of our Institutions, such as might be justly described as unconstitutional? He said, in the first place, that the letter of the law had not been infringed. It was argued that the Bill of Rights prohibited the raising of Her Majesty's Forces in the circumstances stated in the Resolution in every part of the Queen's Dominions, and that they were to read the word "Kingdom" in the Bill of Rights as if it meant every part of the Dominion of the Crown. He agreed, in a measure, in what had been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone); and he might take this opportunity of saying that he had not the least conception which utterance of his the right hon. Gentleman referred to when he said that he had uttered some gibe with reference to the question of Army Purchase. [Mr. GLADSTONE: It was a mistake.] If so, he would say no more. Those who had refreshed their memories by looking at the Bill of Rights would remember that it contained a recital of the various unconstitutional and illegal acts that had been perpetrated by the Sovereign who had left the Kingdom. And then followed the declaration of what the state of the law was with reference to those things. It was there declared that the raising or keeping of a standing Army within the Kingdom in time of peace, unless with the consent of Parliament, was against the law. As to the letter of the law, the question they had to solve was, whether the word "Kingdom" comprehended all the Dominions of the Crown? Let them see whether the Statute drew the distinction, and spoke of the Kingdom in the wider sense that was contended for. Now, he found in other parts of that Statute, where they were settling the Crown and dealing with the jurisdiction of the Crown, the able and learned men who framed the Statute, and who knew how to choose language that would express their meaning, when it was intended to comprehend in it all the Dominions of the Crown, used no longer the words "the Kingdom," but "the Kingdom and the Dominions belonging thereto." And if he were to suppose—what lay at the bottom of the argument of the right hon. Member for Greenwich—that that declaration in the Statute was to apply all their Constitutional liberties, such as they had been and as they had grown to, to every part of the Dominions of the Crown, that supposition would not only be contrary to every authority, but ludicrously inconsistent with the history of the English Colonies. It was said, forsooth, that they had the authority of Lord Chancellor Bathurst, and other learned lawyers, for construing that word "Kingdom" in the sense which comprehended all the Dominions of the Crown. That was a great error. The point in the debate, in which Lord Camden and Lord Chancellor Bathurst took part, was the sending of the Electoral troops of the person who happened to be King of England as well as Elector of Hanover into places of trust under the Crown. The question there raised was as to the paragraph of the Act of Settlement. The prohibition in the Act of Settlement was that no person should be capable of enjoying any place of trust, civil or military, who was born out of "the Kingdom of England, Scotland, or Ireland, or the Dominions thereunto belonging." Let them see whether Lord Camden and Lord Bathurst, in the passages which had been quoted, were construing the words "the Kingdom" in the Bill of Rights, or the words in the Act of Settlement. Lord Camden, who one might have thought would have escaped the imputation of being supposed not to know what the words of the Bill of Rights were, said that a distinction had been made between the time of peace and the time of war; but he was certain that neither law nor usage justified any such interpretation; that it was true the word "foreigners" was not mentioned in the law; but would anyone suppose that, although it was not right to keep an Army of Natives, an Army of foreigners might be kept? The words used implied a distinction between times of peace and times of war; but, if they referred to the Act of Settlement, they would find that no such distinction was there made. The argument was obviously this—they were dealing with those garrisons of the Crown, as though they had a right to send into them Electoral troops who were not under the jurisdiction of the Crown of England. Lord Camden's observations came to that; and if his hon. and learned Friend opposite did not assent to that view, perhaps he would be good enough to explain what Lord Camden had meant by saying that neither law nor usage drew any distinction between times of peace and times of war? What had Lord Bathurst said? He had said that the sending Hanoverian troops to Gibraltar and Port Mahon was fairly within the meaning and spirit of the paragraph of the Act of Settlement. That was Lord Bathurst's observation, and he had concluded, singularly enough, by declaring that he, for the rest of the Ministers, had assisted in advising the measure. He was unable to understand what his Members opposite meant by saying that if the authority of Lords Camden and Bathurst were fairly construed in the language of the Bill of Rights, the word "Kingdom" would include all the Dominions of the Crown. He quite admitted that Lord Bathurst, in the course of his observations, had not said what would be applicable to the present circumstances, if such an argument were to be used for any serious purpose. He said that if the word "Kingdom" were to be taken to include the Dominions of the Crown, it would have to be so taken in conjunction with the phrase "while at peace," whereas they were at war with America, and, therefore, the Act of Settlement did not apply. If anyone supposed that Lord Bathurst intended that for serious argument, he might himself use it also. Suppose he were to say that the Bill of Rights applied only in time of peace, and that they were not in a time of peace while the war at the Cape went on, how would such an argument be received in the House? The result of Lord Bathurst's argument was to expose the absurdity of that fallacy. It had been said, more than once, that the Ministers ought to have followed the precedent of Lord North; but that had been said in ignorance of the facts. The Bill of Indemnity had been forced upon Lord North. He said, in a quiescent way, that he had no objection if additional protection were wanted, but that it was unnecessary; and when the Bill reached the other House, three Ministers of the Crown spoke and voted for the rejection of the Bill, declaring it to be perfectly unnecessary, as what had been done was lawful. The measure was rejected by the votes of those Members of the Government. Yet Lord North had been represented as having admitted that his Government had acted illegally in the step they had taken, and had to come to Parliament for an Indemnity. He at once conceded that, when all had been said that could be said on the language of the Bill of Settlement, that did not decide the question. They were told, next, there had been an evasion of the law, and that charge he unhesitatingly denied. Without troubling the House with what was unconstitutional and what was not, he would suppose a case. Suppose, under the Mutiny Act as it stood, the whole of the 135,000 men were brought into the Kingdom, and every outlying garrison consisted of Indian troops, the words of the Bill of Rights would not be infringed. Speaking, not as the adviser of an unconstitutional King of the 17th century, but as a lawyer, he boldly contended that there would not be the smallest infringement of the Bill of Rights; yet it was clear that any Constitutional lawyer who looked at the recital of the Mutiny Act, would see that the letter of the law was observed though the spirit violated. But he should have thought that no lawyer would have contended that it was unconstitutional to bring the Indian troops from one Dominion to another. The Amendment of the noble Lord would have been very relevant if, instead of binding himself down to the abstract Resolution, and instead of allowing everybody to supply the suppressed premiss, he had moved that the Ministers had been guilty of unconstitutional conduct; for then they would have had an opportunity of discussing and settling the question whether the movement of the troops to Malta was unconstitutional. But all that was irrelevant to the Resolution, as it stood, which put before the House no obvious issue to challenge. That was avoided, and the Resolution omitted, and the noble Lord had taken credit for omitting the very question that might have made the Resolution a fit subject of debate, and might have given point to the discussion. He had observed that hon. Gentlemen opposite had taken up a sort of oscillating position between what they said was illegal and what they contended was unconstitutional; but if they would only make up their minds as to which of the charges they intended to rely upon, he should be prepared to meet them upon either issue. What, he would ask, was the unconstitutional character of the act to which exception was taken? Had the Government evaded, in what they had done, the control of Parliament; and, if so, in what way? Was it maintained that the Indian troops could not be moved out of India at all? His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Barnstaple (Mr. Waddy) had given the House some information as to the operation of the Government of India Act, and appeared to have caught in his toils an unwary Supporter of the Government, who had not made himself thoroughly acquainted with the real state of the case. Perhaps, when he knew the hon. and learned Gentleman as well as he had, he would have reason to see that he ought to beware of his ingenuity. Now, the discovery which had been made by the hon. and learned Member for Barnstaple was, that by the 56th section of the Government of India Act, the Military and the Naval Forces of the East India Company should be deemed to be the Military and Naval Forces of Her Majesty, under the same obligations to serve Her Majesty as those under which they were to serve the Company, and should be liable to serve within the same territorial limits only. His hon. and learned Friend, having quoted that section, seemed to say—"Now I have caught you. You clearly had no right to send those Indian troops beyond the territorial limits prescribed, and you have, therefore, been guilty of an infringement of the law." His hon. and learned Friend seemed not to have observed that the whole question turned upon the terms and conditions under which those troops were enlisted. He would, therefore, keep him in suspense no longer, but tell him that the terms of enlistment had been altered, and that soldiers enlisted in the Indian Army—those soldiers, at least, who were now on their way to Malta—were not enlisted under any obligation which would simply confine them within the territorial limits of the East India Company, but under the conditions that they were bound to go wherever they might be ordered. He would only add upon that point, that before his hon. and learned Friend had made use of the argument with respect to it which he had urged against the Government, it might have been as well if he had ascertained what the real facts of the case were. But what he was about to ask when it occurred to him to give an answer to his hon. and learned Friend was, in what consisted the unconstitutional conduct of the Government? His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Durham (Mr. Herschell), in the remarks which he made with reference to the Government of India Bill, seemed to him to have entirely omitted to consider the language of the Statute itself. He said that if the Government would only say that the exigencies of the case had led them to act in opposition to the law,

[Third Night.]

he and a great many hon. Members on his side of the House would be very glad to accept that position, and would not insist on passing a Resolution which might appear to be a Vote of Censure upon their conduct. All such remarks would, no doubt, be fair and just in a case where a Government, under great pressure, had undoubtedly infringed the law. His hon. and learned Friend, however, seemed to forget that what had been done in the present instance was no infringement of the law, but was an act in pursuance of the law; and that his suggestion to the Government that they should make a confession that they had done wrong and ask the pardon of Parliament, was only applicable to cases where a Government had not the authority of Parliament for the course which they had adopted, which could not be truly said in the present case. As for Parliament, when it came to pay the bill, it had the undoubted power of either condemning or approving the action of the Government. He could not help feeling that the discussion of this question had already been very protracted, though, in truth, it was confined in very narrow limits, and he was not desirous of protracting these proceedings; but it was obvious to ask—if only for the purpose of pronouncing an opinion upon a dry abstract proposition of Constitutional law applicable to nothing, and the conclusion from which there was nothing to be drawn—with what object was this Resolution, at this particular juncture, put before the House? What would other nations—those who were watching their debates—think of this debate? Would they stop to inquire whether any dispute as to the interpretation of the Bill of Rights or the Act of Settlement decided questions of this sort? He almost apologized to himself for having discussed these matters; but these were questions which were thrust upon them. These miserable technicalities—he heard hon. and right hon. Members opposite commenting upon his words, and suggesting that the Bill of Rights, according to his view, was a miserable technicality—he knew what use might be made of his words hereafter—he said that these miserable technicalities would be misunderstood abroad. He was as deeply impressed with fervent admiration of the liberties of his country as were hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite. He knew that it was the custom of hon. Members opposite to assume and arrogate to themselves the character of champions of the liberties of Parliament, and to assert that those who did not agree with them must of necessity be bigoted; but he had a right to his own opinion, that those who were louder in their professions of being ardent for liberty were not always the safest guardians of it themselves. He had every respect for the Bill of Rights and the Act of Settlement, but the House was not engaged in an academic discussion of the origin of English liberties. No one would venture to say that great liberties did not exist—which had grown up gradually in our English Constitution—or that any Minister who undervalued those liberties would not be justly open to impeachment as well as to the condemnation of his fellow countrymen; but when he spoke of miserable technicalities, he spoke of the discussion which did not deal with great principles like this, but which, instead of dealing directly with the action and conduct of the Government, simply asked a decision of the House on a dry and abstract question, which must be interpreted by different people for or against the Government. Other nations would look to what was not contained in the Resolution; in fact, how many hon. Members had thought it their duty to confine their observations to the language of the Resolution; but what other nations would do, would be to ask themselves whether our free institutions were so cumbrous and unmanageable that, for the preservation of the interests and existence of this country, we could not avail ourselves of all the resources at our command, or send a single soldier from India, without first passing an Act of Parliament. If this Resolution were not repudiated by an overwhelming majority, other nations might well think that, in building up our liberties and protecting ourselves against internal oppression, we had really forged fetters for ourselves, so that we could not move even for our own safety. The argument used by hon. Gentlemen opposite was that this country must wait till its enemy had struck the first blow before it could release itself from its Constitutional restraints—that although its interests were so far reaching, yet, on account of some antiquated notion, some forced construction of the language of the Bill of Rights, apart from its spirit, and wholly beside that which gave life to every law—namely, the meaning and the spirit which inspired its authors when they drew up the declaration of our rights—no soldier could be moved from one part of Her Majesty's Dominions to another. He maintained that Her Majesty's Government had recognized the authority of Parliament to sit in judgment on their conduct afterwards; but hon. Members opposite would take from their hands the power which the Act of Parliament had expressly given to the Government of acting in emergencies, by supporting a Resolution which avoided challenging the question whether there was an emergency or not, and which insinuated, while it would not state, that Her Majesty's Government had been guilty of unconstitutional conduct.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, it was now some two years since the policy of Her Majesty's Government, in respect to Eastern affairs, had attracted the attention of the House. During that period many discussions, on various portions of that policy, had taken place within those walls; he had never yet taken part in any one of them, and he trusted the House would not think it unnatural on his part that, looking at the form and nature of this Resolution, he should desire not to allow the debate to terminate without taking some part in the present discussion. He agreed with his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General as to the difficulty which must exist in engaging the attention of the House upon such a subject as this, and especially at that hour of the evening; but he would promise that he would not wander from the real subject of discussion. He could not, however, refrain from alluding to the form of the Resolution, and of the Amendment that would be submitted from the Chair. It certainly was necessary for the Home Secretary to remind the House that they ought not to forget the Amendment which had been proposed by the Secretary of State for the Colonies. It was very likely, if they looked at what was the real subject of discussion, that they would forget that Amendment. It was an Amendment which, in its form, was bad all round if it were intended for an answer to the Motion. It denied nothing, it confessed nothing, and it avoided nothing. It was simply a dilatory plea, saying that at that moment it was not right to embarrass the Government. It must share the fate of every dilatory plea, and it must be taken to confess the allegation which it was directed to meet. It was, however, more important to know why this debate had been commenced at all. What was the form and what was the nature of the Motion of his noble Friend? The Attorney General, with a taste which he would not criticize, had endeavoured to trace, from some innate knowledge, the hand that drew that Motion; and the hon. and learned Gentleman complained that it did not recite certain Statutes, on which, in his opinion, the Motion ought to have been framed. The House, he thought, would agree with him, that he would be guilty of very bad taste if he made a statement one way or the other as to the framing of that Resolution; but, now that the Resolution was before the House, he thought his noble Friend could support its object and its terms. When Constitutional precedents seemed to be thrown lightly away, it must be some satisfaction to the noble Lord to know that he had framed his Resolution, at least, on the precedents of his Party. This Resolution was in its terms precisely in accordance with the terms of the Resolution that was brought up by Mr. Grey, in 1794, under similar circumstances, when that Gentleman deemed it right to propose an abstract Resolution in reference to an infringement of the Constitution committed by the Prime Minister of the day. Mr. Grey framed his Resolution, not in the form of casting a Vote of Censure on the Ministers for the policy which they had adopted, but in these terms—

“That the employing foreigners in any situation of Military trust, or bringing foreign troops into this Dominion, without the consent of Parliament first had and obtained, is contrary to law.”

It was exactly upon the lines of this Motion that the noble Lord had drawn his Resolution; and he was certain that if a specific Motion had been made that the Government were deserving of censure on account of its policy, the House would have been told that the Opposition cared nothing for the abstract Constitutional question, but sought at this moment to embarrass the Government by charging it with a policy which it dared not explain, because it was necessary for it to keep secret the reasons on which it had acted. In speaking upon the form of the Motion, and the criticism which had been applied to it, he could not help referring to the speech which they had heard that evening, and which had been so loudly cheered by hon. Members opposite, but which some Members of the House must have listened to with great pain and regret. He meant the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck). He might say, unreservedly—and he had no doubt that those to whom he was speaking would agree with him—that the Parliamentary position of the hon. and learned Member entitled him to every due respect in the House. It was not only his long service in that House, but the age at which he had arrived, and to which they might all arrive, which entitled him to that respect which, he thought, personally they were all willing to accord him. But men of any position, and of any age, who entered into the conflicts of public life, and deemed it right to become the censors and condemnors of others, could not shield themselves behind their position or age, and prevent answers being made to what they said. He said—and he was sorry he could not say it in the presence of the hon. and learned Member, but he said it in the presence of the House—what right had he to apply the language he did to those who had brought forward and supported this Resolution? He knew it would be distasteful to his noble Friend, and it would be unbecoming in himself, to utter one word of personal reference to him; but he appealed to hon. Members opposite with the greatest confidence, as well as to the Supporters of the noble Lord, whether the hon. and learned Gentleman had any right to say that no honest, no patriotic man, would have acted as his noble Friend had done in bringing forward this Motion? He left it for the House to judge, from his career, and from the course which he had taken towards the Government with reference to the Eastern Question, whether it was becoming in anyone to say that the noble Lord was not acting as an honest and patriotic man would act, because a difference of opinion existed on this Constitutional question? He was not now going to refer to some acts of the hon. and learned Member, nor to the way in which he had opposed Ministers on certain occasions. The hon. and learned Member for Barnstaple (Mr. Waddy) read a portion of the hon. and learned Member's speech, when he attacked the Government of the day for sending troops to Persia and carrying on war without the consent of Parliament; and he would take the House into his confidence, and confess that he had at first intended to make some observations on that speech, in support of the present Motion. He would not do so, however, but would only refer to the course the hon. and learned Member had taken at the time of the Crimean War, during a time when the country was in the face of the enemy, when he introduced a Resolution condemning the Government of the day. It was not desirable to engage the attention of the House in such considerations; but when he heard the cheers from hon. Gentlemen opposite when the hon. and learned Member referred to the disunion of the Liberal Party, and congratulated them upon the patriotic cohesion they had shown, his mind dwelt with pleasure upon the recollection of some portion of the words of the hon. and learned Member which it had been his delight and instruction to read. The House would forgive him if he read a short extract, and hon. Members opposite would then know what opinion the hon. and learned Member had entertained of their political cohesion, and how much he deprecated the differences that existed in the Tory Party. While he had been a professing Liberal, the hon. and learned Member had, as he now said, always disparaged the action of the Liberal Party. During the time of the French War, he deemed the Liberal Party unpatriotic. With the permission of the House, he would read what had been written by the hon. and learned Gentleman; it was an extract from a pamphlet entitled, Parties in the House of Commons, Disunion among the Tories; by John Arthur Roebuck—

“There is also another reason for the apparent harmony existing amongst the Tories. Political principles with them are matters of very secondary importance. Their grand object is place, and the means of living on the public

Sir Henry James

Anybody that will afford them the opportunity of thus fleecing the people"—

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLF rose to Order. He contended that quotations from a pamphlet, written many years ago against the Conservatives, had no bearing on the question before the House.

MR. SPEAKER said, that he considered the remarks of the hon. and learned Member were in Order, having regard to the course of the debate.

SIR HENRY JAMES resumed the reading of the extract.

"Anybody that will afford them the opportunity of thus fleecing the people will not be much troubled with any peculiar fancy or crotchet which they may entertain respecting Government. Feed a Tory well, and you will silence his scruples, and obliterate from his mind any notion of an independent opinion. With morality such as this, it is not at all extraordinary to see great harmony existing amongst them. But this is a harmony which bodes no good to the public; they agree in order to plunder, and are good friends at the Nation's expense."

He was asked for the date of the document he had read; he would give it; it was since the Napoleonic Wars. It was written since the period when the hon. and learned Member said the Liberal Party acted so unpatriotically. He quoted from that pamphlet to show that, at different periods of his life, the hon. and learned Member had treated them all alike. He regretted he was not present to hear him; but he ventured to say that, if the hon. and learned Member, at this period of his life, believed his political Friends to be all dishonest and unpatriotic, it would be more gratifying to them if he would sit amongst his Allies opposite. He hoped that the House would forgive him for yielding to the temptation of answering the hon. and learned Member; but he was sensible that he had to deal with far graver subjects. He had not only to deal with the actions of Her Majesty's Ministers and their effect, but with the light thrown upon those actions by the statements of responsible Ministers in that House. It might be that the actions of the Government had resulted from their having to deal with an emergency which they could not control. In that case, the House might have treated the Government as Parliament usually treated Ministers who had acted in an emergency. But that was not the position Her Majesty's Ministers chose to occupy. They justified every act they had done, and they said that those acts were within the Constitution, and they naturally put forward the first Law Officer of the Crown to support the Constitutional position they had assumed. He must ask the House to consider for one moment the proposition put forward by the Home Secretary. That right hon. Gentleman had asked the House, in fairness to the Government, not to make them responsible for the statements of the Attorney General. Against that doctrine he protested.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS explained that what he had said was that the action of the Government was one thing, and the language of the Attorney General was another.

SIR HENRY JAMES was quite willing to take it in that way. The Home Secretary was treating the Attorney General as the Prime Minister had once before treated that hon. and learned Gentleman. He was glad to have an admission from the Home Secretary that he accepted all the propositions of the Attorney General. [Mr. Assheton Cross dissented.] He would give the right hon. Gentleman his choice either to accept the propositions of the Attorney General or not. The Home Secretary placed him in this dilemma—when he said that he repudiated the language of the Attorney General, the Home Secretary contradicted him; and when he said that the right hon. Gentleman accepted the Attorney General's propositions, he shook his head. Under those circumstances, he must accept his own reading of the right hon. Gentleman's language, and should take it that the Government accepted the propositions of the Attorney General. If the Home Secretary meant to accept those propositions, the responsibility of the Government was far greater than he had anticipated; but if he intended to repudiate them, he, for one, must protest, on the part of the Attorney General, at his being placed in such a position. It was not his intention to refer to past debates; but what was the position of the Government when they were challenged on a Constitutional question? They put forward their Law Officer to defend them, and supported him with their applause. But when the hon. and learned Gentleman's numerous errors had been pointed out to them, they said it was not fair to saddle the Government with his statements. In the speech of one Member of the Government it was said that the statements of another Law Officer, the Lord Chancellor, would be allowed by history to have properly set forth the Constitutional views of the Government. Thus, they were asked to receive, and were told history would accept as correct, the statements of one Law Officer, while they were told that it was unfair to take the words of another. From the speech of the Attorney General he deduced the position in which the Government had placed itself. Their acts might have been, as he had before said, justified by an emergency, or on the ground of policy; but the Attorney General justified them on the ground of Constitutional right; and the propositions which he put forward, and which the Government must either accept or repudiate, were three distinct propositions as representing the Constitutional position of the Crown in relation to Parliament. The Attorney General said that, by virtue of its Prerogative, the Crown, before the Bill of Rights, had a Constitutional right to maintain a standing Army anywhere, without the consent of Parliament, and that that Prerogative right had been limited by the Bill of Rights. As a deduction from those two propositions, the Attorney General informed them that the Crown could maintain a standing Army, without the consent of Parliament, anywhere except in the United Kingdom. He believed he had fairly stated the propositions of the Government. Of course, he was aware that it was said that this power was checked by the necessity of obtaining Supplies from Parliament. That proposition had been put forward in the early part of the debate, and was one which was not disputed. On those three propositions he took issue, and said that they were unfounded, and could not be supported on principle or by precedent. He would first deal with the proposition of the Attorney General, that by virtue of the Common Law, the Prerogative of the Crown gave it a Constitutional right to maintain a standing Army anywhere, without the consent of Parliament. That must bring them to a pre-Bill of Rights period. The Attorney General, with perfect frankness, did not shrink from that proposition, but said clearly that before the Bill of Rights, the Crown had the Prerogative of maintaining a standing Army in the country, whether Parliament assented to it or not. That was the fundamental question in this debate—whether the Crown was subject to the Constitutional limitation contended for in the Motion of the noble Lord; and it was against the assertion of such a power without limitation, which the Solicitor General had spoken of as a miserable technicality, that the Motion was aimed. They must look very carefully to see whether the contention of the Attorney General could be supported by any act of the Crown or Parliament. He could not help saying, in passing, that this argument of the Attorney General was an old one. It was exactly the same argument by which the Crown Lawyers used to support the imposition of ship-money, and the dispensing power of the Crown, and by which they claimed the right to tax our Colonies. In supporting this proposition, which anyone would see was absolutely illegal, the Attorney General threw away all considerations relating to Constitutional principles. He charged the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Oxford with being a masquerader, and with shaking a bladder full of empty wind, because he referred to Constitutional principles. That was a perfectly consistent argument in the mouth of the Attorney General, for he treated Constitutional principles as if they were of no moment at all. But their arguments rested not on mere Statutes, not on mere decisions of Courts of Justice, but on the law and usage of Parliament; and it was on these alone that this Motion was to be supported. He would call attention to what Parliament had done in this matter. Before the Bill of Rights was passed, Parliament dealt with this subject as affecting important Constitutional principles. He quite admitted that it might be unwise to take the Resolutions of Parliament during the time that it was in conflict with the Crown; and, therefore, he should not go beyond the period of the Restoration of Charles II. After that time, the Attorney General said that the Crown had a right to maintain a standing Army in the Kingdom without the permission of Parliament. At that time—in 1677—Parliament resolved—and it must have been against the Prerogative of the Crown—that the maintenance of a standing Army, other than the Militia, was a great grievance. But the contention of the Crown of the days of James II. was brought finally to an end. He committed illegal act after illegal act, and one was the maintenance of a standing Army without the consent of Parliament. In consequence of that he was obliged to leave this country, and the Bill of Rights was passed as a declaratory Act of what was the Common Law of the country in relation to the specific illegal acts which had been committed. If the Statute Book were searched through, there would be found no Act more clear and declaratory in its terms than the Bill of Rights. It declared that James II. had committed divers illegal acts, which it recited were against the established usage and laws of the country, and it asserted, amongst other things, that a standing Army was illegal. The Act was not intended as a codification of the Constitution, nor as declaratory of all the rights under Constitutional usage; but its operation was co-extensive only with the evils mentioned in its Preamble. Its enacting part was intended to go no further. James II. had kept no standing Army out of the Kingdom, in time of peace, and the Act, after it declared the law so far as it had been broken, did not touch the Common Law beyond. Hon. Members who took an interest in the matter might read an explanation of the Act by Serjeant Adair in the debate of 1794. He was one of those men whom the hon. and learned Gentleman would have told them had wild and fantastic notions; but he explained that the Bill of Rights was declaratory only in relation to certain acts which had been committed. Mr. Fox gave two statements in reference to the Bill of Rights. He said that it was to be considered as declaring the Constitution on particular points, and not as declaring the whole Constitution. In what book the Attorney General had found it stated that the Bill of Rights was an enacting statute controlling the Prerogative of the Crown instead of declaring the rights of Parliament he could not conceive. There was one passage, in a work of Lord Beaconsfield, in which he said that the English Constitution under William III.—

“Did not secure greater powers or privileges to Parliament than it possessed under Henry IV.”

But the Motion was founded not upon any statute nor upon technicalities, but it was founded upon the long usage of Parliament, and on the principles in support of which Parliament had struggled against the Crown. For one moment only he would refer to what occurred immediately after the Bill of Rights. What definition did it receive by the men who had fought for it, and by so doing had helped “to make a small country great?” They said—“You may lay before us your Estimates; you may take your money; but we must have not Estimates only, but, along with them, the heads of the proposed expenditure.” There was one Member (Sir Thomas Clarges) who must, judging by recent events, have been a stout old Tory, for he was Member for the University of Oxford, who said, when the Estimates were presented—

That was their idea of Parliamentary control. Not only did they grant money, but they saw to its disposition. Mentioning the action of Parliament immediately after the Bill of Rights, brought him to the statements of the Lord Chancellor. He had been quoted as one whose words would be read hereafter, as being an authoritative exposition of the Constitutional law of this country. If he might be permitted to say so, he had never uttered one word in that House, except in acknowledgment of the high position which the noble and learned Lord occupied. He was aware of the pride with which the Bar regarded the Lord Chancellor, and there was no doubt that feeling was more than shared by the Members of Her Majesty Government. If the Government would not accept the responsibility of the Attorney General, they surely would accept that of the Lord Chancellor. What views the Lord Chancellor entertained as to the rights of Parliament and the Crown in this matter were now well known. He was told that the Lord Chancellor held that Parliament could not interfere with the Prerogative of the Crown to raise and maintain troops or a standing Army out of the Kingdom, and that the Chancellor supported his argument by stating that during the whole of the past century, more than 100 years, the Crown maintained a standing Army in Ireland without the assent of Parliament, and that at a time when Ireland formed no part of the United Kingdom. If the noble and learned Lord were right, then it must be admitted that the argument in support of the position of the Government was very strong. The question for the House to determine was whether the Crown could outside of the Kingdom—that was, in a narrow sense, England—raise and maintain an Army without the consent of Parliament? During the last century, before the Union, Ireland was no part of the Kingdom, in that narrow sense. If, therefore, the Crown could maintain an Army in Ireland, without the assent of Parliament, he could see no reason why it should not maintain it at Malta at the present moment. This was the crucial point. But, on the other hand, Members of the Government would admit that if the Crown asked the consent of Parliament to maintain an Army in Ireland, that was a very strong argument in favour of the contention that the Government ought to have consulted Parliament before maintaining an Army in Malta. He must say he was struck at the time by the strong position of the supporters of the Government, when so high an authority as the Lord Chancellor stated that Parliament had had no power to prevent the Crown maintaining an Army in Ireland. It was a very strong argument on the part of Her Majesty's Government; but there was something wanting to it—namely, without foundation in fact. He would now like to receive now why they had no assent of troops; it had been under a total misapprehension of facts as to this question. If Parliament was given the right of raising troops in Ireland without that assent, the Crown would have dared to have maintained them. He would ask the nobleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say, in his reply, whether the fact were proved that, before it maintained an Army in Ireland, had it asked Parliament, he would have said the Crown had a right, without the assent of Parliament, to maintain an Army in Malta? From 1691 to 1698 the English Parliament voted the Irish troops. In 1698 the English Parliament came to the resolution, and also enacted that all the troops should be disbanded—

“That all Forces entirely—except 12,000, and those Her Majesty's born subjects, to be kept and maintained by the Kingdom of Ireland—be hereby disbanded.”

In the face of that statute, would the chief Advisers of Her Majesty's Ministers assert, as a Constitutional question, that those troops in Ireland were maintained without the assent of the English Parliament? What, then, became of the doctrine that the Parliament had had no voice in the matter, and no power to prevent the Crown maintaining troops in Ireland for 100 years? But the matter did not rest there. The House would bear in mind that by the Statute of 1698, the Crown had the power to maintain 12,000 troops in Ireland. In 1767, the English Parliament, growing, probably, a little uneasy about the American Colonies, thought it advisable to add 3,000 troops to the Irish Establishment. If the argument of the Government were right, of course the Crown could have added those 3,000 troops to the Army of Ireland without the need of going to the English Parliament, even for money; for the Irish Parliament had to vote Supplies to maintain them. In those days they had men who had “wild and fantastic notions,” but who did not treat Constitutional principles as “air in a bladder;” men like Lord Chatham and Lord Camden, who were careful about the Privileges of Parliament, for to them those Privileges meant the same thing as the rights of the people. And when the Crown in those days wanted, for the public good, an addition of 3,000 troops to the Irish Establishment, they did not tell the Crown that its Prerogative enabled it to raise the troops and get the money from the Irish Parliament; but they came to the English Parliament, and obtained its assent to an Act of Parliament for the sanction. The Act to which he referred was passed in 1767. It recited the previous Act of Will. III., giving assent to an Establishment of 12,000; it further recited the necessity for 3,000 more, and it gave authority to His Majesty to raise and keep in Ireland a number of troops of His Majesty's subjects, not exceeding 15,000. In the face of that statute, the Lord Chancellor had asserted that the English Parliament never gave its assent to the maintenance of troops in Ireland. There must have been a necessity for the Act he had quoted. The King assented to it, and the King's friends at that time were most powerful, and guarded the Prerogative of the Crown, as against the power of Parliament, in those days. That being so, did the Attorney General know of that statute? Did the Lord Chancellor know of it? He could not help coming to the conclusion that in the secrecy kept there was no consideration of the grave questions arising, and that there was little care or time to inquire either into the precedents for, or the principles of, the policy that Her Majesty's Government had adopted. He was sorry to occupy time in referring to the subject; but the Home Secretary had criticized what had been said by his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich. It was suggested that he did not read a passage he ought to have read. With all deference, he thought that observation was uncalled for. In point of fact, the passage was read by the Attorney General, perhaps in the absence of the Home Secretary, and his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich read nothing, but only quoted Hallam's views from memory. But there was another passage from Hallam which neither the Attorney General nor the Home Secretary had read, though it followed that which was quoted.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that he commented upon the passage, although he did not quote it.

SIR HENRY JAMES would ask the permission of the House to read the passage. Mr. Hallam said that—

"It (the keeping up of a standing Army without the permission of Parliament) was, at least, unconstitutional and tending to endanger the established law ;"

so, as Hallam said, even if the proposition as to absolute illegality were too wide, it still should be considered as virtually correct. The Home Secretary had made another mistake, in the instance he gave that the Colony of Jamaica did not come within the Common Law of England. He had before him the judgment of the Lord

Chief Justice of England on the subject, in which his Lordship laid down that it did come within the Common Law of England. Now, his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General thought it right to make a suggestion as to the form, and by whose hand the Motion of his noble Friend was framed. He would not follow him in entering upon the question by whom this policy of the Government was to be guided; but let the House consider under what circumstances that policy was taken. He could fancy the Cabinet Council being held at which this certainly novel act of removing troops from India into the European Possessions of the Crown was considered, and at which grave consideration was given to the matter. He gave the Government full credit for that. He presumed they took the advice of their Legal Advisers — both the Lord Chancellor and the Attorney General — and let him point out to the House into what errors those who gave that advice fell. The Attorney General must have told the Cabinet that a standing Army was a Constitutional right by the Prerogative of the Crown; he must have told them that the Bill of Rights was not a declaratory, but an enacting, statute. He must have told them that the Crown could now maintain a standing Army anywhere out of the United Kingdom, without the assent of Parliament. The Attorney General must also have told them that the precedent of 1775 did not apply. The Lord Chancellor must have told them that during a century the Crown had maintained a standing Army in Ireland without once procuring the assent of Parliament. The Colonial Secretary must have said—"I agree; for, in 1870, the additional 20,000 troops were not voted." And the Chancellor of the Exchequer certainly must have supported him by adding—"I have sent for the Statute Book of 1870, and those troops are not mentioned in the Appropriation Act." And then, he could fancy the Attorney General interposing and saying he was quite sure he could meet any objections by the Opposition, because, in 1863, the Liberal Government brought Indian troops, which had not been paid for or included in the Mutiny Act by the English Parliament, into New Zealand. The Home Secretary, too, must have given his advice, and said—"Oh, yes, this does not affect Colonial matters, because the Common Law of England does not apply to any of the Colonies." Now, those were the notions of Her Majesty's Government at the time they determined upon this policy. Upon those errors they had acted. Those errors had been acknowledged, and yet, because the Opposition were discussing whether this act of the Government was a Constitutional one, they were told they were factious critics. They had followed the advice of their Legal Officers, and had acted under ignorance of the primary and elementary rules of the Constitution. He said the statements of the Attorney General were in opposition to the elementary rules of the Constitution. But, although the Government thus had erred in this matter, they had committed a graver error still. With consideration, and with knowledge of their position, they had infringed the provisions of a statute which declared that they had no right to apply the Revenues of India to any Imperial purpose without the consent of Parliament. But they had so applied the Revenues of India. It was no answer to say the money was to be repaid. Supposing Parliament refused, now, to vote that money, how were they to pay that money back? There was no excuse for the Government for the errors they had committed, or for their ignorance of that statute. There was one Member of that Cabinet who must have known it by heart, for he must have had it impressed upon his memory. In 1867, at the time of the Abyssinian Expedition, the Government, of which he was then a Member, broke that statute. And what did the right hon. Gentleman do then? He would use his very words. He came down to this House, and said—"We are very sorry for having broken it." Why did not the Government say that now? He would tell them. A Ministry would never act unconstitutionally, unless they had a large majority, and it was against Ministers with a majority that they had to contend that night. But, in 1867, the right hon. Gentleman belonged to a Ministry which was in a minority, and then, having done less than they had done now to infringe the Constitution—for then no Indian troops were brought into the Possessions of the Crown, but only into Abyssinia—he came to this House, and said—"We are very sorry for what has happened." Why did not they do that now? Because they were in a majority and not a minority. They relied upon the certainty that, having erred alike against Constitutional principles and the statute law, which the Attorney General said alone they might look to, they would be supported by their majority. They trusted to their majority not to say "this is a case of emergency;" not to say "we justify you because you acted for the public good"—as he admitted Ministers ought to in time of emergency—but to say "you have neither broken the Constitution nor infringed a statute." The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), who he was glad now to see in his proper place, on the Conservative side of the House, asked—"Who is enjoying less personal liberty in this country at this moment because Indian troops are moved to Malta?" He thought the answer which would come from everyone would be "Nobody." But, was that the question they had to determine now? What they were doing now was to maintain the right of Parliament to say—"You shall have no troops in your possession without the consent of Parliament." It was not a question now so much of a standing Army; it was a grave question of policy. The Parliament of England gave to the Crown the right of making war or concluding peace; but they kept that great Prerogative power of war or peace always in check by determining the number of troops at the disposal of the Crown. The policy of a Ministry must depend upon the means which they had of carrying it out; and, therefore, when they asked to have at their disposal the right of voting the number of troops which should be maintained by the Crown, they exercised a power over the Crown as to whether it should maintain excessive Military or Naval Forces—whether it should have the power of making war at any time. They had been asked why they had brought forward this Motion? They had brought it forward in the hope that what had been said and the protests which had been made would counteract the action of the Government as a precedent in relation to the Constitution. The debate of 1775 had been quoted over and over again. The majority, then, was overwhelming against those who protested. But at what did they look in that debate? They looked at the words of the men who spoke, at the words of Lord Camden, Lord Shelburne, and others, in order to learn what was the Constitution of this country. Since then 100 years had passed, generations of men had come and gone from that House, and generations of men would come and would go; and so, in the future, there would be men seeking to learn from the discussion of to-night the principles which governed them in this time, and, as they turned over the pages on which to-night's history would be written, on which page would their minds dwell? It would not be on the record of the division which would tell only of the blind cohesion of a Party. No, they would turn to the sayings of such men as the noble Lord and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, and would learn that there were those amongst us who refused to desert the imperilled privileges of Parliament, and so to sacrifice the best interests of the people.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Mr. Speaker, the hon. and learned Gentleman, more than once in the course of his speech, apologized to the House for being obliged to detain us upon "dry and technical points of law." Now, Sir, there is no Member of the House, I will venture to say, from whom an apology of that kind—especially when he is speaking upon a subject of a legal and Constitutional character—is less required than from the hon. and learned Gentleman. There is no one who has a better title to be heard or whom the House would more attentively listen to upon such a question; but I was sorry that the hon. and learned Gentleman should have felt so much diffidence in his own power of commanding and retaining the attention of the House at this hour, if he had confined himself to dry legal details, that he thought it necessary and expedient to enliven his speech with a great deal of unnecessary warmth, and with a good deal of matter which had nothing whatever to do with the subject before us, and some of which I regretted to hear fall from his lips. Now, considering the large matters which the hon. and learned Gentleman had to speak upon, and how much he had to say, I think we might have been spared some part of that attack—I will not use the word attack; but of that disagreeable criticism in which he indulged with regard to the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck). It seems to me that it was not altogether necessary for the purposes of debate, and that it was scarcely justified by anything which had fallen from an hon. and learned Member who is so justly and largely respected in this House, to rake up some old forgotten pamphlet about the time of the close of the Napoleonic Wars, and which contained what was then the opinion of the hon. and learned Gentleman of the Tory Party. Whether the Tory Party have improved since that time, or the hon. and learned Gentleman has learned to know them better, I cannot tell; but certainly, the opinion which he was good enough to express with respect to us this evening was more favourable, and at this time of night it appears to me we might have been employed otherwise than in discussing that matter. I will endeavour to abstain from imitating the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down, in various ways. I cannot pretend to cope with him in discussing the legal points which are involved in the question under our notice; but I will, as briefly as I can, remind the House what is the real point which it appears to me is now at issue. We are asked by the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition to pass an abstract Resolution—I will not trouble the House with the words—with regard to what is required by the Constitution as to the keeping of the Forces by the Crown, and we are asked to do so in circumstances which distinctly show that no direct charge is made against the Government as to anything which they have done. Nothing of that sort is contained in the terms of the Resolution, the meaning of which undoubtedly is that there is a necessity that Parliament should place upon record the doctrine which it enunciates as to the conduct of the Government. I put the matter in the way in which hon. Gentlemen opposite wish it to be put. They do not consider the case is one in which it is their duty to bring forward a direct Vote of Censure; they do not consider the case is one in which it is right or necessary to discuss even the main lines of the policy which are involved in the measure we have adopted. Some of those who have spoken have travelled a little outside these bounds; but these are the limits which the noble Lord and the leading Members on the opposite side have prescribed to themselves. Well, we say in reply, whether your doctrine as you propose to lay it down be true, or whether it be false, we are equally convinced that there is no occasion whatever for your coming forward and laying down such a doctrine in an abstract form. We believe, and we ask the House to affirm, that existing statutes and existing practice with regard to the maintenance of troops by the Crown are sufficient to preserve and maintain all that the Constitution desires should be preserved and maintained. And we say it is even weakening those safeguards unnecessarily to place any new Resolution on record, and that there is nothing whatever in the circumstances which have occurred which justifies or calls for such a Motion. Therefore, we do not attempt to raise questions in any other form than this—that we move an Amendment to the effect that the Constitution is sufficiently expressed in the Acts of Parliament which exist on the subject, and that the Constitution is sufficiently fulfilled by the course which is to be taken with regard to the voting of the men, and voting the money and Supplies, and so forth. There is nothing in the conduct of the Government now or at any other time which calls for any other declaration. That is the issue which is before us; and I maintain, whatever may be the result of isolated questions upon particular points which have been discussed, that that position is sound and unassailable. Now, I wish to say one word, and one word only, upon the question of Prerogative. We have heard a great deal said in the course of this debate, and elsewhere, which would lead one to suppose that the Prerogative of the Crown was in some way or other opposed to the Constitution of the country, and that, in this instance, there was a struggle between the Prerogative and Constitutional rights. Now, Sir, that is not at all the view I take of Prerogative. I consider Prerogative, so far from being opposed to the Constitution, is, in fact, part of the Constitution. The Constitution of this country would not be what it is if it were not for the Prerogative which the Crown has entrusted to it, and which is exercised, let me say, not for the personal or selfish benefit of the Crown, not for the personal advantage of the Sovereign, but for the general good of the community. The Constitution under which we have the happiness to live is a Constitution which has been framed with the view of attaining the best objects and working of Government, and it has been the opinion of our ancestors, and it is our own opinion, that the Prerogatives of the Crown are essential to the proper working of the Constitution. And, therefore, the Crown is entrusted with certain Prerogatives—as, for instance, in the case which is now before us, the Prerogatives of declaring peace or war, commanding the employment and administration of the Army, or the other Forces of the country. But the exercise of those powers is subject, of course, to the control which Parliament possesses. The Crown exercises every Prerogative not absolutely nor despotically, but is subject to Constitutional checks which have been devised, and which were not devised at one time, but in consequence of exigencies which from time to time have occurred. We have been talking, and necessarily must talk, of the Bill of Rights, and the other important statutes passed at about that period. But, as we have been told by many hon. and learned Gentlemen and others, that was not the beginning of all things. There was a great deal of Constitutional right before that. There have been many changes in the practice, and many changes in the circumstances, of the country since then; and the position of affairs is by no means the same as it was at the time the Bill of Rights and the other legislative enactments were passed. Well, now, what have we come to? We have come to a state of things in which all those dangers against which the Bill of Rights was especially directed have become practically impossible. Parliament has obtained such control over the action of the Crown in these matters as to make it utterly absurd to talk of being in danger. It would be utterly absurd to talk of seeing any danger of the action against which the Bill of Rights was directed. In the course of the debate we have heard a great deal about the words “this Kingdom.” I cannot go into the question as to how far such words may possibly extend; but what I will refer to particularly is, that our ancestors passed this Bill of Rights as a declaratory Bill of their rights with regard to the Crown, and not with the view of directing the action of the Crown in foreign affairs, or in foreign wars. It was for the express purpose of preserving their own liberties at home that the Act was passed. They suffered from the maintenance of Forces which had been raised by the Crown, and which, to a great extent, were paid out of its private resources. They suffered by the maintenance of Forces, which were sometimes raised to overcome Parliament, and sometimes to oppress the people of this country, and to oppress them in this particular form. Not under the form of billeting, which in our own day causes a certain amount of inconvenience to particular traders when the inhabitants of a place have to find quarters for troops, but in the shape of billeting, which in those days was a very disagreeable thing indeed, and that carried with it a great deal more than mere accommodation for soldiers. When in any particular place soldiers were put under martial law, and the martial law extended not only to the soldiers but to the place in which they were billeted, then there was good reason to object, and hence the protest that was made. But, since that, a different state of things has grown up—Parliament has asserted, and has obtained, a complete control over the Crown in the matter. It possesses great power of granting and refusing Supplies, and, although that power may be evaded for a few months, it is the great cardinal power by which the House governs in these matters. And Parliament possesses a great deal more than this, for it possesses, in the case of any trespass or abuse being attempted by Ministers, the power of turning them out, and at once bringing about a new state of things. But its power goes beyond even that. Parliament possesses the power, which it usually exercises, of passing the annual Mutiny Act, and by that means it enacts and makes it legal for the Crown to keep on foot a certain number of men, under whatever conditions or at whatever places they are kept. It does no more than say that it shall be legal for the Crown to have 135,000 as a standing Army. For the space of one year, Parliament, by the Mutiny Act, enacts that the Crown shall deal with these men and keep order and discipline amongst them. If that Act were to expire—if it were not renewed when it came to an end—the power of the Crown over the Army would stop, and it would be impossible for the Crown to keep that Army on foot. Therefore, there is a very clear and distinct power which Parliament, and this House especially, exercises over the right of the Crown to keep a standing Army. Well, then, we come to the question, how far is it that this state of things limits the power of the Crown? What we have always understood, and what, I think, all on both sides of this House will agree to—at least as a minimum—is this, that it is not legal for the Crown—it is not legal for the Ministers to advise the Crown—to bring into this country—into the United Kingdom—any Force beyond the number authorized by Parliament. What is the number authorized by Parliament? There is certainly the fixed number authorized in the Preamble of the Mutiny Act—namely, 135,000 men; but there are other Forces which it is perfectly legal to maintain in this country, because they are authorized by Parliament under other laws—I mean the Militia and the Reserves. These are not included in the number voted in the Mutiny Act, but they are authorized by Parliament under certain other statutes. Therefore, though not in the Mutiny Act, it is with the consent of Parliament that you employ them in this country. If that is true, that you may maintain certain Forces in this country which are not specified in the Mutiny Act and yet raised with the consent of Parliament, it follows that you cannot say because any particular Force is not mentioned in the Mutiny Act it cannot have the consent of Parliament. I wish that principle to be applied to the Indian Army, for it is one which the Crown maintains without its being inserted in the Mutiny Act; but it does not maintain it without the consent of Parliament. It maintains it by virtue of the authority given to the East India Company long ago, and subsequently transferred to the Crown. The power given to the Crown by Act of Parliament is given without limitation of numbers, and, therefore, it is upon very different terms from that which is given us to maintain the 135,000 men mentioned in the Mutiny Act. That the Indian Army is one which is duly authorized by Parliament is what I will venture to contend. I will not weary the House by attempting to go into the technical question; but these are our contentions—we contend that the authority given by Parliament to the Crown to maintain this Army, which is also duly raised under Parliamentary power, and which is raised upon terms that bind the soldier to go wherever he is ordered, gives authority to use those troops wherever they are directed to be sent, except when they are prohibited. It is, primâ facie, the right of the Crown to use that Army which is regularly authorized, and regularly constituted—an Army which is under proper discipline—it is, I say, the primâ facie right of the Crown to use that Army anywhere, except where it is forbidden by statute to go, and except under such limitations as are imposed by statute. What are they? One of these limitations is directed against bringing that Army into the United Kingdom. I know that there is one point which is at issue between us and hon. Gentlemen opposite. They deny that “Kingdom” means all the Dominions of Her Majesty. We dispute that point, and contend and believe that there is no ground—I may say, not the shadow of a ground—for maintaining that that is the correct view. Take the language of the Bill of Rights; that does not seem to carry more than the Kingdom of England as it was then. Take the precedents that have occurred from time to time—the changes that have taken place in the language of the Mutiny Acts—and see how the “United Kingdom” has gradually been substituted for “this Kingdom,” and how the interpretations placed upon the language of Parliament, and upon the Constitution, by those who drew up and passed the Mutiny Act from year to year; are consistent with our contention. The hon. and learned Member quoted the language of those who took part in the debates in former years, particularly in the year 1775. I will not go into the question as to whether their language bears the exact meaning attributed to it or not; but I say that the alteration made in the Preamble of the Mutiny Act is the more forcible, and the more valuable, and, I may add, the more sensible interpretation of the meaning of Parliament than anything that can be gathered from it. Parliament may have changed its intention, if you like; or it may be that a former Parliament knew better than we do what its intentions were. Look again at a matter which may be fresh in the recollection of those who have attended these debates. There is a clause in the Mutiny Act—the 4th clause—which is nonsense, unless it mean that troops that must not be brought into the United Kingdom may be sent into the Colonies. It provides for troops to be drafted into the Colonies that cannot be brought into the United Kingdom, because those troops are not in the Mutiny Act. I have not heard any explanation given of the meaning of that clause by the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James). How that 4th clause is to be explained, unless there is some such inference, I am not able to say. So much in regard to the restrictions imposed by the Mutiny Act upon the Prerogative of the Crown. We contend that it does not apply to the Dominions of Her Majesty outside the limits of the United Kingdom. But, then, it is said—“What a monstrous assertion you are now making; you are advancing a claim on behalf of the Crown to keep a standing Army of unlimited amount in any of the Dominions of Her Majesty outside of the United Kingdom without the consent of Parliament.” If language is to be tortured, and we are to be pressed into extreme and absurd difficulties of that sort, we may as well close our debates altogether. All those clauses are subject, of course, to the Constitutional control which Parliament exercises over the Ministers. Take the question of the Prerogative of declaring war. It is very truly said that if you put in an extreme claim to construe the Prerogative strictly, the Crown has the right to-morrow morning, without the consent of Parliament, to declare war against France, Spain, Germany, or any other country, for any cause, or even for no cause, simply because it suited the fancy of the moment. But everybody knows that, although strictly the Prerogative of the Crown, it is as utterly impossible for any such thing to be done as it would be for us to commit any other act of madness or folly. Because it can be pressed to such absurd conclusions, it does not follow that the doctrine is not true; for almost any doctrine, if applied without reference to common sense, may be reduced to absurd conclusions. I know that absurd conclusions have been suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Durham (Mr. Herschell), and to those observations I make the same reply—that we make this claim subject to the reasonable and Constitutional construction of it. I am told that there is another limitation expressly applicable to the case of the Indian Forces. It is the express limitation, of which you have heard so much, in the 55th section of the Government of India Act. I should be wearying the House unnecessarily were I to repeat the whole history of the clause. I need hardly say that it is well known to have been introduced, in the first instance, by the right hon. Member for Greenwich to prevent the Indian troops being sent outside the limits of India, except in the case of invasion or other imminent danger. It was objected to by many great authorities—and none the less eminent because they belonged to the Liberal Party—Lord Palmerston, Lord John Russell, and Sir Cornwall Lewis expressed an opinion that it was not right to limit the Crown in that manner. They quoted history, and gave illustrations to show how injuriously it would work. Upon these representations, the clause was altered and another substituted. What was the meaning of putting in another clause permitting the troops to be sent where they were wanted, but providing that the Revenues of India should not be used to carry on a war without the knowledge of Parliament, if it were not wished to allow Her Majesty to make a proper use of her Indian Forces? I reminded the House some time ago that the clause received its construction not only from the language which was used at the time when it was proposed and discussed, but from the interpretation that was put upon it in the Votes of the same year by the Government of Lord Palmerston itself. In the case of the China Expedition, the troops were sent from India to China without the knowledge and consent of Parliament. That was done; and, for some time, at all events, a charge was made upon the Indian Revenue, but ultimately a Vote was taken to replace the cost. My right hon. Friend says he could justify that case, because it was a case of emergency. [Mr. GLADSTONE: A sudden, immediate necessity.] I certainly heard that, and I think, also, it was the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) who, in a very able speech on the first night of this debate, in commenting on the clause, said—"It was perfectly evident that the case of an invasion and an emergency applied not to an emergency that might arise in any part of Her Majesty's Dominions, but only in India." But this was not the case with regard to China. That was no part of India, but a place where the British flag had been insulted, and a sudden emergency arising, it became necessary to send troops. The Government of the day acted very properly—and, I think, Constitutionally—in taking the Indian Forces, and sending them at once, because they were the nearest and most convenient to the scene of action, just as we sent them to Abyssinia because they were the nearest. We have sent them to Malta for the same reason, because, under the circumstances, they were the most proper troops to send. But, let me just say one word with reference to what has been done since as regards the financial control. Whether the point is or is not as to the payment of these troops out of the Indian Revenues, I do not care. It may be one or the other. But the action taken in 1860 was much more calculated to defeat either or both of them than the action we have taken. The Force was sent out several months before it was mentioned in Parliament, and the expenses were incurred by the Indian Government, and it was not for some considerable time afterwards that Parliament was asked to repay the Indian Government the sum disbursed. We propose to repay the Indian Government at once. We do not even propose that the Indian Government shall be any money out of pocket if we can help it. India has undertaken a commission for England. She has sent a certain number of troops, and it is proposed that we shall undertake, on the part of this country, to repay every farthing of the expenditure so soon as we can get the information necessary to enable us to lay an Estimate before the House. I said, three weeks ago, that we should be able to lay that Estimate on the Table shortly, and on Monday I hope to do so. In the meantime, we keep the House informed of what we are doing, and we give the House an opportunity of pronouncing, at the earliest possible period, on the propriety of that expenditure, and we feel satisfied that they will make it good. Short of coming to Parliament for its previous consent before the measure was undertaken, I do not see what the Government could do more than it has done. Those who complain that Parliament is going to be put in a cleft stick by our course, are hardly consistent in saying that we ought to have asked for a Vote of Credit. If we had asked Parliament to do what I have no doubt this House would have done—re-voted the remainder of the credit of £6,000,000 not expended—if we had done that, we should have been told that those expenses ought to have been paid out of the Vote of Credit already taken. If that were so, we need not have come to Parliament for a Vote at all. I expressly stated, in bringing in the Budget Statement, that we did not propose to ask for a re-vote; we think it better to come with a Supplementary Estimate. Then, as to the concealment. It would not have been in my power, and it would not have been my duty, to have given information as to this particular measure which was then in contemplation, and which for military reasons it was necessary should be considered and matured in the breast of the Cabinet, in consultation with the Indian Government, before it was made public. If, Sir, we are not to be trusted in such a matter as the transfer of troops from India to the Mediterranean—a subject which could not be conveniently discussed or canvassed openly in the House of Commons—why, no doubt, we must be most incompetent and unfit to be Ministers of the Crown. I wish to say that, in what we have done, we have, so far as it was in our power, endeavoured to act strictly in conformity with what we believe to be the law. We do believe that we have kept the law—that we have not violated the provisions of the Bill of Rights, as we understand them—notwithstanding all that we have heard in this debate against our construction of it, we believe that we have not violated the provisions of the India Government Act. If we have done anything that can be called illegal—and I hardly think we have done even that—it is that we have committed ourselves to a certain expense, for which we are going to ask a Vote of Parliament. We have committed ourselves to that expense before we knew whether Parliament will sanction that Vote. This is a step which in one sense is illegal; and yet I doubt whether, in this case, it really is illegal, because we have Votes from this House for transports and pay, and it is only under these heads of Service that the expenses have been incurred. True, the sum we have taken is not sufficient to meet the charge of these troops; but, so far as it has gone, it is not true that if Parliament rejected this Vote, the expense would be thrown upon India. It would place the Government in a grave and awkward position, and would cause great confusion in the Army and Navy Estimates. However, even if Parliament refused the Vote, it would not involve the expense being thrown upon India. A great deal has been said about the conduct of General Peel and the language he used. He has been appealed to as a very high authority upon these matters. No one respects his authority and his opinion upon these questions more than I do; and in this particular case I respect it the more, for at the time General Peel was raising the question I had the honour to sit next him on that bench, and I was in frequent consultation with him upon the line he was taking. What was it he complained of? He was not contending that you could not raise the troops without having put them in the Mutiny Act in the first instance; he was not raising the question of the propriety of the expenditure at the time these troops were sent; what he objected to was their being kept at Hong Kong and Singapore, and maintained as a regular part of our Forces without their being put into the Mutiny Act. I quite agreed with him there, and I quite agreed that it would be most wrong to maintain troops for a long period as a part of the Regular Army without putting them into the Mutiny Act. When calling attention to the fact, General Peel complained that the Government did not put down these troops at all. He could not find out how the troops were to be paid for. It remained on the Estimates and accounts between the War Office and India, and Parliament knew nothing of it until General Peel forced the Government of the day—that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich—to put those troops in the Army Estimates. There is no doubt, if a similar matter should occur—if these troops were maintained for a long period in the Mediterranean—it will be the duty of the Government to deal with them. But the point I advance is, that General Peel's action has nothing to do with the present position. There are many other points to which I might direct attention, but I feel ashamed to detain the House. It is not necessary for me to go into all the legal points which have been so well argued. But I must allude to one thing—namely, the remarkable case brought up against us by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. He said we had forgotten all about the precedent of 1816, when there was a considerable British Force in France, and it was proposed that no money should be voted for these troops, because the French Government were ready to pay for and maintain them. And he says that sort of thing might happen again. I fancy someone threw out the idea, that possibly we might have the Indian Army brought into the Mediterranean and subsidized by the Government of Austria. I can only promise that if any such proposal be brought before the Government, the House shall have most ample means of considering it. But, really, the thing is too ridiculous to discuss. The control—the proper control—of Parliament over the employment of the Forces of the Crown is not weakened in the smallest degree by that which we have done. If we thought it had been, we should be the first to say—"Let us lay down any principles which are necessary to secure it." But we do not believe it, and, that being so, we cannot assent to any unnecessary and superfluous, and, therefore, mischievous Resolution. Sir, the fact of placing a superfluous and unnecessary Resolution upon the Books of Parliament, even if it were true, is in itself inconvenient. It is an imperfect expression. A Resolution that the first five Commandments were binding on Christians would be true, but the omission of the other five would give rise to considerable discussion as to why they had been left out. We say that we are acting in a spirit of loyalty to the Constitution. We say, in supporting the Prerogative of the Crown, we are not impugning the Constitution, but we are strengthening and maintaining a most essential part of it. We say the object for which we are doing this is an object, not for conspiring against the liberties of the people, but for the sake of maintaining great Imperial interests abroad. We have in view the protection of the interests of the Empire, and there is no idea of reversing the policy of the great men who passed the Bill of Rights. Nothing can be further from our thoughts. We know very well that the policy we are carrying out does not commend itself to everybody. We know perfectly well that there are some who dissent entirely from the line of policy we have adopted, and there are others who, although they do not dissent from our objects, are yet sceptical as to the course we are taking. They do not believe it is a proper course, or one that will lead to the results to be desired. We have, under a sense of deep responsibility, and under a sense of very great anxiety, endeavoured to do that which we thought was our duty to our country; and we have taken a course of measures which we believe to be best calculated to obtain a proper hearing for this country in the Councils of Europe, and to enable the country to take a proper position for the attainment of objects which I believe the great majority of the nation in reality demand. Of course, when we are discussing the propriety or impropriety of a particular step with Gentlemen who do not agree with that course itself, we stand at some disadvantage, because we are really arguing with different ideas in our minds. I give credit to right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite for being actuated by as patriotic motives as ourselves; and I believe, although I think them mistaken on some points, that they are equally desirous of maintaining the interests of the country. I claim from them that they should give the same credit to us, even though they may think the course we have taken is unwise, and that they will believe we have taken it honestly, and to promote no sinister object. We have taken the step of summoning a certain small, but gallant, portion of the Forces of our Indian Army to come to aid, if it should be necessary, in maintaining that which is not more a British than an Imperial interest, and, if an Imperial interest, then I am bold to say an Indian interest also. I believe the interest which the Indian Government has in this matter is far superior to any it had in the Peiho or Singapore Expeditions. There is a necessity laid upon us of seeing that our communications with India are uninterrupted—that is of importance to both sides of our Empire; and it is not unreasonable that we should call, if so advised, for some aid from our Indian Forces in maintaining these communications. Whether that be so or not, I entirely agree with what has been said by more than one speaker—that, however important the objects you are seeking may appear to be, their attainment would not be worth their price if it involved the sacrifice of the precious principles of the British Constitution. Attaching, as I do, great importance to the step we have taken—attaching, as I do, the greatest importance to the prosecution of the policy in which we are engaged—I would not recommend it if it infringed the principles of the Constitution. I do not believe that it does infringe those principles. Fully believing that the principles of the British Constitution are safe, and that there is no necessity for any superfluous vindication of them, I call on the House to reject the Motion of the noble Lord, and accept the Amendment of my right hon. Friend.

MAJOR NOLAN said, it was not the custom of the Irish Party to follow the rules which governed the supporters of Ministers or ex-Ministers, and consequently he desired to make a few remarks. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had not made out any case for employing the Indian troops without the sanction of Parliament being first obtained. He did not see why the Chancellor of the Exchequer should not, before the adjournment for the Easter Recess, have acquainted the House with the intentions of the Government. Considering the right hon. Gentleman had not made out any case of urgent necessity for the employment of the Indian troops he (Major Nolan) intended to vote for the Resolution of the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition. He wished it to be distinctly understood that he did not object to the employment of Indian troops with the consent of Parliament, but he strongly protested against such a course being pursued without Parliamentary sanction, and hence he should vote against the Government. The proceedings of the Ministers in this respect either meant nothing or that this country was on the verge of a serious war. This step on the part of the Government seemed to him to be the natural sequence to what was called the Empress policy. It was a dangerous proceeding for the Government to deal with the resources of India without the consent of Parliament. The control of Parliament over the establishment and movement of troops at home was, to a large extent, a guarantee of our Constitutional liberties, and he thought this country ought to be even more jealous of the movement of Indian troops without the consent of Parliament than of the English Forces.

MR. BROMLEY-DAVENPORT asked the indulgence of the House for a few moments. It was his duty not to give a silent vote on that occasion. He represented a large and important constituency (North Warwickshire), but which up to that time had been misrepresented in that debate. His constituency was second to none in its loyalty and patriotism, and he asserted, on its behalf, that he considered the conduct of the Government in this great, dangerous, and imminent crisis had been worthy of the highest praise. He considered that under the unprecedented and difficult circumstances in which the Government had been placed, they had acted with the greatest prudence and patriotism, and with the intention of, if possible, carrying out a pacific policy. He asked the attention of the right hon. Member for Greenwich to this fact. As long as the nation was influenced by his great eloquence what was the result—war, which he thought everyone must consider was a horrible, cruel, and brutal war. He believed he was quoting the words of the right hon. Gentleman correctly, when he said that the right hon. Gentleman had described it as a great and mighty enterprise, and that its results were glorious. But the nation now had a very different opinion, and the moment the nation ceased to listen to the brilliant eloquence of the right hon. Gentleman, what was the result? Peace, or the immediate prospects of peace. He asked his hon. Colleague (Mr. Newdegate) to remember that on the dimensions of the division that morning very much depended in the interests of peace, and that if he voted with the Opposition he would be voting directly in the interests of war.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The speech we have lately heard from the Chancellor of the Exchequer has tended to cast somewhat of a calm and pacific influence over a rather warm discussion which preceded it. When I listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman I was almost inclined to think that I was rather listening to a mediator between the two contending parties, than to one who was himself taking part in the contest. I really cannot say whether he did not argue as much against the extreme pretensions which have been put forward on the subject of the Prerogative of the Crown upon his own side, and, indeed, by some of his own Colleagues, as against anything which has fallen from this side of the House. The strongest thing he said was that there was no necessity for this Resolution. Now, I did not hear him say a single sentence which contradicted any proposition I have laid down; he merely says what the Home Secretary said—there is no necessity for what I have done. I have one word to say, and that is that we think the action taken by the Government, coupled with the declarations which have been made on this occasion, are in themselves mischievous; but we think that far more than anything they have done at present, their action tends to the establishment of a dangerous precedent which may hereafter be injurious to the liberties of the House and the liberties of this country. That is why we think the action of the Government, coupled with the declarations by which it has been supported, cannot be passed over. The right hon. Gentleman has begged the House not to press abstract truths to what he has called absurd conclusions. He said, and it is undoubtedly true, that it is the Prerogative of the Crown to make peace or declare war; but he says that that Constitutional axiom may be pressed to an absurd conclusion. I do not fully share the right hon. Gentleman's confidence in the accuracy of that statement. It appears to me that it would be perfectly possible for a Government to advise the Crown to declare war, and place Parliament and the country in a position from which they could not recede, however much they might repent it. That, it is clear to me, would be to press the Prerogative to an absurd conclusion. The right hon. Gentleman gave one illustration, which seemed to me to show, almost better than anything else, the real character of the pretensions made by the Government. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer said the Government would have been placed in what he called a cleft stick if, instead of taking the course they have adopted, they had asked the House for a Vote of Credit to meet the expense of moving the Indian troops to Malta. Now, let me suppose that the Vote of Credit which was obtained by them some time ago, instead of being expended within a few months, remained unexpended for eight or nine months longer—what necessity, I would ask, would there be that they should come to Parliament at all for the necessary money for the removal of these troops? This is entirely within the Prerogative of the Crown, the only control Parliament having being the providing of the expenses. But supposing, I say, the Government were in possession of an unexpected Vote, and had funds at their disposal, what necessity is there to come to Parliament at all? According to the Government dictum, the troops might be moved from India to Malta, and the whole transaction never brought before the attention of Parliament at all, until after the Vote of Credit had expired. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman would call that an absurd conclusion; but it appears to me to follow upon the assertions and pretensions put forward by the Government. The right hon. Gentleman, I may add, paid but very slight attention, in the course of his remarks, to the Amendment which has been moved by Her Majesty's Government. I still fail to see to what provision of law the Government refer in their Amendment. It does seem to me, with all the ingenuity and legal talent at the disposal of the Government, there is no law to be found, neither in the Mutiny Act, in the Bill of Rights, nor in the Indian Mutiny Act, which puts the uncontrolled disposal of these troops in the hands of the Government. Her Majesty's Government rest their defence upon two pleas—they plead that they are perfectly justified in what they have done; and, further, that an emergency existed which justified them in so acting, even if against the letter of the law. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Colonies charged me with being either unable or unwilling to recognize that any emergency existed. Now, Sir, I am perfectly willing, for the purpose of argument, to admit the existence of an emergency in the present case. I am bound to admit that a very short time ago the House voted the existence of an emergency. But because that has taken place, are we to be perfectly blind to the nature of the emergency, and to say that it is one which would justify the Government in taking any measure which they may think fit? Why, what is the emergency upon which we voted a short time ago? We are told by the Government that it was one which rendered necessary some preparations. We are told that measures of preparation only were required. But is this one of the measures of preparation? What is the object of it? Not to place 7,000 additional men as soon as possible in Malta, as that object would have been accomplished a great deal more expeditiously by sending troops from England. The object was not to increase the resources of Malta, but to show to the whole world that you have power to move and dispose of the Forces of your Indian Empire for the purposes of European policy. If that emergency was one of such instant and urgent necessity that Her Majesty's Government were obliged to move those troops in such haste that Parliament could not be consulted or informed of it until afterwards, I quite recognize the point, for it might be right to use the whole of the Indian armament for the purpose of European policy, yet the measure taken is one which would have been more effective if it had been deliberately sanctioned by Parliament before being carried into effect, instead of being done in such a hasty manner that Parliament is unable to do anything in it, except vote the expense which has been incurred in the Estimate that will be presented to it. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), in language to which we are now tolerably accustomed, criticized somewhat severely the conduct of the Opposition, and proceeded to compare the conduct of the Opposition with that of the Government, in that impartial and judicial manner of which he is a master. He said the Government must know the state of affairs better than anyone else, and that the measure which they proposed must be the best which could be taken in the emergency. Referring to our conduct, he said we knew nothing at all about the matter, and suggested that our conduct could only have been dictated by Party animus. Well, if that be the state of the case—if the Government are the only people who can know anything about the matter, and if we have no pretensions to represent the opinions of the country—what is the use of keeping Parliament in Session? If it be unpatriotic to discuss in any way or to raise the slightest doubt about the perfect wisdom of the course taken by Her Majesty's Government, why are we given an opportunity of discussing it? Why are the Estimates presented to us? And why are we asked to vote the Supplies for the year, if we are not to discuss them? Her Majesty's Government had better send us home as rapidly as possible if we are not to be given an opportunity for taking this factious and unpatriotic course. The hon. and learned Gentleman wound up with a rather strong declaration as to the unpatriotic course we have taken, and I think he said that it is not what honest and patriotic men would have done. The hon. and learned Member ought to be a good judge of these things. He has not always been sparing of criticism on a Government for their proceedings in reference to war. He moved no less than three Votes of Censure on Administrations for their proceedings in war, before war, and during war. His experience, therefore, ought rather to have influenced him in favour of the wisdom of the course we are taking in criticizing the proceedings of the Government while the measures are in contemplation. I do not think after the war was over there would be any use in discussing the matter. It would be as dead as Julius Cæsar. The hon. and learned Gentleman did not think it unpatriotic, while war was going on, to criticize the proceedings of the Ministry, and he was then successful, for he turned them out; and, not satisfied with that achievement, when he got a Minister more to his taste at that time, at any rate, for he was a most energetic supporter of the war—when Lord Palmerston succeeded Lord Aberdeen—the hon. and learned Gentleman did not leave off his attacks. When Lord Pal-

merston appealed to the hon. and learned Gentleman to refrain for the moment from pressing his Motion for the immediate appointment of a Committee to inquire into the administration of the Army in the Crimea, he would not hear of it, and it is certain that he did not then think that the Government were the only people who could possibly know anything about the matter. At all events, I must say, that great as may be the influence and authority of the hon. and learned Member, I must decline to receive from him, or from any other Member of this House, instructions as to my course. I assert that I, and those who act with me, are as honest and as patriotic as the hon. and learned Member himself. Sir, I confess that I should like to have said something about our old friend the Bill of Rights. I beg the House, however, not to be alarmed upon that subject, for I see that the hour is too late for me to do so, and I will not trespass upon the attention of the House by entering upon the legal argument. We have had an extremely interesting discussion of the legal points between the hon. and learned Members of this House. But I think too much importance has been attributed to the interesting speech of the Attorney General. In the course of this debate, the House will observe the great importance attached to that speech by both sides. I think almost undue importance has been attached to it, for able as was the argument of the Attorney General, it must be recollected that he stands towards the House and the Government, of which he is a Member, in a peculiar position—in a position which is unexampled, so far as I know in history, of any Member of any Government of this country. I read the other day a speech delivered by the hon. and learned Gentleman during last Easter Recess to his constituents at Preston. I think I may trouble the House with a short extract, to show the relation in which the hon. Gentleman stands towards the Government. The Attorney General said—

"It was, in his humble and honest opinion—and he would say so at the risk of getting a good 'wiggling'—a most unjust war waged by Russia against Turkey."

He went on to say he would have declared to Russia as soon as war was declared—"If you send a single soldier across the Pruth we will declare war against you." I do not know whether the hon. and learned Gentleman got the 'wiggling' which he anticipated; but, at all events, his speech shows that the Attorney General occupies a somewhat remarkable position towards the Government. He is bound, no doubt, to defend them in this House, but he is evidently not bound to agree with them. We know now what his opinion really is about the policy to be pursued when war broke out. The hon. and learned Gentleman made a very good speech in May last year in defence of the foreign policy of her Majesty's Government, which I am under the impression was not a policy of declaring war against Russia when she crossed the Pruth, but a policy of conditional neutrality. Therefore, I think that we ought not to attach too much importance to the opinions advocated by the hon. and learned Gentleman on this occasion. He has defended the action taken by the Government, as it was his duty to do; but what his real opinions are as to the Prerogative of the Crown with regard to a standing Army and the Privilege of Parliament, we must wait for until six, nine, or twelve months hence, when he goes to address his constituents at Preston. My right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich, I think, conferred a benefit upon the House and the country by the statement, which I will not weaken by repeating, as to the contentions virtually made by Her Majesty's Government in this House. The Under Secretary of State for India reduced those contentions the other day to an arithmetical form for the assistance of the House, and I think he stated the case rather neatly, although, at the same time, not quite accurately. The Under Secretary of State for India said that the Mutiny Bill authorized the Government to keep so many men out of India, plus so many men in India. Well, that appears to be a very accurate way of putting it; but the hon. Gentleman really asked the House to assert that the Mutiny Bill and the other Acts bearing on this subject enabled Her Majesty to maintain this number of men—the number voted in the Estimates, and included in the Mutiny Bill—plus the number serving in India, plus the number who may have been serving in India, but who are brought out of India to serve anywhere else. That is a sum

which does not agree with the sum given by the Under Secretary of State for India, and I venture to think that my way of putting it is more accurate than his. We have been told that there is no necessity for any great jealousy of a standing Army in these days. That may be so; but if the House is to relax its jealousy of a standing Army, it ought to be done deliberately and in public. I do not think the people of this country have relaxed their jealousy of a standing Army, whatever the House may have done. I am by no means certain that this House has relaxed its jealousy, and I do not think it ought to do so. It is said that it is absolutely impossible that our liberties in these days can be menaced by a standing Army. I do not know that, Sir. In the recollection of all of us we have seen countries in which liberties have been lost through the influence of standing Armies; and we hear from time to time that our Army is not a large one compared with the resources of the country. We have also heard great complaints of the small number of our soldiers; and there is a proposal for something very much resembling universal conscription. Who knows, but that under some fancy or some desire to take a more prominent part in the conflicts of Europe, our standing Army may not be increased? How is it possible to foretell that under no circumstances a standing Army may not encroach upon the Privileges of Parliament. If it be true that there is less reason now to fear that a standing Army will conflict with the liberties of the country than there used to be, there seems to be one danger far greater than it was 200 years ago. No doubt, as we are told, the Crown has, and always had, the power of making war, but it has it far more completely and absolutely now than it ever had it at any previous period. Formerly wars were conducted on a comparatively small scale, and with comparatively a great expenditure of time. Government did not want large Forces of men then, nor large pecuniary resources. Preparations had to be made long before hand, and after they had been made and the Expedition sent out—things not being conducted on the scale of modern wars—both Armies went into winter quarters; and there was plenty of time to consider, and perhaps to give up the war. But now, with the great Armies and great resources at the disposal of our Government, and telegraphic communications all over the world, the Government may give an order which, within a week, may make a great war absolutely inevitable—a war over which Parliament can have no control whatever. It is useless to tell us we have a control over the proceedings of Government by our privilege of voting Supplies. We know, in this instance, what that privilege of voting Supplies means. It would be utterly impossible—however much Parliament might desire it—for it to refuse to vote the expense of the 7,000 troops coming to Malta. A Government may give orders, which will make inevitable a war in more than one quarter of the globe, over which it would be impossible for Parliament to exercise any control where it has once broken out. Sir, I maintain that the powers of the Government for making war are far greater than they have been at any previous period. I believe the precautions and restrictions which Parliament has always thought it necessary to take against the existence of a standing Army should not be relaxed, but rather strengthened. Repeating again, that the action of the Government, supported by the reasons that they have given, does tend to relax these restrictions, which, I maintain, ought to be strengthened, I still prefer the Resolution I moved to the Amendment which has been proposed by the Government.

MR. O'DONNELL could not support the action of the Government, since it had been defended on absolutist principles. From what had been said by the Government, it seemed that their main reason for the course they had taken was the necessity of maintaining secrecy. That was the necessity of maintaining secrecy towards the Imperial Parliament, but not to anyone else. He knew that long before the news had reached this country—before even that a definite order for the despatch of the Indian troops to Malta had left the Government at home—the measure had been discussed and criticized openly in India; long before the 15th of last month, the removal of the troops to Malta was already common talk in India. At that time, colonels were trying the state of feeling in their regiments with regard to their willingness to embark on an

European enterprize. He was perfectly sure that what had been kept secret from Parliament was no secret at all, and was well known to the Cabinet of St. Petersburg. The only quarter in which the Government were able to maintain secrecy was the quarter in which their maintaining it was the most indefensible—namely, in respect of the Imperial Parliament. He maintained there was involved in this matter a very important principle beyond the mere question of the justice of the expenditure incurred in the matter. By the action of the Government, in keeping secrecy as to its intentions with them until it had carried them out, the House had been deprived of an opportunity of considering beforehand what would be the effect of the measure upon the domestic conduct and upon the future policy of India. It could not be denied that the House had been deprived of the opportunity of discussing the propriety of calling upon Indian mercenaries—engaged to maintain in India the defence of that Empire—of calling upon them to take part in an European war. The most disastrous administration was being carried on in India by imposing a vexatious taxation upon the country against its protests, till it amounted to financial oppression. It could not be denied that this House had a right to consider the whole bearing of this demand upon the military resources of India. What was the example now being held out to our Indian fellow-subjects? The worst of the Natives of India were induced by prospects of gain to leave their country, while the industrious taxpayers of the country were as far off as ever of receiving protection of Her Majesty's Government. He heartily and entirely concurred in the sentiments of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan). The Irish Members had a double interest in resisting the advance of absolutist principles; for, if the British Constitution should be worsened, it must be taken for certain that the Irish would get the worst of the worsening. After taking the step of removing the Indian troops without consulting that House, the Government came forward and pretended to be acting for the benefit of the Constitution, even while advancing such exaggerated views of the Royal Prerogative. He trusted, that in years to come, it would not be found that the voluntary champions of an exaggerated Prerogative—the champions of that Party whose views were to be read in a recent article in The Quarterly Review—had injured that Prerogative, and lessened the respect in which it ought to be held.

TELLERS.

Dyke, Sir W. H.
 Winn, R.

Words added.Main Question, as amended, put:

Resolved, That this House, being of opinion that the Constitutional control of Parliament over the raising and employment of the Military Forces of the Crown is fully secured by the provisions of the Law, and by the undoubted power of this House to grant or refuse Supplies, considers it to be unnecessary and inexpedient to affirm any Resolution tending to weaken the hands of Her Majesty's Government in the present state of Foreign affairs.

PARLIAMENT—THE WHITSUNTIDE RECESS.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD said, it might be for the convenience of their Lordships he should announce that for the Whitsun Holidays he would propose the adjournment of the House from the 7th to the 17th June.

MEDICAL ACT, 1858, AMENDMENT BILL—(No. 44.)

COMMITTEE.

Moved, "That the House be now put into Committee on the said Bill."

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON wished to speak as to the course he proposed to ask the House to take with reference to this Bill. He had put on the Paper one Amendment of some importance, and there were other Amendments which also would require some attention. He therefore thought he should be consulting the convenience of the House if he asked their Lordships to go into Committee pro forma only, in order that the Bill might be re-printed with the proposed Amendments and the discussion taken on a future evening. When introducing the Bill, some time ago, he said he would allow a considerable period to intervene between the second reading and the Committee, because, as the measure affected the Medical Profession and the public in so large a degree, he was anxious that ample time should be given to both to consider the provisions of the Bill, and that he might have the advantage of knowing the opinions formed with respect to them, so that he might put the Bill in as satisfactory and perfect a state as possible. The Medical Profession readily responded to his request. He had had the pleasure of receiving various deputations on the subject, and he had letters from medical men from all parts of the country. Their Lordships would remember that, when asking for leave to bring in the Bill, he expressed his opinion that the best mode of dealing with the question would be to establish a uniform minimum standard of examination for those who sought to enter the Medical Profession, and he expressed his concurrence in the opinion that a Conjoint Examining Board for each part of the United Kingdom was desirable with the view of establishing such a standard. But he also told their Lordships that there was a difficulty in the way of a conjoint scheme, which difficulty was raised chiefly by the Scotch Universities, and consequently that at the time he did not see his way to introducing a clause rendering a Conjoint Board compulsory. But the representations which from time to time had been made to him both before and after the second reading from the several corporate and other bodies interested, made it clear to him that nothing but a conjoint scheme would be satisfactory, and in an endeavour to promote it he ventured on what he thought might be an acceptable compromise. He suggested that it should be made compulsory on all the Medical Corporations of each of the three divisions of the Kingdom to form a conjoint scheme, leaving it to the various Universities to come in if they thought fit. He had had his proposed compromise circulated through the country, and in answer to it he had had representations from various bodies. The various Medical Corporations in England condemned his proposal on the ground that nothing short of a Conjoint Board to include the Universities would be satisfactory. The English Universities took the same view; the representations from Ireland were to the same effect; and from various Medical Societies in the Metropolis, who treated the question in a very impartial manner, he had received representations in the same direction. He was bound to say that the opinion of those various bodies and societies was opposed to his compromise, and he would not be dealing honestly with the House if he did not say that he could not resist the arguments they had brought under his consideration. Desiring to put the Bill into a shape in which it would be of real advantage to the Medical Profession and satisfactory to the whole country, he had reluctantly come to the conclusion that he must ask their Lordships to allow him to amend it so as to make a Conjoint Board for each of the three portions of the United Kingdom compulsory. The chief opposition to such a proposal came from the Universities of Scotland; but he hoped that his endeavours in the way of compromise would show them that he had, as far as possible, deferred to their views. When he found that he could bring no argument against a compulsory joint scheme, he would not be acting honestly if he did not make it a part of the Bill. He hoped, therefore, the Universities of Scotland would appreciate his motives, and see that he was doing what he believed would be best for the Medical Profession and the public generally. With this explanation, he would ask their Lordships to go into Committee pro forma.

VISCOUNT POWERSCOURT begged to congratulate the noble Duke on the conclusion at which he had arrived. He was convinced that only a Conjoint Examining Board for all the three Kingdoms would be satisfactory.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, that having from the first pointed out that a blot in the measure was the absence of the clause, which the Lord President now proposed to introduce, he begged to express his thanks to his noble Friend. He believed that the course proposed by his noble Friend was the most desirable in the interests of the public; and he hoped that the Universities of Scotland would, in the interest of the public, withdraw their opposition to it. But, however that might be, he felt convinced that his noble Friend had adopted the right course.

EARL GRANVILLE also congratulated his noble Friend the Lord President on the change in his determination. Having accompanied a deputation from the University of London to his noble Friend, he could bear testimony to the patient attention with which his noble Friend listened to the representations made to him by that deputation. He believed that the change which his noble Friend proposed to make in the Bill would prove of great advantage to the public and the Medical Profession.

House in Committee accordingly; Bill reported, without Amendment; Amendments made: Bill re-committed to a Committee of the Whole House, and to be printed as amended. (No. 90.)

CRIME IN IRELAND—RETURNS.

QUESTION.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE asked the Lord President of the Council, When the Return as to crime in Ireland, ordered to be made by the House of Lords on the 12th of April last, would be laid upon the Table of the House?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, the Return which was ordered by their Lordships' House was of a very voluminous character, and the materials were very troublesome to collect, and, when collected, required much time to put them in order. He could only say that no loss of time had occurred since the noble Lord moved for the Return, and as soon as it was ready it would be laid on the Table of the House.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF DEEDS BY MARRIED WOMEN (IRELAND) BILL.

(NO. 87.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF BELMORE, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, the terms of the English and Irish Acts for the Abolition of Fines and Recoveries, with reference to the acknowledgment of deeds by married women were identical. The English and Irish Courts of Common Pleas respectively made Rules, as they were empowered to do by the Acts. These Rules were identical. They made it suffice if one of the Commissioners was a disinterested party. Acting on the faith of the Rules, many deeds had been executed before Commissioners, where one was an interested party. The question arose in England as to whether such an acknowledgment was not invalid, and the Rule itself ultra vires. The arguments, &c., were to be found in the Report of the case, In re-Ollerton, 15 C.B. Before judgment was given, an English Act was passed to validate such acknowledgments—17 & 18 Vict. This Act was never extended to Ireland. The same question had arisen in this country. If the proposed Act were not passed—(1.) A great injustice would be done in the particular instance in which the deed was executed on the faith of the Rule of Court. (2.) There would remain the absurdity of having the law in the two countries different on this important point. (3.) There was no saying how many deeds and titles might depend upon such acknowledgments. He (the Earl of Belmore) need only say, in addition, that this Bill, although introduced by a private Member into the House of Commons, had the cordial approval of Her Majesty's Attorney General for Ireland.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he had no objection to the Bill being read a second time, as before the next stage of the Bill was taken he should have an opportunity of examining it. He would not, therefore, oppose the present stage.

Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

QUESTIONS.

NAVY—WRITERS IN THE DOCK-YARDS.—QUESTION.

MR. E. J. REED asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the arrangements for removing the disabilities of the mechanic writers in Her Majesty's dockyards are yet completed; and, if so, whether they will speedily come into operation?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, that the question had been considered at the Admiralty, and their recommendations upon it were at present before the Treasury, and he had every reason to hope that the change would be carried out shortly.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE WHITSUNTIDE RECESS. QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When it is proposed to adjourn for Whitsuntide, and for how long? He would also like to know, What the course of Government Business would be?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I am afraid that I shall not be able to propose any very lengthened adjournment at Whitsuntide. The state of Business is such as will hardly admit of that. What I propose is, that we should have a Morning Sitting on Friday June 7, and should then rise till the following Thursday. With regard to the course of Business, the principal Business which the Government have to go on with on Government nights will be the Committee of Supply. On Monday, as hon. Gentlemen are aware, we propose to take the Supplementary Estimate for the movement of Indian troops. If there is time on that evening, we shall, of course, go on with the other classes of Supply; and on the Thursday following we should also propose to take Supply. I mentioned the other day that we hoped to fix a Morning Sitting before Whitsuntide for the Scotch Roads and Bridges Bill. I cannot promise next Tuesday for that purpose, because of the engagement we entered into with those hon. Gentlemen who gave up their precedence to enable the debate which concluded last night to proceed; but on the Tuesday following—the 4th of June—we propose that there should be a Morning Sitting for the Scotch Roads and Bridges Bill.

NAVY—H.M.S. "BEAGLE"—JUDICIAL POWERS OF NAVAL COMMANDERS—EXECUTION OF A NATIVE OF TANNA.—QUESTION.

DR. KENEALY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he would explain the reasons of the delay in laying upon the Table of the House the further Papers connected with the execution of Nokwai on board H.M.S. "Beagle" on the 25th of September last, which he promised the House to produce as soon as he had received them?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, that further Papers on the subject had been received last week. They were now under the consideration of the Admiralty, and he hoped to be able in a few days to lay them on the Table.

CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF JOHN HENNAFAN.—QUESTION.

DR. KENEALY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true that John Hennafan has been committed to prison by the police magistrate at Wandsworth for three months with hard labour; and, whether he is prepared to remit that sentence?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he had no intention of remitting the sentence passed upon the person referred to. He (Mr. Cross) knew nothing about him, except what the magistrate—a person of considerable experience—had told him. He was informed by him that that man had been long an incorrigible rogue and vagabond, who had been repeatedly committed; that eventually he was sent before Quarter Sessions, and received a year's imprisonment; that he was afterwards offered his expenses to enable him to go back to Ireland, but that he refused to go, and continued to lead the life of a rogue and vagabond until he was committed again to gaol.

CRIMINAL LAW—THE REV. MR. DODWELL.—QUESTION.

DR. KENEALY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he will explain to the House the grounds on which he refuses to release the Reverend Mr. Dodwell, who has been reported to him on high medical authority as being of perfectly sound mind, since the murderer Broomfield has been discharged because he had become sane?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that Broadmoor Asylum, so far as insane male persons were concerned, was for those only who had been acquitted on the ground of insanity. That was the present rule. When the Rev. Mr. Dodwell was found to be insane by a verdict of his countrymen, he was sent in the ordinary course to Broadmoor. Some time ago, letters were received at the Home Office from Dr. Wynn and Dr. Forbes Winslow, as to the state of the prisoner. Those letters were sent on the 15th of April to the authorities of Broadmoor, with an intimation that when they were able to report that it would be consistent with the safety both of the public and of the prisoner himself that he should be either absolutely or conditionally discharged, his case would then be considered by the Secretary of State, and not till then. No Report had yet been received.

PARLIAMENT—FRANCHISE OF THE RESERVE MEN.—QUESTION.

MR. ELLIOT asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether the existing Law deprives a man of his Parliamentary or Municipal franchise when he is performing his duty in the Militia or in Reserve Forces, should his wife or family receive, during such period of service, parochial relief?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER): Sir, the existing law deprives a man of the Parliamentary and municipal franchise should his wife or family receive parochial relief. That disqualification is not removed by service in the Militia or Reserve Forces.

MERCHANT SHIPPING—DYNAMITE, &c.
QUESTION.

MR. M'LAGAN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether his attention has been directed to a paragraph in the "Liverpool Express" of the 23rd instant, headed "A Customs Blunder," in which it is stated that the bark "Enchanter," chartered with a cargo of salt and dynamite to Halifax, in Canada, was detained in Liverpool by a Government order; if so, whether it is correct that the vessel has been detained by a Government order, and whether a manufacturer of explosives in this country is to be prevented shipping as hitherto his products to his agents for sale in the British Colonies?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, that if the hon. Gentleman would allow him to do so, he would give him an answer to the Question. His attention had been first called to the subject of the paragraph referred to by seeing the Notice. On inquiry, he found it was a fact that that vessel was detained, as stated in the Question; but the whole subject was under the consideration of the Law Officers of the Crown, and, until he was in possession of their opinions, he could not answer the last part of the Question.

CROWN—THE INDIAN CONTINGENT.

QUESTIONS.

MR. WADDY asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the powers conferred upon Her Majesty by the 57th section of the 21st and 22nd Vic. c. 106, have ever been exercised; and, if so, whether he will give the date of any Order in Council made in pursuance thereof, and cause the same to be printed for the information of the House?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, no Order in Council has been made under the 57th section of the Act, because none has been required. The terms and conditions of service of the Native Forces remain precisely what they were when that Act was passed. All that has been done is this. The Governor General in Council in 1869 slightly altered the language of the form of attestation, so as to bring it into harmony with the public notification of the terms of enlistment and the condition of service relating to the Indian Native troops issued by the Governor General of India in 1856.

MR. FAWCETT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, before any portion of the revenues of India was devoted to defray the expenses of the transport of Indian troops to Malta, the expenditure was sanctioned by the Council of the Secretary of State for India; and, if so, whether he will inform the House on what day this sanction was given?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, no portion of the Revenues of India has at any time been devoted to defray the expenses of the transport of Indian troops to Malta, and therefore no such expenditure could be sanctioned by the Council of State for India.

MR. FAWCETT: I beg to give Notice that on Monday, I will ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer a Question to the following effect:—

"Whether it is not provided, in the 41st section of the Government of India Act, that no grant or appropriation of any of the revenues of India can be allowed without the sanction of a majority of the Council of the Secretary of State, and whether such grant or appropriation must not have been made when the money of India was advanced to defray these expenses?"

MR. CHILDERS: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer a Question, of which I have given him private Notice—namely, Whether he has any objection to state to the House now the form of the Vote for the Army Service to be taken on Monday next? Perhaps I may, to save trouble, explain that my object is to ascertain whether the number of men will be stated in that Vote, so that they may appear as having been voted by the House. In further explanation, I may mention, that, according to the Estimate which we have before us, £350,000 is to be voted to meet the additional expenditure for defraying the cost of the transport of Indian troops, and only below, in the explanatory statement, mention is made of 7,000 men. My object is to inquire, Whether these 7,000 men will appear in the Resolution as voted by the House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The right hon. Gentleman only gave me Notice of his Question just now across the Table. I have not the form of the Vote here. I apprehend, however, that the Vote will contain the number of men with respect to which the money is taken.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the hon. Member for Dundee, If he intends to go on with his Motion respecting the Supplementary Estimate for moving Indian troops?

MR. E. JENKINS, in reply, said, that in view of the fact that his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Pawcett) proposed on the Estimate to raise a question on which he (Mr. Jenkins) thought he was entitled to precedence, he should withdraw his Motion in favour of that of his hon. Friend. This would not, however, prevent the House from discussing the policy and expediency of employing Indian troops in the course of the debate.

MR. MUNDELLA asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether, for the convenience of the discussion on Monday, he was prepared to furnish a statement of the terms and conditions of the contract entered into for the transport of the Indian troops?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, I am not in a position to furnish this information to the House, inasmuch as the information I have received has only come to hand by telegraph.

MR. MUNDELLA: Will the right hon. Gentleman give us the information he has received by telegraph? ["No, no!"]

PUBLIC BUSINESS—COUNTY COURTS BILL—VALUATION BILL.

QUESTION.

In answer to Mr. J. G. HUBBARD,

MR. SCLATER-BOTH said, that the adjourned debate on the County Courts Bill would not be resumed without due Notice. With respect to the Valuation Bill, he hoped that an early opportunity might be found for its second reading.

PRISONS ACT, 1877—RULES AS TO DEBTORS.—QUESTION.

MR. E. JENKINS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is his intention to make some alteration in the rules in regard to imprisoned debtors?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that some of the prison rules with respect to debtors had been misinterpreted, and that measures had been taken to make them clearer. They had been generally relaxed, both as regarded the treatment of the debtors themselves, and the admittance of their wives and families to visit them.

ARMY—RIFLED ORDNANCE. QUESTION.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is correct, as stated in a letter published in the "Times" newspaper of the 18th March, 1878, that although £7,000,000 have been expended on experiments and on the present system of rifled ordnance, the inventor of that system has not received any remuneration?

LORD EUSTACE CECIL, in reply, said, that Mr. Padwick, the writer of the letter published in The Times on the 18th of March, had frequently set forth his claims to be considered the inventor of the present system of rifled ordnance; but, during the last quarter of a century, no Secretary of State had admitted those claims, and, consequently, he had received no reward.

POOR LAW—REMOVAL OF IRISH PAUPERS—THOMAS JOHNSON. QUESTION.

MR. R. POWER asked the President of the Local Government Board, If his attention has been called to the deportation of Thomas Johnson, who was, on the 10th instant, removed from Ulverston Workhouse to Waterford, in Ireland; whether the statement be true that the said Johnson resided for 42 years in England, and for eight years was employed at Bedlington, and was in search of work at Ulverston when he sought temporary relief; and, if it was legal to remove him to Ireland; and, if so, can he hold out any hope that the Law may be amended?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: Sir, my attention was only called to the subject yesterday by the Question appearing on the Notice Paper. Immediately, I telegraphed to Ulverston, and I have received from the Clerk to the Guardians this morning a statement respecting the case. He says it is true that Thomas Johnson was removed from Ulverston to Waterford, as stated in the hon. Gentleman's Question; that he became chargeable to the Ulverston Union on the 25th of April last, and stated that he was born at Waterford, and did not make any settlement in England during his residence here, although the terms and conditions under which he could have made a settlement were carefully explained to him. I am not informed what length of time he has lived in England, or of his having been employed in Bedlington for eight years; but, if he had been so employed, he would have gained a settlement under the terms of the Act of 1870. Although that was explained to him, he denied that he had made a settlement in England.

IRELAND—THE COLLECTOR OF RATES
OFFICE, DUBLIN—THE REPORT.

QUESTION.

MR. M. BROOKS asked a Question, of which he had given private Notice, Whether it was the intention of the Chief Secretary for Ireland to lay on the Table of the House the Report recently published with regard to the maintaining and management of the Collector of Rates Office, Dublin?

MR. J. LOWTHER: The Report is ready, but the evidence is not in print. It will be desirable to defer the presentation of the Report until the evidence can be produced at the same time. I hope it will be produced shortly.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

PROBATE, LEGACY, AND SUCCESSION DUTIES.—RESOLUTION.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY, in rising to call attention to the incidence of the Probate, Legacy, and Succession Duties; and to move—

"That the present system of taxing the succession to property is unjust, and, in the opinion of this House, ought to be re-adjusted," said: I must express my surprise that this subject has not been discussed in this House since 1853. In that year my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) spoke of the probate duty as one which called for reform, although he was then obliged to postpone its consideration. The noble Lord the present Prime Minister, also, at the same time, spoke of his hope that a measure would be brought forward which might reconcile contending interests, and terminate the system complained of. Under these circumstances, my object is to call attention to some of the anomalies attending the existing system, of which I apprehend many hon. Members are not aware. In speaking of the re-adjustment of these taxes, I do not intend to propose an increase of the taxation of the country; my contention will be that the present taxation should be fairly and equally distributed over all kinds of property, and all classes of the community. But if the Chancellor of the Exchequer desires to increase the Revenue of the country—and I fear, from the policy the Government is pursuing, increased taxation will be necessary—I think I can point out to him that by charging the richer classes the same rates of duty as the poorer have to pay on the smaller estates, and by extending the taxes to all kinds of property alike, he will have an increased fund at his disposal of over £5,000,000 sterling. I do not intend to enter on the history of the various taxes further than necessary to explain, so far as explicable, their anomalies. The probate duty was first introduced many years ago in the form of a uniform stamp of 5s. on all estates. After some years, the stamp was increased by charging higher rates on groups of estates of different amounts up to £300, and estates beyond £300 were charged nothing more. The scale was extended from time to time until, in 1815, it reached £1,000,000 sterling, at which it remained until 1859, when it was extended to cover estates of any amount. The first anomaly of the probate duty to which I shall call attention is that this tax is not charged on real estate. An estate of, say, £30,000 in cash, stocks, or even mortgages of real estate, has to pay probate duty; but if, before his death, the deceased had invested the amount in land, the land would not have paid any duty. If even he had directed by his will that the £30,000 was to be invested in an estate of which his successor was to have only a life rent, then the £30,000 in cash would have escaped duty. On the other hand, if the deceased had owned £30,000 in land, and directed the estate to be sold and divided among the legatees, the amount would be chargeable with duty. Then, again, real estate is chargeable with duty when forming part of partnership funds engaged in trade. The share which a deceased partner of a manufactory owns of mills, or bleaching grounds, has to pay the same as personal estate. Money in land, or going into land, pays no duty; but money coming out of land, or in real estate for purposes of trade, has to pay the same as personal property. It is thus evidently nothing inherent in the land itself, no special character it has—because the landed estate of a deceased person sold under his will has to pay duty as well as partnership funds in land—but an arbitrary exemption of the owners of real estate. I do not see any ground why real estate should not be dealt with in the same way as personal estate. There is nothing in the nature of land why it, or its owner, should be exempted from taxation. On the contrary, there seem special reasons that land, which enjoys the exceptional advantage of increasing in value without effort of the owner, and the security of which is guaranteed by the whole national resources, should, instead of being exempted, bear even a higher rate than personal estate. About half-a-century ago, Mr. Gwynne, the then Comptroller of the Duties, expressed his surprise that the probate duty had not been extended to real, as well as personal estate. Mr. M'Culloch, the economist, writing on taxation in 1863, said to exempt land from such duties was plainly an abuse, and he attributed it to the superior influence in the Legislature of the landed gentry. All the arrangements with regard to this tax clearly show that the exemption is intended to fall exclusively on the landed proprietors, and the only explanation seems to be that those who had the principal influence and control in imposing this duty declined to impose it on themselves, or to share that burden of taxation which they were placing upon others. The second anomaly is that the duty is charged at a higher rate on smaller estates than on those of larger amount. A testate estate of £200 is charged £5; and, if intestate, the duty is £8; or 2½ per cent in the one case, and 4 per cent in the other. An estate of £1,000 pays probate duty of 3 per cent or 4½ per cent, according to whether the deceased was testate or intestate; £2,000 pays only 2½ per cent; £3,000, only 2 per cent. If an estate is so large as £30,000, the tax is only 1½ per cent. The effect may be illustrated thus—An estate of £30,000 pays probate duty to the amount of £450; but if, instead of being left in one estate, the same amount had been left in 30 estates of £1,000 each, the probate duty charged, instead of being £450, would have amounted to £900. Thus, the one large estate of £30,000 pays only one-half the rate of the tax levied on 30 estates of £1,000 each. This is altogether against common justice and sound principles of levying taxation. It places the higher rate on the poor, and the lower rate on the rich, instead of levying an equal rate on all, or inclining in the opposite direction, and relieving to some extent from the burden of taxation those least able to bear it. Mr M'Culloch has remarked upon this, that it is impossible to say a word in excuse of a practice of this sort, which is as scandalous as it is unjust. Another anomaly in charging probate duty is, that it is levied on groups of estates between certain amounts, and not by a certain percentage. The first group consists of estates between £100 and £200, and on every estate between these sums the duty is £2 if testate, and £3 if intestate. The stamp advances irregularly by successive steps. For instance, the next group consists of estates between £200 and £300, on which the duty is £5 if testate, and £8 if intestate. Then, on testate estates between £2,000 and £3,000, the duty is £50, or about 2½ per cent on the minimum amount in the group. Now, it is evident that if the £2,000 estate is charged the proper amount of duty, and if a £2,900 estate pays nothing more, the portion over £2,000—namely, £900—goes untaxed.

Going up to the larger amounts, an estate of £34,500 pays no more than one of £30,000—the lowest amount in the group—and so on. On estates of that amount the sum of £4,500 pays no probate duty. We have this striking anomaly—that while you tax estates of so low an amount as £100 and £200, 10 times that amount may pass untaxed on estates of large value. The clear plan that should be adopted in the imposition of this duty is, that, like the legacy duty, it should be levied by a percentage on all estates. Another anomaly is that intestate estates are charged a higher rate than testate estates. I can find no ground why it should be so. If an individual fails to devise his property according to his own desire, and the State steps in and distributes it according to what is supposed to be natural right, there is no reason why the estate should be taxed more highly than when there is a will. This, again, presses very heavily on the smaller estates, for it is the poorer classes, for the most part, who die intestate. The Return, which was made on my Motion last year, shows that about one-third in value of the estate under £300 are intestate; whereas, in estates over £1,000, only one-twelfth are intestate. I will now briefly refer to the legacy duty, in which the anomalies are not so great. That duty is imposed by a percentage on all incomes, and is intended to be levied on the legatees by whom it is payable. In this case, poor and rich pay the same percentage, the difference in the rates depending upon the degree of relationship, and ranging from 1 to 10 per cent. This duty was imposed by Mr. Pitt, in 1780, to provide funds to carry on the war then waging. His proposal to increase the rates in 1796 included real as well as personal property, and both Bills passed the House of Commons; but the Lords rejected the Bill imposing the duty on real property, and passed the other. Nothing corresponding to the legacy duty was imposed on real estate until 1853, when the succession tax was introduced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich, then Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman then intimated his intention of placing the probate duty on a more equitable footing; but the pressure of other matters probably prevented him from dealing with the question. The succession duty is, however, really a very different tax from the legacy duty. By Section 21 of the Succession Duty Act, it is provided that the interest of every successor to real estate shall be considered as only an annuity of the amount of the annual value of the property, and the duty eligible thereon, payable in eight half-yearly instalments. For instance, a son aged 40 years, who succeeds to an estate of £30,000, has to pay succession duty on a sum of about £14,800 only, and on this latter sum the duty amounts to £148. Compare that with the case of a son of the same age inheriting the same sum in stocks or cash. He would, in the first place, have to pay probate duty of £450 if his father died testate, and £675 if he died intestate; then a legacy duty of 1 per cent, amounting to £300. These sums together make £750 if the parent died testate, and £975 if he died intestate; while the inheritor of the same value in land in unfettered fee simple pays only £148. I cannot conceive what excuse can be offered for this anomaly. Let me again compare this charge of £150 on the landed estate of £30,000 with what the poorer classes have to pay. If the land had to pay at the same rate as an insurance policy of, say, £200, which comprises the whole estate of the deceased, instead of paying less than £150, the £30,000 estate would have to pay £1,050 in the case of testacy, and £1,500 in case of intestacy. That is, a small estate of £200 pays, in the one case, 10 times, and in the other, 15 times proportionally higher rates than an estate of £30,000 in land. The general results are these—The probate duty, in the year 1877, amounted to about £2,500,000 and the legacy duty to over £2,750,000—the two sums together, levied exclusively on personal estate, produced £5,100,000. During the same period, succession duty, the only tax paid by real estate, yielded only £849,000. Now, in 1876-7, the total annual value of real estate, by the Income Tax Returns, amounted to £153,475,000; and, if we consider such property worth from 25 to 30 years' purchase, and that the life of a generation is of about the same duration, we come to this—that the total value of the annual succession to real estate must be about £150,000,000 sterling, and, if so, real estate should pay annually duty on that amount. Now, during the same year, the total value of the succession to personal estate was £131,000,000, a considerably smaller amount; but this smaller amount paid probate and legacy duty of over £5,100,000, while real estate paid less than £850,000. It thus appears that real estate—that is, property in land and houses—is exempted to the extent of over £4,000,000 sterling annually, as compared with personal property. Besides the real estates belonging to private individuals, there are the estates in land belonging to corporate authorities, trustees, &c., which are not subject to taxation for either probate or succession duty. The public are beginning to recognize that the funds belonging to corporations are not proper subjects of exemption from fair taxation; and when we consider the use to which a considerable portion of those funds are devoted—as, for instance, in the City of London—there seems very little ground for their exemption. As regards readjustment of these taxes, Mr. M'Culloch in the Encyclopædia Britannica, says—

“We cannot but think that the mode of charging the duty, as well as the duty itself, should be identical on all sorts of property. This taxation does not yield more than one-fourth or fifth that it would if assessed in the same way as the tax is assessed on personal estate. If the taxation is to be maintained, it ought to be imposed at a uniform rate over all properties.”

It is open to consideration whether the smallest class of estates ought not to be exempted. Incomes under £150 are altogether exempted from income tax, and an allowance is made on incomes up to £400; but probate duty is charged on small estates down to £100. I think a succession not exceeding £300 represents as humble a class in the community as £150 of annual income. Estates of under £300 probably go to poor families, and it would be a great relief to them if estates of £300 were altogether exempted from probate duty, not only on account of the duty itself, but in saving the large amount of expense in the administration of small estates. An exemption of estates under £300 would also admit of a great economy in the collection of the tax. The Return of last year shows that more than one-third of the total number of estates on which probate duty was charged was under £300, and that the tax on such estates amounted to less than £48,000. If these small estates were charged  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, the same as large estates, the amount derived from them would not exceed £35,000, so that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in exempting estates under £300, would be making a very small sacrifice indeed. Then the charges on small estates by the various troublesome forms required are very heavy. In the case of a small succession, consisting wholly of a policy of £100, the recipient, who was a son, had to pay charges at Somerset House to the amount of nearly £5. Considering the forms necessary, and the legal assistance required, I fear the charges on small estates, including duty, amount, in many cases, to well on to 10 per cent before the money gets into the hands of the successor. This is a serious matter, and occasions a great deal of heart-burning and bitterness throughout the humbler classes of the community. I have refrained from comment upon those extraordinary anomalies, as comment appeared to be unnecessary. But, in considering this subject, there recurs forcibly to my mind an objection urged against an extension of the franchise—that a great danger would arise in extending the representation to the poorer classes, because they would probably impose taxes unjustly, unfairly, and dishonestly on the rich. It is not open to me to discuss this objection at present; and I will only say that such an objection comes with very bad grace from Gentlemen who all these many years never raised their voice against a system of taxation so indefensibly unjust and one-sided as this of the probate and succession duties—which dishonestly taxes the estate of the poor man at a higher rate than that of the rich, and reduces the small provision for the orphan by the probate duty, while it allows the large landed estate of the wealthy landholder to go free. I thank the House for the attention they have given me, and beg to move the Resolution of which I have given Notice.

MR. BAXTER said, he only rose to express the hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Secretary to the Treasury, before the discussion closed, would, at all events, tell the House that they were favourably disposed towards the view of his hon. Friend the Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay). He (Mr. Baxter) had never heard our system of succession duties adequately defended in that House or out of it, and he felt tolerably satisfied that the system admitted of no adequate defence. Just let them take the incidence of the probate duty. Why should probate duty be levied at a higher scale upon a small sum than upon a large one? Why should territorial estates—why should landed property—go scot free, while personal estates of the same amount were taxed? Why should premises employed in trade be taxed, while land and buildings not so employed were exempted? He must say that all those were things that passed his comprehension. Surely, there was a prima facie case made out in favour of all kinds of property being taxed in the same way. He believed that if they were to tax real property in the same proportion as personal property, it would yield to the Public Exchequer three times the sum that it now did. That was a consideration which ought to weigh with the Chancellor of the Exchequer as guardian of the public purse. He would, without entering into the details of the question, simply appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to pluck up his courage, and put an end to the present anomalous state of things. By doing so, he would do an act of justice, would greatly benefit the finances of the country, and would take a course commending itself to the good sense of the nation.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the present system of taxing the succession to property is partial and unjust, and, in the opinion of this House, ought to be re-adjusted,"
—(Mr. James Barclay,)

MR. GREGORY said, he agreed with the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Barclay), that there were several anomalies in the present mode of levying the succession duty, as contradistinguished from the probate duty, which it was desirable should be removed, and he did not see why all estates should not be treated on the footing of an equal percentage. But the principal object of the hon. Gentleman's Motion was the imposition of the probate duty upon landed property, and, with respect to that, he (Mr. Gregory) wished to point out that the hon. Gentleman had left out of his calculation the land tax, which was about £1,000,000 a-year. There was also the land tax which had been redeemed, which, he believed, was about another £1,000,000 a-year. Moreover, a stamp duty of, he thought, about 10s. in every £100 was imposed on every conveyance of land, but a vast amount of personal property was constantly changing hands without paying any tax. Nearly all local rates fell upon the land, and personal property was practically exempt from that taxation. The case of personal property was very different from that of real property, for personal property might be dealt with in various ways by which the State was prevented from realizing taxation on it again. In these circumstances, it would be unfair to charge land upon the same footing in respect of succession as personalty was dealt with, seeing that it contributed more largely than other descriptions of property to the general taxation of the country.

MR. M'LAREN said, he heartily approved of the views expressed by the hon. Member for Forfar (Mr. J. W. Barclay). The hon. Member had opened up a large question, and only into one part of it did he (Mr. M'Laren) wish to enter. But he must first call attention to the remarks of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory), and though he agreed with much that that hon. Member had said, yet he could not but feel that he had fallen into a mistake when, in comparing the burthens imposed upon moveable property with those imposed upon land, he asserted that moveable property—as, for example, railway shares—paid a lower rate of stamp duty on conveyance than was paid on the conveyance of land. The stamp duty upon £1,000, be it in land, or railway, or bank shares, was the same; but take £1,000,000 in railway shares or in bank shares, and then select estates worth £1,000,000 in any part of England—it would be found that men holding the shares paid four times, and perhaps ten times, as much as the holders of the land, because shares were frequently bought and sold as opportunities occurred, and paid the same stamp duty as land on each transfer; and it followed that in the result they really paid far more than land, which seldom changed hands. This was exactly the opposite of the conclusion drawn by the hon. Member for East Sussex. The hon. Member had referred to the land tax as a heavy burthen on land, and as having originally produced £2,000,000, although now only £1,000,000, owing to redemption. It was well known that the land tax when first imposed—nearly two centuries ago—was in lieu of certain feudal and other burthens which land had then to bear. All these old burthens were removed upon the condition that land should for ever pay 4s. in the pound upon the real annual value. There was no mention of nominal value. Real value was set down as plainly as the Act could make it. But how did the landowners escape from their engagements and the obligations imposed upon them? They valued the land the year after the Act was passed, and they had never valued it since, so that land now paid upon a valuation made nearly 200 years ago—although they ought to pay 4s. on the present real value, according to the bargain made with them when the feudal burdens were abolished. If this bargain were honestly carried out, few other taxes would be required. The analogy which the hon. Member for East Sussex endeavoured to show between bills of exchange stamps, and stamp duties on land, did not exist; for a bill of exchange was really only a convenient way of deferring the payment of a debt owed from one man to another. The one thing desirable in relation to the probate duty was equalization. Take an illustration. A man having saved £1,000, leaves it by will to his son or daughter—all, perhaps, he has in the world. The probate duty has to be paid, and the deputy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer goes to the party inheriting the money, and out of every 33 sovereigns upon the table insists upon picking up one. On the other hand, a wealthy man dies, leaving £30,000 to his heir, and what happens? The deputy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, instead of £1 in every £33, claims only £1 in every £66. Could that be fair, and was there any justice, or even common sense, in such an arrangement? Suppose the man with the £1,000 complained, and asked how that could be defended, what answer could be given? Only this—the man who paid £1 in £66 was a rich man; rich men made the law, and in framing the law adjusted it so as to suit themselves. He appealed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, not asking him to raise the one rate or to reduce the other, but to strike a fair medium, and make each class pay the same percentage; so that the same amount would in this way be raised, and there would be no complaints of the Revenue being injuriously affected. With respect to the succession duty imposed on land in 1853, it was expected to produce above £2,000,000, but had never reached one-half of that amount; and, surely, that showed that the object with which the tax was imposed had not been realized, and that the rate ought now to be increased. Under the circumstances, he thought it a fair demand to ask for an equalization of the probate and legacy duties. If the Government were not prepared to reduce the higher duty to the lower, then let both be placed upon the same footing. Let each pay £1 in £45, or such other figure as, in a couple of hours, an accountant could adjust easily as producing a Revenue equal in amount to the present system. He cordially supported the Motion.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD thought the House was greatly indebted to the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay) for the clear and able manner in which he had brought forward that important subject. As to the probate duty, he did not think that anybody would wish to get rid of it, neither was it desirable to limit its operation merely to higher sums. It answered an essential purpose, forming, as it did, a title to the property to be administered; and there was nothing unjust in a poor man having to pay for his probate according to the value of the property which he obtained. He concurred in the demand made by the hon. Member for the equalization of the probate duty through a fixed percentage. The numerous interesting points that presented themselves in connection with the discussion of this question showed that taxation was in a chaotic state, and that it required to be overhauled. He desired to impress upon the Government that they should never allow a tax to exist on false principles. A tax which was a charge upon property only at death was a very imperfect tax, and far inferior to a charge on the annual value of property. He trusted the Chancellor of the Exchequer would give his favourable attention to the subject whenever the finance of the succession and probate duty came before him.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that the inducement thrown out by the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay), that such a re-adjustment of these duties as he recommended would give an increase of £4,000,000 to the Revenue, would naturally recommend itself to one in the position which he had the honour to hold. But the proposal before the House went very far. The hon. Gentleman stated that the probate and succession duties ought to be re-adjusted, that the exemption of real property from probate duty ought not to be maintained, and that the succession duty was not a fair one. But it had been argued before the House, by persons of very great authority, that there was a substantial difference between real and personal property, and therefore that there ought to be a difference in the duties charged upon them. That was argued by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich when he introduced the present measure, and the right hon. Gentleman had never since expressed any different opinion in reference to this question. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London had tried to re-adjust those duties, but the attempt had not met with a success which should encourage others to follow his example, for he withdrew his proposal. In considering the question, they must bear in mind the local burdens which were a direct charge on real property, and which handicapped it as against personal property. These local burdens and charges formed one of the principal reasons why real property was not taxed the same as personal property, which did not bear the same burdens, and the right hon. Member for Greenwich had said that the charges upon real property made an imposition of this kind impossible. Another point raised in the Resolution was the difference of the amount raised upon small and large properties. There was no doubt that the amount levied upon smaller properties was a heavy one, and that it was one which required consideration; but it was a subject surrounded with difficulties, and he ventured to think it could not be dealt with hurriedly by a Resolution of the kind before the House. He, therefore, hoped that the House would not agree to the proposal.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (IRELAND) — THE GOVERNOR OF LIMERICK ASYLUM.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BUTT, who had a Notice on the Paper—

“To call attention to the Order in Council removing the Mayor of Limerick from the Governorship of the Lunatic Asylum, Limerick:”

and to move—

“That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient in Orders in Council appointing Governors of Lunatic Asylums to observe the old practice of appointing the Mayors of cities:”

said, that he did not consider the subject one on which it would be necessary to put the House to the trouble of a division, even if the Rules would have permitted him. It was, however, one in which a great deal of interest was taken in the city he had the honour to represent. It was an illustration of a form of government too common in Ireland, and which was most mischievous. It related to the removal of the mayor and certain members from the places they had long occupied on the Governing Body of the Limerick Lunatic Asylum. In 1821 an Act was passed under which that asylum was constituted; and the then Lord Lieutenant by Order in Council, appointed certain persons to be governors of it; but there were to be four ex-officio governors—namely, the Mayor of Limerick, the Recorder of the City, the Bishop of the Established Church, and the Archdeacon, and so things continued till 1876; and then the Irish Church having been disestablished there came forth another Order in Council displacing all ex-officio governors, and, consequently, the Mayor of Limerick—and the Mayor of Cork was in the same position—was not allowed to take his seat at the Board of Governors. Even if it were necessary to displace the Bishop and Archdeacon from the governorship of the Limerick

Asylum, because the Church was dis-established, he could not understand why it was necessary to displace the mayor. He considered that in this matter there had been a design to cast an unnecessary and undeserved slur upon municipal authorities and institutions in Ireland. Now, what he would ask of the present Lord Lieutenant, or those who represented him in that House—and he wished to say that he believed the present Lord Lieutenant had a sincere desire to conciliate the people of Ireland—whether something could not be done to remove the impression which prevailed? The Corporations, as the representatives of the people, contributed to the funds necessary for the maintenance of district lunatic asylums; and he saw no reason why the mayors, as the heads of such Corporations, should not be members of the Governing Boards. The principle upon which the government of Ireland had been conducted seemed to be to thwart the proper hopes and aspirations of the Irish people to have a part in the management of their own affairs, and it was this that he wished to see altered. This was a trifling thing, but it should be remembered that the lives of nations, like those of individuals, were made up of

Mr. J. LOWTHER said, that he must first express, what he felt to be the general feeling which existed in the House, when he stated that he was glad to see the hon. and learned Gentleman once more amongst them; and he was also glad to think that upon the first occasion on which it had fallen to his (Mr. Lowther's) lot to reply officially to any question raised by the hon. and learned Gentleman that the difference between them was not one that would be very marked, or that would be difficult of arrangement. The hon. and learned Gentleman had called attention to an Order in Council under which mayors in Ireland were no longer constituted ex-officio governors of the lunatic asylums; but he (Mr. Lowther) would remind the House that in the Grand Jury Bill that question had been dealt with, and, as far as that measure was concerned, he might say, in order to show the spirit in which the Government had approached the subject, that two-thirds of the governors of lunatic asylums were to be elected by Grand Juries, County Boards, and the Corporations which contributed to the maintenance of the district asylums. That provision away the system under which the Government appointed those governors, and introduce a new one; and, in order in Council to which had been made would share the Government recognition of consulting the municipalities, and by vesting, in order to do, the election of a number of the Governors of the lunatic asylums, and corporations, they had thought, that they had repaired the defect in municipal institutions. There was to be said in support of the Bill by the hon. and learned Gentleman that he had hoped that the Bill would be left until they had passed the Grand Jury Bill. As far as Limerick was concerned, he had not the pleasure of meeting personally of him, but he had heard he had no doubt was eminently qualified for the position; and if, upon inquiry, he found any particular grievance existed in regard to the way in which the Bill had been carried out, he would have the opportunity of consulting with the Lord Lieutenant and endeavour to rectify it. He (Mr. Lowther) regretted that the hon. and learned Gentleman had been away from the House, because his assistance would have been very valuable in expediting the progress of the Grand Jury Bill; but that now he had returned, it was hoped that they would have the advantage of his help. So far as the Government were concerned, they would endeavour to remove any cause of complaint which might be supposed to exist. They certainly had no intention to vex the national spirit; but, on the other hand, every desire to act in a conciliatory spirit, with a view to the removal of any real grievance.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY congratulated the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland on the manner in which he had met his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Butt), and trusted it would form a precedent which he would follow in the conduct of the business of the important Office he held. He had to complain of the Order in Council, that it seemed to have been framed in a most bungling manner by some under official, who, having been credited with a discretion he never possessed, had naturally fallen into error in performing the duty.

MR. MURPHY trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would consider the precisely analogous case of the Mayor of Cork, and that in a like case a like rule would be adopted. Until the recent change in the Privy Council rates the Mayor of Cork was invariably an ex-officio Governor, and as the Corporation of Cork had since the erection of the Asylum been regularly paying a considerable portion of the cost, they always had, and very properly, a representative on the Board. There ought to be no great difficulty in framing new rules for the object now required, and, if necessary, amending the existing Act, so as to confer power on the Lord Lieutenant to appoint some members of the Corporation as Governors, not for life, but during their term of office as town councillors.

PARLIAMENT — PRIVILEGES OF MEMBERS.—OBSERVATIONS.

DR. KENEALY said, he had to call attention to the Motion which stood in his name—namely—

Mr. J. Lowther

“That it is a high Breach of the Privileges of this House to obstruct the freedom and independence of Members of Parliament in putting questions to Ministers, upon their responsibility as representatives of the people, and in the discharge of their public duty, such questions being framed in decorous language, and having for their object to elicit information on matters of public interest.”

This was a matter, as it seemed to him, of the first importance, affecting, as it did, the Privileges of the Members of that House and so of their constituents, and the rights of the nation. He would briefly state the circumstances out of which his complaint arose. Some time in August, 1875, he put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Assheton Cross) with reference to one Mina Jury, one of the most important witnesses examined at the trial of the Tichborne Claimant. This Mina passed then as a very respectable witness, and was treated by the Judges with marked distinction. Her testimony had a powerful influence in deciding the case. After the conviction of that unfortunate man, it was discovered that Mina had been convicted of felony, under the name of Mercivina Caulfield, at Dublin, in 1847, and sentenced to be transported for seven years. She had come to this country under an entirely different name, and, after the trial at Bar, she was again tried for several felonies, and a second time sentenced to penal servitude for seven years. It was therefore thought advisable that the attention of the Crown should be drawn to the fact that one of the most important witnesses on whom the prosecution relied had been a convicted felon. He therefore asked the Home Secretary whether the Mina Jury produced at the trial was the same person who had been convicted in 1847? and the right hon. Gentleman, with much emphasis and earnestness, assured him that she was not—an answer which drew down upon him (Dr. Kenealy) at the time much laughter and many sneers, which he bore with as much patience and philosophy as he could, as, indeed, he was obliged to bear many things. Some time afterwards, it appeared on the trial of the detectives, that special inquiries had been previously made into this matter; and that the antecedents of Mina Jury had been ascertained at Scotland Yard. In the month of September last, it was proved by Superintendent Williamson, at the Old Bailey, that it had been discovered that Mina Jury and Mercivina Caulfield were one and the same person. Under these circumstances, he should have thought that the Home Secretary would have been only too anxious to explain to the House that he had been unconsciously led to make a statement in his place in Parliament which turned out to be incorrect, and that he would have seized the first opportunity to do so when Parliament was called together. This he was bound to do, not only for his own sake, but for the sake of the Cabinet, and for that of the House of Commons itself, as it was no slight matter to mislead or misinform hon. Members upon such a question as that of the administration of justice. He (Dr. Kenealy) waited for this act during January and February and March; and, finding that the Home Secretary remained silent, in April he gave public Notice of the following Question to the Home Secretary:—

“Whether he will state to the House on whose authority he denied in his place in Parliament, on the 3rd of August, 1875, that Mina Jury, a witness against the defendant in the Tichborne case, and who is now in penal servitude for several robberies, was the same person as Mercivina Caulfield, who was sentenced to seven years’ transportation for robbery in Dublin, in 1847; whether he does not know that it was proved at the trial of the detectives at the Old Bailey in September last, by Superintendent Williamson of Scotland Yard, that Mercivina Caulfield and Mina Jury were one and the same person, and that she had been convicted in Dublin as alleged; whether the person who gave him the false information by which Parliament was misled is still in the service of the Government, or receiving a pension; and, if he will state why he did not inform Parliament of the facts as soon as he became aware of them?”

Had there been any objection to the form of this Question, he would have thought that the proper time to raise that objection was when he gave Notice of it to the House, so that he might have an opportunity of amending any fault that might be shown. But that was not done. Early next morning, he received the following letter:—

“House of Commons, April 4th.

“Dear Sir,—By the Speaker’s order, I have not put your Question on the Paper, as it purports rather to impugn the accuracy of certain information conveyed to the House than to seek information from the Government. The matter is, therefore, not properly the subject of a Question; but no doubt you might bring the matter forward on a Motion.—Yours faithfully, “ARCHIBALD MILMAN.

“To Dr. Kenealy, M.P.”

To this he immediately replied—

“Stoke House, Tavistock Square,

“April 5th, 1878.

“Sir,—I have had the honour to receive an intimation from Mr. Milman, one of the assistant clerks of the House of Commons, that you have ordered my Question to Mr. Cross not to be put on the Paper. With all submission, I think that the Question ought to be there, and I shall this day put the Question to Mr. Cross, in order that the matter may be fully discussed, either as a Breach of Privilege or an Adjournment of the House, which I shall move, if requisite.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your most obedient Servant,

“E. V. KENEALY.”

He wrote also to the Home Secretary thus—

“April 5th, 1878.

“Sir,—The Speaker having refused to put upon the Paper the Question of which I gave you public Notice last evening in the House of Commons, relative to the false information given to the House as to Mina Jury, I have informed the Speaker that I shall put the Question to you to-day, so that the Speaker’s refusal may be discussed.—I am, Sir, your obedient Servant,

He could assure the House that in framing his Question as he did, he had no desire to violate any Rule. He thought at the time, and he thought still, that he had not done so, and that the Question was right and proper. After writing to the Speaker, he had carefully considered the Question of which he had given Notice; but, as it had been objected to by high authority, and as he had no desire for discussions, dissensions, or fights, he framed his Question anew, as follows:—

“On whose authority he (the Home Secretary) stated in his place in Parliament, on the 3rd of August, 1875, that Mina Jury, a witness against the defendant in the Tichborne case, and who is now in penal servitude for several robberies, was not the same person as Mercivina Caulfield, who was sentenced to seven years’ transportation for robbery in Dublin in 1847; and whether the person who gave him the information is still in the service of the Government or receiving a pension; whether it was proved at the trial of the detectives at the Old Bailey in September last, by Superintendent Williamson, of Scotland Yard, that Mercivina Caulfield and Mina Jury were one and the same person, and that she had been so convicted in Dublin as alleged?”

This, he submitted, as a Question was wholly faultless, and he would be glad if anyone could point out to him a blot in either of the two. He challenged information and instruction upon the point, and he hoped he should receive both. He put the Question accordingly, but the right hon. Gentleman did not answer it. The Speaker, however, rose and declared that he had already intimated that the former Question was wrong, and that, in some particulars—not stated—this Question also was informal. He (Dr. Kenealy), nevertheless, considered that the Question was formal, and ought to have been answered. It contained no imputation on any Member of the Government—even if it had, it should have been replied to. He had yet to learn where it was laid down, except in Mr. Speaker's letter, that the conduct of a public officer might not be impugned even in a Question. Now, it seemed to him that this was a matter of considerable importance to every hon. Member; for, if the Speaker could prevent a Member putting a Question to a Minister, he might also prevent his entering a Motion, or a Resolution, or even an Amendment to a Bill on the Notice Paper. He did not believe that any such authority existed in the Speaker, and he should be glad if it could be shown that the Speaker's action was in accordance with the custom, law, or constitution of Parliament. The Speaker held a high and dignified Office, but he had no judicial authority whatever in that House. He was simply the mouthpiece of the Members, and he had no right or authority whatever, as far as he (Dr. Kenealy) knew, to take an independent or a judicial part in their proceedings. The Speaker possessed no right to interfere with any Question that was put by a Member to a Minister, unless it trespassed against order, decency, or decorum; and the only jurisdiction to which a Member so transgressing was amenable was to the House itself; but any Question couched in proper language ought to go into the Order Book. He had looked carefully into May's Parliamentary Practice, and he could find nothing there to justify the exclusion of Questions by the Speaker. The Speaker himself, he found, might be guilty of a Breach of Privilege, and he had been set right when he was going wrong, as in a remarkable instance, by Sir Robert Peel, on the 9th of March, 1840. [See May, 7th ed. pp. 328-9.] In 1621, the Commons, in their protestations, defined their Privileges. They affirmed—

“That every Member hath freedom from all impeachment, imprisonment, or molestation, other than by censure of the House itself, for or concerning any Bill, speaking, reasoning, or declaring of any matter or matters touching the Parliament, or Parliament business.”—[Ibid. p. 114.]

Now, he (Dr. Kenealy) contended that by the Speaker excluding his Question, a Breach of Privilege coming under the head of “molestation” had been committed. It was a direct interference with his rights and freedom as a Representative of the people; and he could not submit to it without further instruction. He found it laid down in Hatsell's Precedents, vol. ii. p. 239—

“On the 9th of March, 1620, there is a long debate in which the conduct of the Speaker is very much blamed. ‘That he came out of the Chair without consent of the House, &c.’ That Mr. Speaker is but a servant to the House, and not a master, nor a master's mate: and that he ought to respect the meanest Member as well as those about the Chair.”

This was the law then, and it was the law of Parliament now. Further, he found in the same work, at page 242—

“Speaker Lenthall, when Charles the First came into the House of Commons, and, having taken the Speaker's Chair, asked him whether any of the five Members, that he came to apprehend, were in the House; whether he saw any of them, and where they were? made this answer—‘May it please your Majesty, I have neither eyes to see, nor tongue to speak in this place, but as the House is pleased to direct me; whose servant I am here.’”

And again, as follows:—

“Serjeant Glanville, when he was presented as Speaker to the King for his approbation, on the 15th of April, 1640, says, ‘The House of Commons have met together and chosen a Speaker, one of themselves, to be the mouth, indeed the servant of all the rest; to steer watchfully and prudently in all their weighty consultations and debates; to collect, faithfully and readily, the vote and genuine sense of a numerous assembly; to propound the same seasonably, and in apt questions of their final resolutions; and to represent them and their conclusions, their deliberations and petitions upon all urgent occasions with truth, with life, with lustre, and with full advantage to your most excellent Majesty.’”

These extracts fully prove that the Speaker had certain defined and limited authority; but he was not a magistrate in that House; he was simply a Minister and Officer to carry out the will of the Members; and thus showed he had no rights that appertained to the exclusion of matters introduced by Members, so long as they did not trespass against good taste or decorum. He (Dr. Kenealy) had sought, but could not find, any direct precedent which might serve as a guide in the present discussion. None, as far as he could learn, existed in the Journals of the House of Commons; but he found, in Vol. 31 of the Parliamentary History, an account of a debate which took place in the Lords, in the year 1794; and this seemed to be in point here, for there was hardly any difference so far as regarded Parliamentary proceedings between the Speakers of the House of Lords and House of Commons. It appeared, from the Report, that in the April of that year, Lord Stanhope desired to put a Resolution on the Books of the House, but he was not allowed to do so by the Speaker, Lord Loughborough, then Chancellor. Lord Stanhope, as the House knew, was a well-known person in the last century. He was a man of considerable attainments, but as he was an advanced Reformer, and did not swim with the general current, he was regarded as an individual of considerable eccentricity—by some as a madman. He desired on that occasion to place his views on record in the House of Lords, and he accordingly collected together a number of extracts from various writers, which supported some of his political views and utterances. The Speaker prohibited an entry of this Resolution; and this Order of his was challenged by Lord Lauderdale on the 8th of April. This Nobleman was a person of great political and Parliamentary knowledge; he was the friend of Mr. Fox, and was much associated with that statesman; and he had a profound knowledge of our political usages and history. He brought this matter before the House, and he (Dr. Kenealy) hoped to be forgiven, if he quoted one or two passages from his speech on that occasion, as being especially relevant here. Lord Lauderdale (page 198) said—

“He should quote the Journals of both Houses indiscriminately, to prove that when the Speaker of either had taken improper liberties the circumstance had not passed unnoticed.”

He referred the House to the cases of 1629 and 1677; in one, the King sent his commands to the Speaker of the Commons to adjourn the House; and although Sir John Elliott was on his legs, the Speaker said “that he had a command from the King to adjourn, and to put no Question.” The next Parliament was in 1640, and on its first meeting, the conduct of the Speaker on the last day of the preceding Parliament was examined, and the House declared that the Speaker having refused to put the Question, as called upon to do at the time, was guilty of a Breach of Privilege. In the case of 1677, the Speaker had been complained of for putting Questions with partiality, and leaning to one side more than another. His Lordship read the speech of Sir Thomas Clarges, who observed—

“That the Speaker had usurped more of the attention of the House than any other Member, by giving his opinion; but if that opinion were to be considered as the sense of Parliament, and his pater was to supply them with sentiments, there was an end to the Rights and Privileges of the House, for the Speaker could misrepresent to the public the proceedings of its Members, and thus would the idea of representation be destroyed.”

The noble Earl reminded their Lordships that they ought to be more particularly jealous of any invasions of their Privileges by the Speaker than the House of Commons, for this essential reason—

“The Speaker of the House of Commons was the creature of the House, elected by themselves, and sitting in their Chair during their own will and pleasure only; whereas the Speaker of the House of Lords was appointed by the Crown, and ought naturally to be considered as a constant object of jealousy by the House with respect to its Forms and Orders. Mr. Speaker Onslow had expressed his Opinion of the great importance of Parliamentary Forms in terms too strong and decisive to leave a doubt upon the point he was maintaining.”

In relation with these precedents from the past, he called attention to one or two observations of Lord Lauderdale in the same speech. Alluding to what had happened on the previous occasion, Lord Lauderdale said—

“He understood that on that evening a Motion of his noble Friend (Earl Stanhope) had been read to the House by his Lordship, and handed to the Lord Chancellor, who had taken upon himself to leave out a material part. Now he could not conceive upon what authority any Speaker of that House could assume the liberty of altering a Motion, unless upon a question of Amendment regularly submitted to their Lordships. The Speaker was the servant of the House, its instrument, and its organ, while officially addressing them from the Woolsack. What the nature of the Motion was, certainly was foreign to the subject of debate. If it were the most absurd that human fancy could suggest it should have been submitted to the House in the precise language of the Mover. If the Motion was unfit for the House to hear, it could have been disposed of by the Previous Question; but the House had not a right, much less had any individual Peer a right, to alter the construction or vary the words of the Motion. If any noble Lord in the heat of the debate should be led into warmth of language or offensive vehemence, the Peer so giving way to his feelings was liable to be called to Order, and to be censured if the occasion appeared to call for censure; but nothing could warrant a sacrifice of the Forms of the House as a punishment. The credit of the House, or of any assembly, depended on a strict adherence to its Forms; and, therefore, he must protest against the proceeding to which he had alluded."

These observations, coming from so eminent an authority, were entitled to weight and would, he hoped, not be without effect. And he hoped he might, without offence, read what Lord Stanhope himself said in that debate—namely, that,

"Had a Speaker in the House of Commons acted in the manner complained of, he would have had his wig pulled over his ears, and his gown stripped off his shoulders."

In conclusion, he desired to repeat that while he had thought it his duty to bring the subject before the House, he had no feeling in the matter, and he should be quite content with any decision the House might come to upon their own Rights and Privileges as a Representative Assembly of the nation at large.

MR. SPEAKER: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the Question of the hon. Member, it is right that I should offer a few words of explanation to the House as to the course which I have thought it my duty to take in this matter. The hon. Gentleman has said that the Speaker of this House is merely the mouthpiece and servant of the House. That observation of the hon. Member is correct. I am merely the mouthpiece and servant of the House, and a very honourable service it is. But I am, at the same time, the Guardian of its Rules and Orders, and there are Rules and Orders laid down by this House applying specially to Questions put before the commencement of Public Business from day to day which I am bound to see enforced, and among those Rules and Orders there is one which declares that no Question is to be offered containing matter of argument or opinion; and the Question proposed by the hon. Member for Stoke appeared to me to be a violation of that Rule, and it was upon that ground that I objected to its being put. It appears to me that the hon. Member is in some confusion as to the distinction between a Question and a Motion. If a Motion is offered by a Member of this House to the House, I should not feel that I was entitled for one moment to oppose the offering of such a Motion to the House, or to alter a single word, provided it was properly and respectfully worded. But as to Questions put before the commencement of Public Business, if these Questions involve matter of argument or opinion, or are otherwise in opposition to the Rules and Orders of the House, I consider it my duty to object to them so proposed; and I trust that, in taking the course I have done, I have fulfilled my duty to this House. I have no desire to oppose, in any way, Questions fairly proposed and offered to the consideration of this House; but when a Question is proposed, which appears to me to be in opposition to the Rules and Orders of this House, I consider it my duty to resist that Question, and I shall continue to act in that course, believing it to be the desire of the House.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I think the occasion is one upon which, though there is no Motion to be put to the House, a few words ought to be said in order to express, as I believe I shall express, the general opinion and sense of the House, that the House reposes entire confidence in your administration of the Rules of the House, and that in this matter, as in other matters generally, we feel we have in you a proper Guardian and a proper Minister to express the sentiments of the House. As regards the question which is immediately before the House, it may be regarded from two points of view. In the first place, there is the question whether you, Sir, have acted in accordance with the feelings and wishes of the House in putting the interpretation you have done upon the Rules which exist with regard to the putting of Questions; and, secondly, there is a word which may with advantage be said upon the practice of putting Questions itself. There is no doubt in the world that the Questions which are submitted to the House are properly revised by the Chair, and that the Speaker fulfils a function it is intended by the House he should fulfil when he revises the Questions, and considers whether they are such as ought to be put in the House consistently with the Rules which the House has laid down, either in writing, or tacitly, or as decided by usage, with regard to such Questions. By one Standing Order—154—it is laid down, that in putting a Question, no argument or opinion is to be offered, nor any fact stated, except so far as may be necessary to explain the Question; and it is obvious the Rule is a necessary one, because otherwise matters might be put into Questions that would render answers necessary, and thus lead to debates. We know there are methods by which these general discussions can be brought on—as by moving the adjournment of the House—and great irregularities might in that way creep in. We therefore understand that the practice of putting Questions ought to be, and must be, limited to prevent that irregularity; and we see no way in which that practice can be properly restrained except by trusting to the judgment and discretion of the Speaker. He is able to judge, and he does so with thorough impartiality, whether a Question is of such a character as may be properly put, or whether it is one that exceeds the limits laid down, or intended to be laid down, by the House. I think in the course you have pursued with reference to the Question of the hon. Member for Stoke, you have acted entirely in accordance with the principles upon which the House would desire such a Question to be dealt with; and, although there can be no doubt whatever that the hon. Member has a perfect right to bring forward such a matter as a Motion, or to put it as a Question on the Motion that you, Sir, do leave the Chair to go into Committee of Supply, yet it would be irregular that such Questions as these should be put at the commencement of Business. The hon. Gentleman is entirely within his right, I imagine, in challenging your judgment and taking the opinion of the House upon the subject, if he pleases; but I feel perfectly certain the House will support the ruling of the Chair upon the matter. I hope the few words that have been said may prevent any misconception upon the subject; and, above all, may make it perfectly clear that, in the event of your decision upon such a point being challenged, you would have the most complete and hearty support of the House.

Mr. WHITBREAD said, the hon. Member for Stoke seemed to labour under a complete misapprehension as to the distinction between a Question and a Motion, and as to the powers and privileges of Members in relation to Questions and in relation to Motions. The right of putting a Question before the commencement of Public Business was an extremely limited one, and Questions were put rather on sufferance, than as a right of the same character as that of moving a Motion. Indeed, it was probable the oldest Member of the House could remember when Questions were first printed on the Orders, with a view to their being put before the commencement of Business. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had referred to a Rule which restricted the character of a Question, and he (Mr. Whitbread) would point out that the next Rule imposed corresponding restriction in answering a Question, from which, if it stood by itself, it would follow that there was no right to put a Question which must necessarily lead to debate. He accepted the statement of the hon. Member that he had no intention of imputing any wrong conduct to the Home Secretary; but still, if many Questions of such a character were to be put to Ministers, it would be difficult to find men who would consent to sit on the Ministerial Bench. It was a long Question, and it assumed as facts matters which must have led to debate. More than that, it made a charge against an officer who was not here to defend himself, and the Home Secretary could not have answered the Question without vindicating that officer. Apart from anything else, the Question was of an unusual character, and one which it seemed beyond the right of a Member to put. The hon. Member for Stoke appeared to be under the impression that any Question might be put which did not in its language infringe on order or decorum; but that was quite a misapprehension. He would point out to the hon. Member the known practice of the House, according to which it was a matter of frequent occurrence that Questions proposed to be put by hon. Members were altered, at the discretion of the Chair, before they appeared on the Notice Paper, and in some cases even rejected. Further than that, there were the unwritten rules arising from use and wont, which were even stronger. Certainly, no one could complain of the officers of the House, who always manifested the greatest anxiety to give hon. Members every information as to the Rules and practice of the House. The hon. Member for Stoke was quite right in saying that the authority of the Speaker did not rest on statute. He was the Minister and Servant of the House, and derived his power from moral influence and from the support accorded to him by the House. He trusted and believed that the result of the discussion would be that that power would continue to be exercised as temperately and firmly as before, and that the support of the House would be as cheerfully and loyally given.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER entirely agreed with the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread). He thought the practice of putting Questions had been carried somewhat to excess. It often occupied from three-quarters of an hour to an hour, and, no doubt, impeded Public Business. Sometimes the Questions put were irrelevant, and were only intended to bring hon. Gentlemen's names under notice, by the Questions being inserted in the newspapers, and Ministers were obliged to get up their answers with great care. It was quite necessary that the Speaker should exercise his discretionary power to prevent Questions being put in a form in which they ought not to be asked.

MR. BIGGAR said, he would admit, from personal experience, that Questions had been put in a form in which they ought not to have been put; but he thought it was rather unfortunate that the Question of the hon. Member for Stoke, after it had been altered, had not received a reply from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department. He would suggest the possibility of affording the hon. Member an opportunity of obtaining an answer from the Government.

Mr. Whitbread

MR. H. SAMUELSON considered the practice of putting Questions useful and economical of the time of the House. Subjects were often brought forward on Supply, the discussion of which occupied considerable time, which might have been avoided by a Question being put before the commencement of Public Business. He did not believe that Questions were put for the sake of obtaining notice of the Questioners' names by the Press, for that object would be much more easily gained by bringing forward Motions. Twenty or thirty Questions were often answered in an hour, any one of which might give rise to more than an hour's debate if brought on going into Committee of Supply. The Questions to be put were quite sufficiently watched over by those whose duty it was to take care that no improper Questions were put.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he did not rise to take any part in the discussion, but to explain to the hon. Member for Stoke why he had not answered his Question when it was put the second time. The Question did not appear on the Paper in the form in which he could submit it to the gentleman who gave him the information; and if, after the Speaker had ruled that the Question was out of Order, and that it could not be printed in the Order Book, he had replied to it, he should have been guilty of great want of respect to the Speaker, and also to the House itself. He was still in the same position; but, as some imputation might seem to rest on the gentleman concerned in this matter, it was only due to him to state that he believed the information he gave was the only information he possibly could give. He had referred to his own papers—of the date of June, 1875—[Dr. KENEALY: No; August, 1875.] Then he was mistaken in the date; and he could only say, if the hon. Member would put down the Question on going into Supply, giving him a day's Notice to enable him to communicate with the gentleman, he would obtain for him the information required, which, he was quite sure, would turn out to be correct.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed.

MR. PARNELL said, he had put on the Paper a Motion to reduce the Vote by £10,000, and he was in some doubt as to whether he ought not to ask the Committee to reject the Vote altogether. Under all the circumstances, however, he thought he might be content with moving that the Vote be reduced by the amount which he had mentioned. It must not be supposed, however, that because he merely moved for the reduction of the Vote, that he in any degree approved the principle of paying Secret Service money. On the contrary, he disapproved altogether of the system, for he greatly doubted whether the Government were justified in such expenditure; and he thought that if Secret Service money were voted, an explanation should be given after it had been expended of the way in which it had been used. As was well known to hon. Members, large sums were voted from year to year for Secret Service, and it was next to impossible to get from the Government of the day any information as to the way in which such money was used. The money was, he supposed, used for the purposes of the Crown both at home and abroad; and, without wishing to pry unduly into the operations of the Government, he thought the Committee had a right to know more than it did of the way in which the money was expended. He did not wish to inquire as to how much money had been expended by the Government in corrupting or attempting to corrupt the servants of the Czar of Russia; nor did he particularly wish to know anything as to the results which had flowed from such expenditure. He would confine himself to the question as it affected home affairs. In Ireland they had had painful experience of the application of Secret Service money in times past, and he had no reason to believe that such money was not now being so expended. In 1867 this fund was applied to the purpose of paying informers in Ireland, whose business it was to look after a secret conspiracy of a very extensive character which existed, or was supposed to exist, in the country. The spies were not only employed for the purpose of detecting persons engaged in the conspiracy, but of inducing them to join it in order that they might afterwards be committed to prison. When a man named Kelly was accused, before a Dublin jury, of the murder of a constable named Talbot, it was proved that Talbot, who was in receipt at the time of Secret Service money, had deliberately entered into the Fenian ranks, had taken the oath of fidelity to the organization, and had himself sworn in a large number of other persons whom he had been able to corrupt, while he was himself in receipt of Government pay. Talbot did not confine himself to this. He went further, and entered upon an extensive system of corruption which it was not easy to characterize. In order to gain the confidence of the poor people by whom he was surrounded, this man Talbot, although he was a Protestant, pretended to be a Roman Catholic, and took the sacrament of the Church at its altars, side by side with the persons to whom he had administered the oath as members of the Fenian conspiracy. If he knew that none of this Secret Service money was being spent in Ireland at the present time, he might, perhaps, have been content to let the Vote pass unchallenged; but it was because he felt certain that the same system was being pursued, that he thought it his duty to protest against the Vote. The consequence of the action taken by Constable Talbot was that he was fired at in the streets of Dublin, and a man named Kelly was arrested on a charge of having fired the shot. Talbot was taken to a hospital, and, after a few days of suffering, died, some said in consequence of the shot, others as the result of unskilful surgical treatment. Kelly was acquitted on the charge of having shot Talbot, but was sentenced to penal servitude for life for shooting at a policeman who arrested, or attempted to arrest, him. In consequence of the use of this money, hundreds of young Irishmen were sworn into the conspiracy, and Talbot was shot as an act of revenge by some member of the Fenian organization. The man Kelly was still in penal servitude on Spike Island, and was an object of great sympathy in Ireland. What he had stated was, he thought, sufficient to show that a horrible chain of misfortune had encircled Ireland in consequence of the expenditure of Secret Service money for the purpose of first corrupting, and then punishing, people for the offences into which they were drawn by emissaries of the Government. For these reasons he begged to move that the Vote be reduced by £10,000.

Motion made and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £10,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1879, for Her Majesty's Foreign and other Secret Services."—(Mr. Parnell.)

MR. O'DONNELL seconded the Motion. The House, he said, had a right to further information and guarantees as to the way in which this money was expended. He thought, also, that the House was entitled to some supervision of the expenditure of the money, and in the selection of the agents by whom it was expended. Only a few weeks ago, he received a letter from a gentleman in Ireland who was being persecuted by the police in Ireland, because he happened to be known to certain other Irish gentlemen resident in Paris, who, some years ago, were mixed up in revolutionary movements in Ireland. This gentleman wrote, that although there were no grounds for suspicion, as far as he was concerned, he was continually dogged about by the police, and subjected to all sorts of annoyance and petty persecution. This sort of harassing espionage was the way in which the Secret Service money was spent, and he, therefore, thought that Parliament was entitled to know more about the matter than it did at present. That was the kind of conduct pursued against a rich gentleman, merely because he was suspected of sharing the opinions of some out of his many Irish acquaintances. He (Mr. O'Donnell) thought something ought to be done in the way of providing supervision over the expenditure of Secret Service money. He quite understood that the disposal of such money could not be accounted for publicly, and, of course, he knew all Governments needed an amount for secret purposes. But he thought, at the same time, if there were some means of examining into the expenditure, many objections to the Vote would be removed. The total sum required for Secret Service was £40,000, of which £10,000 was annually charged on the Consolidated Fund. Forty thousand pounds a-year could be employed over a very wide area, and a large number of agents could be kept by such a sum. Not having been in the House when the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury was explaining a portion of the Vote, he did not know whether he gave any details of the general heads under which the money was spent. At any rate, he (Mr. O'Donnell) considered, that without infringing secrecy, the Government could afford a little more information as to the general direction of the espionage which they had been bound to employ. Considering this espionage was spread over a comparatively limited portion of the Empire, £40,000 was a large sum to be spent on the Service. If the amount were devoted to the purposes of Indian espionage also, he could understand the demand for £40,000; but the money spent for such duties in India was paid out of the Indian Revenues. Consequently, it came to this—that they had £40,000 a-year spent by a Constitutional, respected, enthusiastically beloved, and admired Government in spying the conduct of British citizens and subjects. The maintenance of such a class of spies was certainly not creditable to a Constitutional and universally beloved Government. The detectives, who might be spoken of as the regular Espionage Department of the administration, were paid out of the Police Fund, and no part of the £40,000 a-year went towards their cost. He, therefore, thought the Committee was entitled to know from the Government what they did with the money, how much they were spending in additional rewards for the discovery of crime, and how much they paid for domestic and foreign espionage. He did not know whether the practice was now recognized in diplomacy of paying for the theft of despatches sent by one Government to another. Such things used to be done; but he was sure the sense of Parliament and of the nation of the present day would decidedly discountenance such an application of public money. He asked for some general description of the agencies which were set on foot by means of this £40,000 a-year Secret Service money. Every Irish Member knew that in Ireland Secret Service money had been used to suborn perjury and reward the basest infamy. The rope had been tied round the necks of innocent persons by means of such money. Again and again it had been the great element of a widespread organization of fraud, false swearing, and utter unscrupulousness, directed against the most noble-minded, though of the poorest, in Ireland. The horrible case of Inspector Talbot had been mentioned that night, and if the Committee were to ransack the annals of the most despotic Government in the world, they could discover nothing more dreadful than the conduct of that man, who was supported during his career of unscrupulous hypocrisy out of the Secret Service Fund which was annually voted by an Assembly of Gentlemen. But that money had not been confined to suborning such wretched instruments of despotism as the miserable Talbot. It had been spent in Ireland in the corruption of the public Press, and it had been employed in that country in maintaining journals hired by the Government to stab the reputation of Irish politicians. The hands of the Representative of Her Majesty—the hands of the Viceroy of Ireland—had been stained by the distribution of money out of this unclean fund. Every Irish Member knew the case of Burch v. Clarendon, where the editor of a wretched Dublin print brought an action against Lord Clarendon for a reward due to him, because, in his paper, month after month, and year after year, he slandered, for Vice-Regal—aye, and for Imperial—pay, the purest reputations and noblest characters in the Irish Party. How could Irish Members be expected to let that Vote pass unchallenged when they knew the money had been employed in recent times, and, as far as he (Mr. O'Donnell) could see, was being employed now, in suborning perjury, planning schemes against innocent men, and recruiting the victims of informers amongst the innocent and decent peasantry?

Notice being taken that 40 Members were not present, and the Committee having been counted and 36 Members only being present, Mr. Speaker resumed the Chair and counted the House; and 40 Members being present—

SUPPLY—further considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Question again proposed,

MR. O'DONNELL, proceeding, said, the Government owed it to the House and to the Irish people, who had suffered much from the employment of Secret Service money, to give some general indication of the manner in which it was spent. He wished to know if pensions to former informers were paid out of the fund? If that were the case, it would diminish the menacing character of the amount, because the British Government had employed so many informers in Ireland, that if they still received pay from the retired list, a considerable sum could be accounted for. In fact, he should not be surprised to hear that half the total of the Vote was spent on pensions. The application of the fund had been so evil in many cases that the Government ought to explain how it was spent, and guarantee that it was not employed to-day as it was 10 or 20 years ago in suborning perjury, such as the evidence of the wretched Talbot, and rewarding such venal editors as Mr. Burch, the editor of The Dublin World, an organ supported and maintained by the Viceroy of the time for the purpose of slandering the character of Irish politicians.

MR. MACDONALD said, the speeches of the hon. Members for Meath (Mr. Parnell), and Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) seemed to imply that Secret Service money was spent in no other part of the Empire except Ireland. But Scotland, years ago, suffered greatly from the existence of such a Service, and the name of one person—Castlereagh—was still thought of with detestation by working and middle-class people in that country. The work of such a system culminated at one time in the execution of an old man of 72 years of age, who was harmless and innocent. But the disturbances which led to such a result did not end there. Open rebellion was brought about, a battle took place between the Forces of the Crown and the people at Barrymore, and two men, whose characters, history now told them, were beyond the slightest stain, who were of the highest order of Scotch peasantry—these men were hanged in virtue of a plot known to be instigated by Castlereagh and his minions. Secret Service money had also been used for the very worst purposes in England. During the Chartist agitation from 1838 to 1840, it was clearly shown that such money was employed for the purpose of fomenting insubordination and rebellion among the people. Then unfortunate victims who had been lured into rebellion by Government money were sent to distant lands for considerable periods. He could speak for, at least, 10,000 Scotch peasantry, and say that they detested Secret Service money. He was glad the subject had been brought forward, and it would be very creditable to the Government if they would get rid of the system altogether. If the hon. Member for Meath divided the House on the question, he would support him.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, formerly pensions were largely supplemented out of the Secret Service money. That was to say, a person receiving a pension from some public Department, frequently had it added to from the Secret Service money. Evidence of this fact was given before the Diplomatic Service Committee years ago, and the year before last attention was drawn to the subject. Some statement was then made by the Government, but he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) did not know if the practice had been stopped, or whether it still continued. Of course, the House of Commons had no right to ask in what way the Secret Service money was spent; but certainly it had a right to say that pensions should not be supplemented out of such a Vote.

MR. J. W. BAROLAY said, he thought it was time for the Government to consider whether this Vote ought to be proposed at all. There was something not altogether creditable in the expenditure of public money on Secret Services, and he should think that a Minister of the Queen would feel scarcely comfortable in mixing himself up with transactions of the kind. If the money was expended for the purpose of bringing criminals to justice, he saw no reason why it should not so appear on the face of the Votes; if it was not so expended, but was allowed to filter away through all sorts of occult channels, he thought the sooner an end was put to the voting of money for such purposes the better.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, he thought the main objection to Secret Service money was that it gave a positive temptation to a certain class of Government officials to encourage crime, in order that they might gain rewards for afterwards detecting it. In the summer of 1865 he was spending a holiday at a watering place in the West of Ireland, where he saw bands of men go out into the fields for the purpose of drilling, as an avowed part of the Fenian organization. The police stood by, saw all this, and knew perfectly well what it meant; but by their tolerance—connivance, in fact—they lured these men, most of whom were very young, into a course which brought them within the meshes of the law. A scandalous example of this was afforded by the case of Constable Talbot, whose conduct could only tend to alienate the people from their respect for the law. He had himself been subjected to this sort of espionage. On one occasion he arrived at the railway station at Limerick, carrying with him a long box containing mallets and balls for playing croquet. He was met by three policemen, who insisted on seizing his box, on the ground that it contained arms and ammunition. On opening it, however, they found that the only balls it contained were of wood, and the only weapons of propulsion were mallets. He remembered, on another occasion, hearing that a stipendiary magistrate asked a gentleman, occupying a prominent social position, to prevent his daughter from wearing a dress of invisible green colour, on account of the fact that the sight of it might possibly incite the lower classes to the commission of illegal acts. The gentleman appealed to his daughter who, on the ground that the colour of the dress was admirably suited to her complexion, declined to change her attire—even though the wearing of the dress might endanger the safety of the Empire. There was another case, too, of an informer in Hong Kong, who received secret money to spend in a house of ill-fame, in order to convict the person who kept it. He thought there could be no doubt that some power of active supervision ought to be given to Parliament over the disposal of this money, and until it was done, hon. Members of that House would be perfectly justified in continuing their opposition to the Vote.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he could scarcely credit the Hong Kong case to which his hon. Friend had referred, as there was only an unofficial statement of the facts which had come to hand, and it disclosed proceedings so base as to pass belief. The Secret Service money was, in many cases, it was alleged, used for purposes of great baseness, and he hoped steps would be taken by the Government to put a stop to such practices as were said to exist, or to explain that they had no existence.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON deprecated the repetition of these discussions year after year, because they could not lead to anything satisfactory to those hon. Members who objected root and branch to the granting of any money at all for Secret Service. It was the very essence of a secret Vote that the details of its expenditure should not be disclosed to the public. He could admit that the accusations made against the Vote, from the point of view of the Irish Members, were borne out by facts. The Vote asked for was, in amount, £24,000, but it would not necessarily be expended. In the year 1876-7, £24,000 were voted, but only £14,900 were expended. In the year 1800 the amount voted by Parliament for Secret Service was £112,000; but it had gone on steadily decreasing since that time, and he hoped that decrease would continue. The fund was administered by the heads of the different Departments, on the faith that it was used for the public service, in reference to matters which could not absolutely be made public. Each Minister was responsible for the amount voted for his Department, and it was administered on the actual responsibility of such Minister. In reply to what had been said by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke), he might safely answer that, whatever might have been the practice in ancient times, the amount voted for Secret Service money was now devoted to payment for special services, and was not used for the purpose of increasing salaries paid to the officials holding office in the different Departments in the service of the State.

MR. BIGGAR thought the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury had himself furnished a reason for decreasing the Vote, by stating that much less than the sum voted was annually expended. As at present managed, each one of the Departments had entrusted to it for expenditure a certain portion of the Secret Service money, and he saw no reason why each of the Departments should not give an account, yearly, of the way in which the money was disposed of. If this were done, a great deal of the suspicion now felt would be got rid of. As far as the use of Secret Service money in the past was concerned, it must be perfectly well known that in Ireland it was extensively used by the infamous Lord Castlereagh, in order to induce persons to join in the Rebellion, which cost many people their lives. On every ground, therefore, he thought there was a sufficient cause for objecting to the present Vote and moving its rejection.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he had listened very attentively to the debate. He was unable to agree to the proposition that Secret Service money might, with advantage to the public service, be entirely abolished. At present, he was not able to conceive that there were not many things for which a Government was obliged to use secret money, and yet which it would be very undesirable to publish to the House of Commons 12 months after the event. Still, if the hon. Member pressed his Motion to a division, he should certainly vote for it, as a protest against the manner in which this fund had been applied. The hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) had said that the allegations of his hon. Friend (Mr. O'Donnell) against certain officials in Dublin were incorrect. Now, as to the statement that an Irish official had employed the Secret Service Fund in hiring a newspaper to assail Irish patriots, if the hon. Baronet would only consult the files of the Irish newspapers—

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he did not dispute the statement at all, nor the one that the Secret Service

Fund had been employed during the Fenian rising. What he did say was, that the latter statement was exaggerated.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he was very glad to hear that. Of course, these discussions would be futile and idle as the passing wind if some impression were not made on Ministers by these discussions, and if they were not disposed to recognize that in certain cases very grave mistakes—to say the least—had been made. It would be the duty of every head of a Department entrusted with money of this kind to see that mistakes of this kind were not repeated. The use that was made of this money was notorious in the case of Lord Castlereagh, and Burch, the proprietor of The World. It was also true that Talbot was employed to go into Clonmel, and there first swear in the peasantry as Fenians, and then go into the dock, and swear away their lives. It was not necessary to bring the guilt of having sent out this man home to the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Attorney General; but it was sufficient for his purpose to show what had been done in the past. He had been told that they were on the eve of great social troubles, and before the excitement burst upon them, he wished to warn the Government to keep a sharp eye on their officials in the country, and to see that none of them were stirring up tumults. He asserted, and thought he had proved, that this money had been disgracefully applied in the past; and if the Government would not take proper measures for dealing with its disposal, it would be their duty to exhaust every Form of the Committee and the House in protest against the Vote.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 34; Noes 49: Majority 15.—(Div. List, No. 147.)

Original Question,

"That a sum not exceeding £20,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1879, for Her Majesty's Foreign and other Secret Services,"

put, and agreed to.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £5,390, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1879, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of the Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer in Exchequer, Scotland, of certain Officers in Scotland, and other Charges formerly on the Hereditary Revenue."

MR. O'DONNELL said, there were several items in this Vote which seemed to him to have lost their appropriateness. There was, for instance, £97 for Her Majesty's Limner, an institution not quite in keeping with the usages of modern times. Again, there was £184 for Her Majesty's Historiographer. If there was to be a recognition of merit in this way, he did not see why the distinguished scholar who enjoyed the salary should not be on the Civil List, in receipt of the same recognition as was frequently paid, on a somewhat moderate scale it was true, to men of merit in England. The next item was Her Majesty's Clockmaker, £17. Surely, attending to the clocks at Holyrood and other places was a matter which might just as well be paid by the job. Her Majesty's Clockmaker at present certainly received a salary either very much above or very much below his commercial value. He begged to move the reduction of the Vote, in the first place, by the salary of Her Majesty's Limner for Scotland.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member propose to omit the item, or to reduce the Vote?

MR. O'DONNELL: To omit the item, Sir.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £97, for the Salary of Her Majesty's Limner, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. O'Donnell.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the post of Her Majesty's Limner was one always held by some great painter. It was once held by David Wilkie, and the salary then was £300 per annum. It was now held by Sir Noel Paton at £97, and he ventured to think a sum of that sort was by no means too much to pay as a recognition of public services of the character and description of these gentlemen. He trusted the Committee would not say by its vote that it begrudged a sum of this kind.

MR. BIGGAR said, he would not oppose this Vote if the money really went to encourage art; but he did doubt very much whether to give certain persons sums of money in this way did any good. If they were earning, as he supposed Sir Noel Paton was earning, a very large income, the money might surely be spent in a much better manner—for instance, in prizes to students who were trying to make their way.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he would not trouble the Committee to divide, after the explanation that had been given, but would simply content himself with saying "No" to the question. All these distinctions, he thought, should be honorary. The money could be of no importance to Sir Noel Paton, and it would, therefore, be quite sufficient to have these as honorary posts. The emoluments in any case could in no way correspond to the literary or artistic eminence of the persons concerned.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. MACDONALD said, he observed that they had again the Vote of £144 for the Historiographer. The gentleman who held that office was well known and highly respected in Scotland as an historian, and also as one who had done good service to his country in other respects; but he would like to know from the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury if this was to be continued? because last year when this sum of money was voted it was to complete the volume. Now, it did occur to him that from the work this gentleman had to perform it must be a very bulky volume. He feared it was a taking away of the public money rather than a promotion of the object that was in view. He should like to know when this volume was likely to be completed?

THE LORD ADVOCATE rather thought the hon. Gentleman was somewhat under a misapprehension as to the present item. He would ask leave to say that these offices of Historiographer of Scotland and Limner were honorary offices that were given to men of high position in literature and art. The payments were not in respect of services. It would be seen that these were a few old relics left of Scottish Royalty. They had nothing left in Scotland that represented the old Royalties of the Kingdom except these offices, which at one time were hereditary. The salaries were once paid out of the personal revenues of the Sovereign; but by Act of Parliament these revenues were transferred to the State. At the time that transfer was made to the Exchequer, certain of these honorary offices, which, as he said before, represented the sole relics of Royalty in Scotland, were maintained. There was another office under the Lord Clerk Register, where a grant was made, but of much smaller amount than the sums given to England and Ireland, for the purpose of making available to the public at reasonable expense the treasures that were collected in the Register House in Edinburgh. The item they were dealing with was an honorary allowance given to a man who had earned his spurs in the field of literature. It was not brought forward simply to stimulate the cultivation of letters. He did not think literary gentlemen stood in need of that; but he should regret if a practice which had existed from time immemorial should be taken away, because it was looked upon as a great prize by men of letters in Scotland.

DR. CAMERON would be very sorry to do away with relics of the ancient Royalty of Scotland, but there was an office which he should be glad to see done away with, and that was the Lyon-King-at-Arms. On one occasion there was something like blackmail in connection with that office. The occasion was this—Biographies of hon. Members who first entered that House appeared in a paper called The Illustrated House of Commons, with arms opposite each name. Those hon. Members received from some person, who pretended to speak in the name of this office of Lyon-King-at-Arms, an inquiry asking by what right they assumed these arms, and requesting the payment of £40 for that assumption. Most of the hon. Members thus questioned found themselves in an awkward position; but, never having been guilty of the assumption of arms himself, and arms having been placed opposite his name, he was able to inquire into the matter boldly, without any fear of the payment of the sum required. He confessed he did not get a satisfactory answer. The man who said he had written to him did not appear to have written with any authority. His authority was repudiated by Lyon-King-at-Arms. The man assured him that he had authority; but he did not think the matter was seemly, and he trusted it would be inquired into.

would like to know what was the present state of the office, and whether there was such a person as Lyon-King-at-Arms? Some people supposed that Lord Kinnoul was Lyon, and that the office was hereditary in his family. He should like to know something about that. It was said that the only people in the office were clerks to copy documents. It seemed to him that the office of Herald of Scotland ought to be kept up, and kept up with dignity. It was a great pity if this office had been frittered away. There were many people who took an interest in this subject, who would wish to know from the right hon. and learned Lord who the Lyon was, and what were the duties performed in the office?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, it was quite true that at one time the Earls of Kinnoul were Lords Lyon-King-at-Arms of Scotland; but, some years ago, Parliament took the arrangements of the office into its own hands, and by Statute 30 Vict. c. 13, the office was remodelled, and, instead of the office retaining the fees as the property of the Lyon-King-at-Arms, the fees were paid into the Treasury. The office was now held by a well-known gentleman, a cadet of one of the oldest families in Aberdeenshire, and one of the most learned heralds in Scotland. It was the duty of the officials to receive the fees which were scheduled by the Act of Parliament, and precisely fixed. He was very sorry that any unjust claim, if such were made, was presented by these officials. He trusted the law was not unduly pressed against any hon. Member of that House. But it clearly was the duty of the office to collect the fees, and he was happy to say the office was in a most thriving condition.

MR. WHITWELL hoped the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) would not press his objection to the small amount paid to the Historiographer of Scotland. He trusted that the objection to the amount paid to the Limner would also be withdrawn. When they considered how, in foreign countries, Art was rewarded by degrees, and still more by orders, he did not think they could object to these small amounts. He would like to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate was strictly accurate as to the receipts of income from this office? There ought to be a record on the Votes of all receipts of income. In all other cases receipt of income was recorded. He was not aware that there was any other Vote where corresponding income was not recorded. No doubt, the Secretary to the Treasury would look after that.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON would not pledge himself that this represented the whole of the receipts of the office; but hon. Members would see that there were receipts for £700 placed under the Vote. While he had risen, he would answer the hon. Member for Duncarvan (Mr. O'Donnell). With regard to his opposition to the item of the Clock-maker, that was money paid for duty done. The man had charge of the clocks not only in the Palace at Holyrood, but in the Courts of Justice, and, therefore, this did not represent an honorary office, but represented work done.

DR. CAMERON would point out that the fact that fees were received by the Lyon-King-at-Arms rendered the circumstances which occurred a few months ago all the more inexcusable. On the occasion to which he referred, the demand did not come from the office, but came from a person purporting to come from the office. Yet, no steps had been taken to bring him to account.

THE LORD ADVOCATE could only say, that if the hon. Member had reported the circumstance to the office, steps would have been taken.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that his objection was, that these Votes were neither quite honorary, nor really valuable. As for the rest, he confessed if he had looked on this item simply in the light of remains of old Scottish Royalty, he would have treated it with more veneration. He had great veneration for the charming sentimentalism that still subsisted, and he hoped the Government would not be alarmed at this revival of Scottish Home Rule through the Votes of the Civil Service.

MR. MACDONALD observed, that one question he had asked had not been answered. He wanted to know when they were likely to have this volume? He knew there were men who were as anxious to have reprints of old books, as they were to have old china. He knew men who were looking anxiously for this book, and he would be glad if the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would tell them when they were likely to have it. He would not press the matter to a Vote. What he wanted to know was, when they were likely to have this volume, which had been so long in preparation?

THE LORD ADVOCATE explained, that the Vote was put in accordance with the Rules of the House, but did not relate to this book. There was a rule that when a public officer derived salary from one source, if he was, at the same time, deriving Government pay from another source, it should be mentioned; and this entry merely recorded that he received payment for preparing the volume. He might say that he believed the literary work had been accomplished; but, as the hon. Member was aware, the duty of superintending the publication of the work fell on the Lord Clerk Register of Scotland, an office vacant by death.

MR. BIGGAR asked for explanation of the item relating to the Secretary to the Bible Board?

MR. J. W. BARCLAY would suggest that in future the Estimates should avoid separate details of these relics of the Crown. Two hours were wasted last year in discussing these Estimates. On seeing the words "Limner" and "Historiographer" there was a good deal of curiosity among those to whom the names were new. If they were simply indicated as charges on the hereditary revenue, that would be quite sufficient.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in answer to the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), said, that the Secretary to the Bible Board's duties depended on the number of editions of the Bible in the course of publication. Out of the salary, the Secretary to the Bible Board paid a reader, who was by profession a printer, and who did the technical work. He believed the Secretary had also to provide office room for books and papers out of that amount. As agent of the Bible Board, this man was appointed from time to time by the Lord Advocate, and the clerks he had to employ were paid also from his salary. He believed the Secretary was formerly paid by fees; but the fees were now paid into the Treasury, and came to the same amount, or, rather exceeded, the salary; and, therefore, practically, it was not a great cost to the country.

MR. BIGGAR, after that explanation of the hon. Baronet, would feel called upon to move that the Vote of £600 to the Secretary of the Bible Board be not paid. The explanation was extremely satisfactory as far as it went. This gentleman paid as rent for the office £50 a-year; he paid to the reader not more than £100 a-year, and he did all the actual work; the result being that the Secretary of the Bible Board got £400 a-year for doing nothing. It was a sinecure, as far as he could see; and he did think that, unless the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate could give a more extended explanation, he should be called upon to ask for a division. Really, as at present advised, he should feel called upon to ask for a division. One of the duties of the Committee of that House on the Estimates was to see that no money was unreasonably spent. It seemed to him, as far as the information he had went, that this £600 was entirely thrown away. It was a sinecure for some gentleman. A sum of money was given, and no service was given in return. He should think it his duty to vote against the grant, and would move to omit £600, the salary of the Secretary to the Bible Board.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £600 for the Salary of the Secretary to the Bible Board be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Biggar.)

MR. O'DONNELL would suggest to the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) not to push his objection to this item. After all, this item was connected with the religious institutions of the country, and might as well be passed by.

MR. MACDONALD thought there was some misapprehension in the mind of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), and he feared the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury did not quite understand what the question really was. The Board, as he understood, was constituted as follows:—When a printer desired to print an edition of the Bible, that edition had to be submitted to the Clerk of the Board, and had to be read carefully. It was not a sinecure office. It was an office appointed for the use of the country, and so long as that was the case, this office should be maintained. Therefore, he hoped the hon. Member for Cavan would not push his Motion to a division.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, this was a matter discussed on the Motion of the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) last year. At one time it was the subject of a great deal of controversy in Scotland. There was a monopoly of printing the Bible in Scotland, which involved great expense. For that was substituted a system of licensing in order to protect the purity of the text. He believed the whole of the religious sects in Scotland were quite agreed on the utility of this Board, and would not like to part with its services.

MR. BIGGAR said, he was only partially enlightened so far, and for this reason—there was an expenditure on all fours with these hereditary and Royal appointments. First, there was the Secretary to the Bible Board; then there were the Limner and Historiographer, the Warder of the Regalia, and so on. These were all included under the hereditary allowances. Of course, the first time the Bible was in Scotland, as far as he knew, was in the reign of James the First. He certainly certified for the possession of the Bible, and perhaps that rule was still in operation. The fact remained, that this Secretary to the Bible Board got £600 a-year for correcting proofs of the different editions of the Bible. The Secretary might correct the proofs of one edition every three months; and it really seemed to him an extraordinary payment. He thought he ought to divide the Committee.

MR. J. COWEN said, his hon. Friend the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) was not here last year, when this Vote was explained. The £600 was paid for work done. The question was, whether the State ought to undertake that work. He did not think the State should undertake that work; but if the hon. Member for Cavan really knew what the work of correcting proofs was, he would not begrudge £600.

MR. BIGGAR said, as it appeared by the explanation of the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) that the sum in question was not an over-payment, he was willing to withdraw his Motion for the omission of this grant.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. BIGGAR said, he must ask the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury for a further explanation. He wished to know what were the duties of the Law Agent of the Scotch Bible Board? He would move the omission from the Estimates of the sum of £240, which appeared as the salary of this officer.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £240 for the Salary of the Law Agent to the Bible Board be omitted from the proposed Vote.—(Mr. Biggar.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON explained, that it was the duty of the Law Agent to watch that there was no infringement of the licence of the Board, and to prosecute for any such infringement. He was compelled to appeal to hon. Members as to whether, in proceeding with the consideration of the Estimates, the Committee were to do so in the usual manner, or in that lately followed—a course which appeared to him to be consistent neither with the dignity of the House nor the transaction of Business.

MR. BIGGAR said, he had no intention of placing obstacles in the way of the Business of the House. It was only reasonable that he should ask for information sufficient to enable him to understand the purposes to which this sum of money was to be applied. He had deferred to the views of several hon. Members in withdrawing his previous Motion, and, after the explanation afforded by the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), he would now beg leave to withdraw his opposition to this Vote of £240.

MR. PARNELL said, he could understand the impatience of the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury when questions were asked by Irish Members with respect to the Scotch Estimates. The questions of his hon. Friend related to subjects perfectly familiar to Scotch Members, but with which Irish Members were unacquainted. The hon. Member for Cavan came from the North of Ireland, and, by the responsibility cast upon him as a Member of that House, was asked to vote money for Scotch and English, as well as Irish purposes. It seemed to him that the hon. Baronet was suffering, not so much from any fault of his own, as from the faults of those who, in the year 1800, effected the arrangement which compelled the hon. Member for Cavan to come over to this country in order to assist in passing this Vote for Scotch purposes. His ignorance of these matters must, therefore, not be regarded as a fault, but as a misfortune. The explanation of these Votes which had been afforded by the Secretary to the Treasury was of great value; but, at the same time, he (Mr. Parnell) was bound to say that his explanations had not always been satisfactory; and the hon. Baronet would bear him out, that at an earlier period he had said that it was impossible for the discussion of the Estimates to be satisfactorily conducted in a Committee of the Whole House, and that one of two things would result therefrom—either that the Committee would lose its temper over the amount of time necessary to be expended, or that the Estimates could not be discussed at all. He had invited the hon. Baronet to refer the whole of the Estimates to a Select Committee upstairs; and he now repeated his invitation, under the conviction that a very large saving could be effected if this course were adopted.

THE CHAIRMAN would point out to the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), that his observations went beyond the Question before the Committee, to which he should endeavour to confine them.

MR. PARNELL would continue to do so. ["Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must remind the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), that after having been requested from the Chair to abstain from a particular line of argument, it was scarcely respectful to the Committee to say that he proposed to continue it.

MR. PARNELL had, perhaps, expressed himself incorrectly; but, of course, had not intended to refer to anything but the particular Vote under discussion, in doing which he had only expressed his conviction that if these particular Estimates were referred to a Select Committee, many ways could be pointed out by which a very material saving might be effected.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he could not allow the remarks which had fallen from the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury to pass unnoticed. A great deal of the difficulty in which the hon. Baronet was placed arose from the fact that he had not been assisted during the evening by the Heads of the Departments for which this money was asked. It was most desirable that those Gentlemen should be present, whose duty it was to be thoroughly posted with regard to these items. He had observed the Secretary to the Treasury sitting for a long time during the evening without a single Member of the Government beside him to afford explanations upon questions that had presented themselves earlier in the discussion; when, however, the Lord Advocate came in, every explanation had been given, and the Committee were enabled to proceed with Business. He had referred to these facts, so far as they related to the hon. Baronet, rather by way of commendation than otherwise; but, at the same time, he was bound to say that every Member of the Committee had a perfect right to make and maintain an objection to any item in the Estimates.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, if the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) had devoted some attention to these Estimates when they were gone into last year, he would have been in possession of a full explanation. He had only alluded to the course pursued by the hon. Member, because it seemed to him that the discussion was perpetually coming back to the same point, and that if any progress at all was to be made with the Estimates it could hardly be effected by that mode of procedure.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE said, many were of opinion that Queen's Plates, by encouraging short races with light weights encouraged the breeding of a weedy and worthless description of racehorse; and it was a common saying of an inferior description of racehorse, that "he was only fit to run for a Queen's Plate." He therefore moved the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £99, the amount of the Queen's Plates, Edinburgh.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £99, for Queen's Plates to be run for at Edinburgh, be omitted from the Vote."—(Major O'Beirne.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON pointed out, in reply to the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne), that the Vote had been thoroughly discussed on a previous occasion. In 1870, a division had taken place, and the Government were induced to strike the item out of the Estimates. Since then, however, in the year 1872-3, it had been restored, on the Petition of some of the Scotch Members, and he believed that as the matter now stood, it really represented the wishes of the majority of the people of Scotland.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he had always looked upon the sport of horseracing as one of the most innocent of recreations, and hoped that the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne) would not insist upon his Motion.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY hoped the Vote would not be objected to. On a former occasion the Scotch Members had strongly opposed this item for the Queen's Plates, and their wishes had been gratified; but experience had since shown that their object in so doing was the withdrawal of the Queen's Plates from other portions of the Kingdom as well as Scotland. As soon as the Scotch Members found that the sum of money which had formerly gone to Scotland had been struck out by their virtuous action, they requested that it might be restored. He thought that as the Scotch Members wanted the money they should be gratified, and trusted that his hon. and gallant Friend would not go to a division on this Vote.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE thought it was doubtful whether the Scotch people did wish for this money. In his opinion, the grant was a very unsuitable gift to such a nation as the Scotch, who, judging by their manner of observing the Sabbath, led one to infer that they objected to every kind of amusement. The money was thrown away in making such a grant, and, as apparently a number of Scotch Members agreed with him, he should press the question to a division.

MR. RAMSAY said, he had been led by his convictions as to the feeling of the people of Scotland as well as by his own opinions on the subject of horseracing to vote against the application of this money for the Queen's Plates; but he had been deterred that evening from taking any notice of the amount in question, simply because hon. Members were proceeding with their criticisms to such an extent as to exhaust the patience of the Government and waste the time of the House. He could not allow the representation made by the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne) to be a correct exposition of the feelings of the people of Scotland; but, even if it were, to waste the time of the House was not a satisfactory way of redressing a grievance. He would, therefore, appeal to the hon. and gallant Member not to proceed with his Motion.

DR. CAMERON said, he had not raised any objection to this portion of the Vote, for the same reason as that given by the hon. Member for Falkirk (Mr. Ramsay). He was, however, of opinion that the reduction of the Vote by this amount for the Queen's Plates would not be contrary to the wishes of the people of Scotland.

MR. MARK STEWART observed, that although the Scotch Members, as a body, were not favourable to a continuance of the Queen's Plates, he thought that while they were granted to the sister Kingdom, it was but right they should continue to be extended to Scotland. He should certainly vote against the Motion.

DR. BRADY said, the Queen's Plates had done a great deal towards improving the breed of horses in Ireland. They had done much good in past years, and he was sure that the wishes of the people of Ireland were in favour of their continuance. He knew no portion of the Kingdom where Plates of this description were more necessary than in Scotland, and, on that account, he should certainly vote against the proposition of the hon. and gallant Member.

MR. MELDON said, the object of the Scotch Members in voting against the continuance of Queen's Plates in Scotland was to get them withdrawn from Ireland, their case being that, as they were willing to see justice done, they would consent to their discontinuance in Scotland if the Irish Plates were also withdrawn. Personally, he (Mr. Meldon) did not care about horseracing; but it was exceedingly popular among the people of Kildare, the constituency which he represented. He could not understand the Motion, as coming from an Irish Member. On a former occasion, the Irish Members had almost in a body voted for the continuance of the Queen's Plates, and he thought it unfair to expect them to eat their own words. If the Scotch Plates were withdrawn, of course, the Irish Plates would, in common fairness, have to be withdrawn also—a result which he was sure the Irish people did not desire. He hoped that the Motion before the Committee would not be pressed to a division.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY wished also to reply to some of his Colleagues, and to mark his dissent from the opinions expressed by them at an earlier stage of the discussion. He thought that the people of Scotland took a very considerable interest in horseracing. He (Mr. Barclay) did not approve of it, but was obliged to recognize the fact that horseracing was on the increase in Scotland, and that a strong feeling in its favour was entertained by a large majority of the people.

MR. MONK admitted that the sum of £99 was so exceedingly small as to render the discussion of the amount itself needless. But there was a principle underlying this question. If the sum were really given for the Queen's Plates, it should be provided from the Privy Purse, and the Representatives of the people ought not to be asked to vote this money out of the Consolidated Fund. For that reason alone, he would record his vote in favour of the Motion.

MR. O'CLERY said, that as he liked to see a good race, he was quite willing to bear his share of the expense. He considered that Irish Members had no right to object to the Queen's Plates in Scotland, and that it would be wrong for him to go into the Lobby to vote against his Scotch Friends.

MR. MACDONALD said, in the course of the discussion the Committee had heard a great deal about the breed of horses, which was said to be improved by the competition for the Queen's Plates. He denied that the Queen's Plates had improved the breed of horses in Scotland, and believed that anyone who was acquainted with the kind of horses that ran for these Plates must know them to be a lot of old screws that had been drummed off every racecourse in the United Kingdom, and as such, they were quite unfit for breeding purposes.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 25; Noes 94: Majority 69.—(Div. List, No. 148.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

“That a sum, not exceeding £10,848, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1879, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Fishery Board in Scotland.”

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH complained that the grant of £3,000 for Piers and Quays had been for many years almost, if not entirely, absorbed by the Harbour of Anstruther, and he thought this unfair to other localities sorely in need of accommodation for fishing boats. He also wished to ask the Financial Secretary to the Treasury to declare in a more distinct manner than he did lately on the discussion raised by the noble Lord the Member for Elgin and Nairn (Viscount Macduff), what the intentions of Government were in reference to the recent Report of the Herring Fisheries' Commissioners which referred to harbours? There were numerous places on the North-eastern Coast of Scotland and friths, where pier accommodation was much needed; but these localities were very poor. He wished to know whether, in those cases where the localities undertook substantial obligations, Government would assist in form of loans on moderate terms?

MR. MACDONALD directed attention to the salary of the Secretary to the Fishery Board. It was stated to be £524; but an explanatory note showed that he also received £300 per annum from the Vote for the National Gallery, as Secretary to the Board of Manufactures, &c. This was another instance of a plurality of offices vested in one man—a practice which indicated a good deal of extravagance. Unless a very satisfactory explanation was given, it was his intention to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £300, in order that the latter amount might be given to some other person, and not all to one man.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY objected to the whole Vote for the Fishery Board, because he did not think it did any real good. He understood the hon. Member for the Inverness Burghs (Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh) to complain, in effect, that this sum of £3,000, annually granted for Piers and Quays, led the proprietors of the small harbours round the coast to make out an urgent case, in order to induce the Government to help them, instead of depending more upon their own efforts, and he thought he was quite right. Most of these small harbours belonged to the owners of land adjacent, and any money expended upon the harbours by the Government simply went to increase the revenues of the landowners. If the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) could hold out any prospect of allowing the proprietors to have Provisional Orders with greater facility than at present, he would, by saving a great deal of trouble and expense, offer the best encouragement to local effort. The point to which he particularly objected in the Vote was the branding. That was a question which had been repeatedly discussed in that House. A good many years ago a Commission reported upon the subject, and pronounced against branding; or, at least, they expressed the opinion that if the herring-curiers wanted the system of branding, they should themselves pay for it. He was for many years of opinion that the small curiers could not get on without the Government branding system; but after a careful consideration of the question, he was now fully of opinion that branding, in the long run, was not of advantage to the small curiers, any more than to the large. Formerly the Government brand was of value, because it indicated a certain description of herrings, and abroad was accepted implicitly as such; but of late years the quality of the fish branded had been so uncertain that Continental buyers were obliged to stipulate that, besides the barrels having the Government brand upon them, the herrings should be warranted by the trader to be of fair average quality. This involved great uncertainty in the trade. Another disadvantage was that the branding system gave great facilities for speculation, and caused considerable fluctuations in the price, causing much injury to the whole trade. For instance, herrings were often sold for weeks before they were branded, or even caught. Last year, for example, speculators went into the market and unduly raised the price, so that, at the end of the fishing season last year, it was as high as 40s. a-barrel. Contracts with the fishermen for this year's take had been made at Christmas, based on this extreme price, which had since fallen to 25s. If the branding system were abolished, the trade would no doubt soon get into a sounder and more healthy condition; the larger curiers would establish a reputation in the market, and would buy the herrings of the small curiers on fair terms, and the competition among the curiers would improve the quality of the cure. On these grounds, he should move the rejection of the Vote.

Moved, "That the Vote be disallowed."
—(Mr. J. W. Barclay.)

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON thought the hon. Member who had last spoken was under a misapprehension, as branding was quite optional, and not compulsory, as the hon. Gentleman seemed to suppose. Many curiers did not brand their barrels, but relied upon their own reputation. According to the last Return, he found that, in the year 1876, the number of barrels of herrings exported to the Continent was 400,423, and of these only 222,979 were branded—very little more than half. Branding was of great value to small curiers, because it enabled them to make money out of the fishing trade by establishing a little trade of their own, without being obliged to place themselves in the hands of the large traders. This was, no doubt, a vexed question in Scotland; but he believed that the wish of the fishermen, as a body, was not that the system should be abolished, but that the cost of branding should be reduced from 4d. a-barrel to 2d. That was the impression he gathered last year, when he visited all the ports in his own neighbourhood, during the sitting of the Royal Commission. If that reduction were allowed, the amount realized from branding would still be sufficient to defray Departmental expenses; and he, therefore, recommended that the Government might, with advantage to the trade, fairly make the reduction desired by the Scotch fishermen.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL inquired whether the branding system was self-supporting? The expenses of the Fishery Board amounted altogether to £12,948; whereas the branding fees were £6,810. It ought to be made clear whether the branding was self-supporting, or whether there was a profit or a loss upon it.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the branding was remunerative. The hon. Member opposite (Sir George Campbell) had mixed up a certain number of other charges which were included in this Vote—charges for Piers and Quays—which amounted altogether to something like £5,000. After deducting for that amount, the estimated cost of branding itself for the last year was about £5,200, while the actual receipts reached the sum of £6,000 or more. There was, therefore, a surplus; but it was not large enough to enable the Government to reduce the fee in the way suggested by the hon. and gallant Member (Sir Alexander Gordon). It was quite true, as had been stated, that branding was really a protection to the small curers, being accepted in foreign markets as a standard. He believed it was equally true that the brand was not adopted to a very large extent by the large traders. With regard to the question raised by the hon. Member for the Inverness Burghs (Mr. Fraser Mackintosh), although, for some period, the grant of £3,000 had been devoted principally to the Harbour at Anstruther, that had not been the case during the last two years. The grant had been made to supplement the local subscriptions from fishermen, and other inhabitants, which amounted to £1,000. He saw less objection to that form of granting aid than was open to other methods. With reference to the salary of the Secretary, this gentleman had a very responsible office to fill, and £524 did not more than fairly represent the value of his labours in that office. The £300 which the same gentleman received was for the duties performed by him as Secretary to the Board of Manufactures. This was, probably, a case in which one gentleman could do the work of two offices at a cheaper rate than if the two offices were filled by two distinct men. Where skill was required, it had been found better to obtain that skill and pay for it in this way, than to pay much higher salary for the same amount of skill in two persons instead of one.

MR. JOSEPH M'KENNA deprecated the reduction of salaries on the cheese-branding principle. He defended the branding system, which, he observed, had been established by the State in order to give an ascertained value, or standard, to herrings, of a good quality, exported from the Scotch coasts. There were some large curers who had established for themselves a commercial reputation, which was quite sufficient for the purposes of their trade, without the sanction of a Government brand; but this brand was needed to protect the small traders who had not established a reputation from the monopoly which would otherwise be exercised by the large ones who had.

MR. BRUEN considered the question of branding should be looked upon by the Government as a national, and not merely as a provincial, matter. The subject had been discussed many times previously by the House, and he hoped if hon. Members were desirous of supporting the Government in continuing the advantages which branding secured, they would, at the same time, urge the unfairness of that boon being confined to one part of the Kingdom. He thought the Irish had a fair claim to be considered, and to be as liberally dealt with in this matter as the Scotch.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the question had not only been frequently discussed in the House, but it had been reported on several times by Committees of the House. There were inquiries made in 1848, in 1856, in 1866, and again in 1870, the two first and the last of these Commissions being specially appointed to consider the matter of branding. It hardly fell within the powers of the Commissioners of 1866, whose inquiries should rather have been devoted to trawling; but they did make a Report, which was unfavourable to the continuance of branding. However, the special investigation in 1870 resulted in its continuance being recommended. All the Government really knew was that the small traders voluntarily paid branding fees to the extent of £6,800 per annum, and, consequently, they had no reason to suppose that the charge was considered objectionable.

MR. MACDONALD said, the large curers did not use the brand, and he could assure the Committee that, despite the statement that the fees were voluntarily paid, there were great complaints about the whole of the £6,000 having to come out of the pockets of the poorer people. Seeing that there was an increase of £235 now proposed, he suggested the reduction of the Vote by that sum.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, Scotch herrings made a much higher price than those caught off the Irish coast, and that was owing to the former having the benefit of the Government certificate or brand, which was much appreciated in those parts of Europe where the fish were sold. In fact, the Scotch herring exporters had now almost a monopoly of the sales, and, having obtained such a position, certain large traders were perfectly willing that this protection should be withdrawn from them. But there were other and smaller traders who did not at all wish to see such a course pursued, and he, therefore, was not prepared to vote in favour of the discontinuance of branding. Unfortunately, by the Rules of the House, he could not propose that the system should be extended to Ireland. It was felt to be a great grievance that the Scotch herring fishery should be protected by a brand, which boon had always been refused to the Irish. The result was that Irish herrings, though just as good, did not fetch such large prices in the Continental markets as the Scotch fish. Another thing, which was well known, was that the Irish herrings had, to a considerable extent, deserted the Irish coast, and there were strong reasons for believing that the herrings, resenting the manner in which they were treated, went to the coast of Scotland, where they were considered with greater distinction. He hoped the gentleman, who used to sit on the Ministerial side of the House, and who had recently been appointed to the office of Inspector of Fisheries in Ireland, would use his powers to obtain Government protection for the Irish fisheries. He (Mr. Mitchell Henry) should support the Vote for branding in Scotland, and he hoped the Government would ere long institute a similar proceeding in Ireland.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING had understood the Secretary to the Treasury to say he entirely disapproved of grants being made for constructing piers and harbours in the United Kingdom. The Act under which these grants were made was one of the most valuable Acts affecting Ireland, and he was utterly amazed to hear such a statement from the Secretary to the Treasury. Had not such an Act been in force, they would not now have had the safe piers and harbours which existed on the Scotch and Irish Coast for the benefit of the small fishermen, who had no other protection for their boats. He trusted the Secretary to the Treasury would not advise his Colleagues to repeal so valuable an Act of Parliament, and he desired to ask him, whether he had been correctly understood to say that he entirely disapproved of grants being made by the Government in aid of piers and harbours?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the hon. Member had forgotten that he was alluding to a grant of £3,000 for Scotch Harbours, when he made the remarks referred to. On a previous occasion an opinion was very generally expressed in the House, and by a considerable number of Scotch Members, that these sums of money ought not to be made as grants; because such a course of proceeding encouraged the people interested in the construction of harbours to trust too much to Government aid rather than to their own exertions. The proper principle was for the Government to assist local efforts rather than grant large sums of money for the purpose of making harbours. He believed it would be much better to give assistance, than to encourage the people to lean upon the Government for the creation of harbours.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, if the Scotch Members who had spoken really represented the feeling of the Scotch people in reference to this matter, he would have voted against the grant of this sum of money to Scotland. But he could not for a moment think that they had expressed the wishes of the Scotch people. His reasons for saying so were that, having recently been engaged in an inquiry relating to some herrings sent from Scotland to Holland, at which many Dutch merchants who dealt in herrings were examined, all of them agreed that in Holland the brand was considered as placing a value on the herrings, and that fish sold under such a brand could, as a rule, be relied on. In fact, had the herrings which gave rise to that particular inquiry been branded, litigation would have been entirely avoided, and the merchant would have taken the cargo on the strength of the brand. The fact of such a value being set on the system of branding by the merchants in Holland—and he did not know that it was not equally popular elsewhere—seemed to him to be a reason for retaining it. He was glad to find that the Irish herrings—like everything else Irish—were intelligent and sensitive, and that they felt the insult cast upon them by the Government in neglecting to extend the brand to the Irish fishery. But, as they had left the Irish shore, perhaps it would be premature to consider a proposal to brand them until they returned.

MR. RAMSAY hoped the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay) would withdraw the proposal for the disallowance of the Vote. In preferring such a request, it need not be understood that he differed from the hon. Gentleman; but he (Mr. Ramsay) thought time had been wasted by discussing a subject which was opposed, and with the same result, year after year. He hoped the Vote would be allowed to pass, and the Committee enabled to make some progress with the Estimates.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL did not like the word "protection," and he was very sorry it had been used in that discussion, because it seemed to him that no protection was afforded. The Irish Members were entirely mistaken if they supposed the Scotch people owed anything to the Treasury on account of the brand. Under an arrangement, which was entirely self-supporting, fish-curers in Scotland were allowed to have their exports branded; but they need not do so unless they chose. What was there in the nature of protection in such a system? He hoped the Committee would not be called on to divide against a plan which cost the nation nothing, and which, at the same time, was popular in Scotland. As to the making of harbours, he quite agreed with the Secretary to the Treasury, that grants should not be given to people who did not help themselves, but that assistance should be given to those who tried to do what they could by their own efforts. But sometimes the Government efforts had not been very successful. Anstruther was a case in point. There, an attempt was made to carry out some ambitious scheme in the shape of a harbour of refuge, the result being to spoil the harbour previously existing without providing any useful substitute. Anstruther was an important fishing station, where they wanted not a harbour for ships but for boats. After the Government had spent a very large sum of money in dribblets, they had made a harbour into which it was extremely difficult to get in bad weather, and, when inside, a boat would be almost sure either to dash against the pier, or to be swept out by the receding current. Something had been done since, the result of which was that boats could neither get in nor get out in bad weather; but having gone so far—while he agreed with the Secretary to the Treasury in the principle he had laid down—he thought, as a matter of justice, they could not withdraw the grant in such a case until the harbour was made what it ought to be.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, there could be no doubt that the brand was instituted for the purpose of giving a prominence to Scotch herrings which they would not have obtained but for this Government certificate. Some years ago, the fees paid for branding were not sufficient to meet the expenses, and a sum used to be voted yearly to supplement the fees; but, since then, the Scotch herrings had obtained such prominence in the world, as enabled the curers to cure them in sufficient numbers to pay the £6,800, which was the amount charged for branding. But that sum did not meet all the expenses. True, it paid for the Inspectors and individuals employed in affixing the brand. But, beyond that, they had the Fishery Board of Scotland, the most complete and direct instrument for preserving the Scotch Fisheries, costing £2,340. Therefore, to suppose that the Committee would believe that the whole system of branding was self-supporting, would be to draw rather too much on the credulity of hon. Members. He did not at all object to the branding of Scotch herrings, by the moderate expenses of which, and by the Government grant, the greatest benefits had been conferred upon a poor class of the community. If the Government were wise, they would extend the same system to other parts of the Kingdom, by which means herrings caught by the poor people of those localities would become as saleable and marketable in foreign countries as those which now came from Scotland.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, he thought the position of the Government on this occasion very inconsistent, and he and others had been continually asking the Government to brand Irish whisky, so as to prevent Scotchmen selling bad Scotch spirit as Irish whisky. But the Government would not allow that to be done even at the expense of the distillers. ["Question!"] This was the Question, because the Government which branded Scotch herrings for the purpose of protecting them, allowed Scotch merchants and manufacturers to send bad spirit into Ireland, and to call it Irish whisky.

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the hon. Member, that the Question before the Committee was the Vote for the Scotch Fishery Board.

MR. PARNELL moved to reduce the Vote by £3,000. He did so, because, on referring to the Irish Estimates, he found only £3,900 put down for Irish Fishery purposes, whilst the expenses of the Scotch Fishery Board amounted to £12,900, a difference of about £9,000. So long as the Government refused the brand to the herring fisheries of Ireland, they were doing a serious injustice to the country, preventing the Irish traders from establishing a reputation in the market for Irish herrings in competition with Scotch herrings. As a consequence of such conduct, there was no curing whatever carried on in Ireland. During the Irish herring fishery, when large quantities were caught, steamers came from Liverpool and other places, laid off the fishing ground, received the fish as soon as caught, and carried them to England or Scotland, where they were cured and branded. By these means, it frequently happened that Irish herrings were sold as being Scotch or English. If these fish were cured in Ireland, a great deal of employment would be afforded to people who were much in need of work. The neglect of the Government, in reference to the interests of the fishermen, was one of the most important examples of their general neglect of the material and industrial resources of Ireland. During recent years, the shoals of herrings had increased to a great extent on the Irish coast, and had not, as the hon. Member for the county of Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) said, gone to the coast of Scotland. That being the case, an important and valuable industry might, with proper assistance in shape of giving the Irish the protection of the brand, be established in Ireland. He knew that very often, herrings, for which there was no market, and for curing which no means existed, were used for manure by farmers. If the Government gave them the brand, it would be of the greatest importance to the fishing populations in Ireland. They did not want direct support, they did not want a grant, nor did they want protection. All that they asked was that the Irish fisheries might be put upon an equality with the Scotch. The Scotch herrings had acquired a reputation by means of the Government brand, and they seemed now able to do without it; but that was not the case with Irish herrings. Ireland was still without that brand; but he firmly believed that, if his country had it, the result would be the setting-up of industries at different points which would contribute materially to the welfare and posterity of the seafaring population along the coasts. No one who had come in contact with the large seafaring population of Ireland would dispute that proposition. Sometimes the fishermen of whom he spoke were comparatively well off for a brief period; but it not unfrequently happened that they suddenly found themselves sinking into a condition of abject poverty. He affirmed that the Members of the Government had neglected their duty with respect to the Irish fisheries in a most remarkable manner; and, as marking his disapproval of the course which they had followed, he moved to reduce the Vote by £3,000. If that sum was no longer of use to the Scotch Members, let it be given to Ireland, and let Irish fish be branded, in order that they might acquire the same reputation as the Scotch herrings enjoyed.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

—(Mr. Parnell.)

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he could never consent to act upon the principle on which a reduction of the Vote had just been proposed to the Committee. This money did a great deal of good to a poor population in Scotland. There was exactly the same kind of population in Ireland, who deserved encouragement in a similar manner. He agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) in his desire to obtain some advantages for the poor Irish fishermen; but he would be no party to reducing a Vote which was productive of nothing but good to Scotch people, merely because there was not exactly the same thing in Ireland. Let the Irish Members endeavour, certainly, to get Irish herrings branded, and to obtain the establishment of a Fishery Board in their own country. In that endeavour he believed they would be aided by the Scotch Members, and he had no doubt that if they put their shoulders to the wheel, and were united, they would realize what they desired; but he would think it wrong to reduce the Vote simply because of the reasons which had been stated by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell).

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA hoped that his hon. Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) would not deem it his duty to persevere with his Motion for a reduction of the Vote. There was one particular point in connection with this matter which he desired to clear up. The Scotch system of branding was no longer a charge on the State. The sum by which his hon. Friend would reduce the amount now proposed to be voted, was contributed to the State through the fees paid to the branders. He quite agreed that it would be advantageous if the branding of herrings were extended to Ireland, and he had no doubt that the Scotch Members would support their Irish Brethren in this matter, as in everything that was fair their Irish Brethren had supported them; but he thought that the best interests of both countries would be consulted by not objecting to the Vote at present. He quite agreed, however, as he had indicated, with the reasons which had actuated the hon. Member for Meath in the course he had taken.

MR. YEAMAN said, he did not see why the same justice should not be done to the Irish fisheries as had been done in the case of the Scotch. Let a fair trial be made by sending two or three inspecting officers to the different stations in Ireland while the fishing was going on. The officers could supply the curers at those stations with rules and regulations in regard to the curing of fish, and they could mark out for them the exact size of barrels to use. The expense of doing this would be but small, and the people of Ireland would be enabled to prosecute a branch of industry which he believed would be of great value and advantage to them. It would only be right, in his opinion, to place the Irish fisheries on the same footing as those in Scotland; and he had no doubt that if that were done there would be found to be a surplus in connection with branding in Ireland as there was at present in Scotland. With regard to the question of harbours, he quite disapproved of large grants being given by the Treasury for the erection of fishing harbours at Wick, Anstruther, or other places. But the Government had undertaken certain engagements; they had expended something like £19,000 upon one particular harbour. At the same time it would be manifestly unfair for them to refuse to fulfil their obligations with the authorities in Anstruther. As to Wick Harbour, he did not know how many thousands of pounds had been expended upon it; but it was now, if not a complete wreck, at least a wreck to a very considerable extent. These, however, were not harbours of refuge in the proper sense of that term, as the hon. Member for the Kirkcaldy Burghs seemed to suppose, but simply harbours for the purpose of protecting fishing boats when they came in from sea, and their support should be the result of the native industry of the people. He objected very much to any mere reduction of the Vote. If there were to be any diminution under this head of the Estimates, let it take the form of doing away with this particular grant altogether; but he believed that, even if it were done away with, the trade in Scotland would prove in future as successful and as prosperous as it was at the present time.

MR. PARNELL desired to advert for a moment to the observations which had been made by the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry). His hon. Friend had said that they must not take away this Vote from Scotland because they desired a similar grant for Ireland. He could not have ventured to suggest that it should be taken away from Scotland, had not the Scotch Members themselves distinctly told the Committee that they did not want it. ["No, no!"] On this occasion, and on several previous occasions, the Scotch Members had informed the Committee that branding was a disadvantage to their country. ["No, no!"] No! Why, the hon. Member who first drew attention to this matter to-night distinctly stated that the brand was an injury to Scotch fish; that those fish had now acquired a sufficient reputation, that the present branding system was not required, and that, therefore, it was not necessary it should be any longer kept up. He had taken the hon. Member at his word, and he had said—"Give to us this money which you do not require for yourselves, and let us spend it for the purpose of improving our fisheries." That, surely, was a sensible proposition. He asked that money, not needed in Scotland, should be given to Ireland, in order that Irish herrings might acquire the reputation in the markets of Europe which Scotch herrings now possessed, and that by the same means. This, he repeated, was an intelligible proposal, and did not at all partake of the nature which the hon. Member for Galway had attributed to it. He did not grudge the money to Scotland, but the Scotch Members said that Scotland did not want it. Ireland did, and he should press his Motion to a division.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, previous divisions had shown whether the Scotch Members desired this money or not. It was perfect error for his hon. Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) to say that those hon. Gentlemen wished that this grant or other grants of a similar character should be withdrawn. Over and over again the hon. Members referred to had voted in favour of their maintenance. No doubt, there might have been one or two exceptions. There was, for example, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) who first brought up the question on the ground that the existing state of matters was an interference with free trade. That right hon. Gentleman introduced the subject several years ago; there was a division upon it then, there had been divisions since; and the Scotch Members then, as now, would be found to have voted in favour of the grant. Not only so, but to talk of the Scotch Members giving Ireland this Vote was absurd. What power had the Scotch Members to give this or any other money to Ireland? To say that those hon. Members had any such power was simply to trifle with the question. The Scotch Representatives had no more authority over the £3,000 than his hon. Friend the Member for Meath himself. The Vote must be proposed by the Government, and hon. Members might, if they liked, protest against it; but he thought they would be adopting a very foolish policy if they did so. The policy which the Irish Members had always followed was to support these grants to Scotland, while endeavouring to get similar grants for Ireland. They had never introduced the principle of cutting down the advantages which were given to a weaker portion of the Kingdom—Scotland—in order to obtain that which they desired for themselves. Those advantages might possibly be cut down speedily enough, if the course which certain hon. Members recommended were acted upon. England governed Scotland, as well as Ireland, and he thought it would be most unwise to interfere with the few advantages which the unity of Scotch Members had enabled them to attain and to retain.

MR. GRAY said, it did not appear to be generally recognized that the only way in which the opinion of the Committee could be tested on this question was by moving a reduction of the Vote. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had said that the matter had been voted on again and again. In that case, the opinion of the Committee must have been taken on a similar question to that which was now before it—namely, on a proposed reduction of the Vote. No hon. Member could of himself propose a substantive Vote of money; the proposition must come from the Government. It was not from any hostility to a particular grant being given to Scotland, but because of a desire to protest against the inequality of the present system, that it was now sought to test the opinion of the Committee. If the grant were useful for Scotland, a similar grant would be useful for Ireland. If it were not useful for Scotland, what harm would be done to that country by abolishing it? He was astonished that the discussion should have reached its present stage without a single Member of the Government having said a word on the subject. He should like to hear from the Secretary to the Treasury an answer to two questions—If this were a useful expenditure of public money in regard to Scotland, how could the exclusion of Ireland from a similar advantage be justified? If it were a useless expenditure with respect to Scotland, how could its continuance be justified?

MR. RAMSAY said, the hon. Member who had just spoken could not have heard the whole of the discussion. There had been an expression of opinion from the Treasury Bench on the question of branding. The Committee had now been debating one and the same Vote for an hour and 20 minutes, and he thought that during that period there had been a waste of time such as he had never before witnessed in the House. He would point out to those who so very frequently addressed the Committee, that one of the effects of their system of criticizing the Estimates was to prevent hon. Members from making objections on points that should really be raised in discussing the Votes. For himself, he had been restrained from expressions of opinion on different items solely by the time which had been occupied by preceding discussions.

MR. GRAY thought the Committee had listened to four or five speeches that evening from the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, and who protested against a waste of time. He (Mr. Gray) himself had only occupied a few minutes; and, that being so, the Committee could judge as to who had wasted time. The hon. Gentleman had said that a statement on the subject under consideration had been made from the Treasury Bench. It was not on the general question of branding that he desired an expression of opinion from the Government. The point was one of principle—why should that which was conceded to Scotland not also be given to Ireland? and it was upon that point he should like to hear something from the Treasury Bench.

MR. KING-HARMAN remarked that this question of branding was one of the greatest importance to Ireland. The trading portions of the community in that country were deeply interested in it, and he hoped that due consideration would be given to it by Her Majesty's Government.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the only reason why he had not risen sooner to notice the remarks of hon. Gentlemen from Ireland was, that it appeared to him they had been discussing a Vote which did not apply to Ireland at all. The Vote had simply to do with the branding of Scotch herrings, and the question was whether a sum of money should be placed in the Estimates in connection with that object. Reference had been made to previous divisions on the subject. Previous divisions had certainly been taken; but those divisions had not been as to whether this grant should be extended to Ireland, but as to whether the Scotch Members wished that it should be continued for their own country. That was the issue on which discussions had arisen. When they came to the case of Ireland on its own merits, he should be prepared to express an opinion on the part of the Government; but on what was a purely Scotch question and a purely Scotch Vote, he had already given his opinions to the Committee at some length. He confessed that he failed to see how the question of a Vote which could not, by any reduction, be applied to Ireland, could properly be brought into the present discussion. Let the matter be raised in a practical form, and at a proper time, and he should then be prepared to state his views upon it.

MR. MELDON said, he could not agree with the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury, that the question, as connected with Ireland, had not been raised on this occasion in a practical form. He thought it had been raised by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) in a very practical form. They had heard a good deal in that House about levelling up and levelling down. He was in favour, as a rule, of levelling up; but when attempts in that direction failed, he was inclined to adopt the principle of levelling down. That being so, he thanked his hon. Friend who represented Meath for having raised the question in the manner he had done. The fact that herrings were branded for Scotland and not for Ireland had an injurious effect upon the Irish article in distant markets. The Government brand was frequently regarded as the only test, and it was the want of it which excluded the sale of Irish herrings altogether in some of these markets. In addition to that, it was an obvious injustice that a system which existed in Scotland, and which the people of Ireland desired, should not be extended to the latter country. The Scotch Members said, however, that the branding system was more injurious than beneficial to the trade in Scotland, and that their herrings had acquired such a reputation that they did not wish the brand continued. But why not give the brand to Ireland, where it was desiderated, in order that Irish herrings might have a chance of competing fairly in distant markets? For years the Irish Members had been fighting, in order, if possible, to obtain some relief and consideration with respect to the fishery laws in their own country; but they had, so far, been wholly unsuccessful. It was obvious, however, that there ought not to be protection given to one part of the Kingdom and not to another. The subject had now been brought before the Committee in the most practical way, and he could not agree with the hon. Baronet who preceded him—that the question of Irish branding had nothing whatever to do with the Vote under discussion. With reference to what had fallen from the hon. Member for the Falkirk Burghs (Mr. Ramsay), that hon. Gentleman was always ready, whenever the matter of refusing a Vote for Ireland was concerned, to waste as much time as possible; but he protested against the assertion that time was lost or wasted in any way when hon. Members raised a question like the present, involving a great principle. He had been in attendance during the greater part of the evening. He had derived a good deal of benefit from the discussion which had taken place, and he did not think that one moment of the time of the Committee had been uselessly employed.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, that in 1874 a Motion was carried by a majority of 2 in favour of affording support to the Irish fisheries, and the result was that the Reproductive Loan Fund, which was used for various useful purposes, was handed over to the Commissioners for the purpose of encouraging the fisheries of Ireland. What had been the result? It had been a loan, not for the purpose of the fisheries, but to enable broken-down tenants to pay their rents. It was asked why did they not move a Vote of money to be given for the branding of herrings in Ireland? The reason was they had got no herrings to brand. They all knew very well that the herrings had abandoned the Irish coast, and the idea of taking from Scotland the fees it received, because they had herrings and Ireland had not, was a most extraordinary one. He, for one, would be no party to the doctrine that Scotland should be deprived of what she got. He would rather be in favour of increasing it; and, when he found Ireland had got herrings to brand, he would join in asking the Government to give them a grant.

MR. PARNELL protested against the assumption of the Scotch Members, that they were the only persons entitled to speak on that subject. It would be within the knowledge of everybody who had attended this evening, that by far the larger portion of the time of the Committee had been taken up by the Scotch Members, who had made speeches of a most stupid character, in a language which nobody could understand.

MR. PULESTON rose to Order, and submitted that the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) had no right to use such language towards the Scotch Members.

THE CHAIRMAN: I did not understand the hon. Member for Meath to attribute any motives; but the expression he has used with regard to the pronunciation of the Scotch Members appears to be somewhat irregular.

MR. PARNELL had merely said he could not understand their language, and before the next Scotch discussion came on, he would endeavour to learn it.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, not a single word had been uttered which any hon. Member of the House could not understand.

MR. PARNELL promised, by that time next year to remove any further cause of offence, by living such a time in Scotland that he would be able to learn the language. But they were now discussing the Vote for the branding of Scotch herrings, and the Government had been asked to give the Committee some reason why such a Vote should be continued; but the Government had neither told them the Vote was right or wrong. The Secretary to the Treasury had said he could give no reasons at all for the Vote; and, under those circumstances, the Committee was entitled to reject it. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had been present during the whole of the discussion, but he was, apparently, asleep, and he had not told them why if Scotland was to have this money, a similar Vote should not be made to Ireland. He protested against this system of partial legislation.

MR. SULLIVAN pointed out the injustice and impolicy of arraying Scotland against Ireland in this matter. Because Ireland did not receive a similar Vote, that was no reason why they should take the money away from Scotland. He had been sent into the House from Ireland to pursue towards the people of this country a policy of conciliation, and the kinder and wiser course was to encourage every just and beneficent measure for the fishermen of Scotland, rather than to pursue the ill-natured policy of endeavouring to deprive Scotland of the Vote simply because Ireland had not got a similar one.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, the Scotch fishermen had no right to Irish and English money, when the Scotch Members refused to grant English, Irish, and Scotch money to the Irish fishermen. He, as an Irish Member, could not sit still and see such a thing done. What he had been looking for during the last hour was for some of the Scotch Members to get up and say—"Do not touch our privilege, and when you ask for a similar Vote for Ireland we will support you." With the exception of the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. Yeaman), no such expression of intention had fallen from the Scotch Members; and he, therefore, thought his hon. Friend was correct in the course he was pursuing in objecting to this Vote. The right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had preserved a suspicious silence, and their course was perfectly plain. As they could not now bring forward a direct proposal for a grant of this kind for Ireland, the only way they had to express their dissatisfaction at the way they were being treated was by moving the Amendment. Allusion had been made to the Reproductive Loan Fund, and as regarded that, he wished to say that it was not English and Scotch money, but it was wholly Irish money.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, he should not take the hon. Member who had just sat down as his model, nor did he want a character from him amongst his constituents. He was in the habit, whenever he got up to address the House, not of advising, but of insinuating, hon. Members by his personally offensive observations. Now, with regard to the Reproductive Loan Fund, the hon. Member showed his ignorance by saying it was Irish money. It was the money of the charitable and philanthropic people of England, got up at a time when Ireland was suffering great distress, and what remained of the sum not required was vested in trustees for public purposes in Ireland. Not a single farthing of the money originally belonged to the Irish people. So much for the hon. Member's knowledge of the history of that matter. Now, as to the question before the Committee, he repeated there was no injustice in this grant being made to Scotland, and it was only delaying and trifling with the time of hon. Members to object to it, because Ireland had no substantial grievance regarding it. The objection which had been raised was simply for the purpose of preventing the Business of the House being carried on, and he, as an Irish Member, had no hesitation in expressing that opinion.

THE CHAIRMAN: The discussion seems to be turning away from the particular subject before the Committee.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, the omission of this Vote had been moved on the express ground that the money was not wished for by the Scotch Members.

MR. PARNELL begged to say that he had not moved his Amendment merely on the ground that the Vote was not wished for by the Scotch Members, but he had given other grounds; though, as far as they had expressed themselves, the Scotch Members had distinctly said the Vote was not useful to them.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, it was in the recollection of the House that the distinct and only ground upon which it was proposed not to grant this money was because it was not appreciated in Scotland, and the Scotch Members did not wish it to be continued. The hon. Member distinctly stated that if the Scotch Members had desired the Vote to be continued, he would not have moved its rejection. Now, it was perfectly clear the Scotch Members did want the Vote, and, therefore, the hon. Member ought not to press his opposition.

MR. GRAY considered the hon. Member for the county of Cork (Mr. M'Carthy Downing) had made a very strong and undeserved attack upon the Irish Members who opposed this Vote. There was no desire on his part, or that of any other Irish Member, to waste the time of the Committee. They had raised a perfectly legitimate issue, and they had asked the Government to pronounce upon it, and the Secretary to the Treasury had told them he would be prepared to give an answer, if the point was raised on the Irish Votes. Now, the hon. Baronet must be aware that the Rules of the House would not allow them to raise it on the Irish Votes. The right hon. Baronet the late Chief Secretary for Ireland was present, yet he had given no expression of opinion on the subject; and, if there had been any waste of time, it was due to the fact that, having raised a perfectly legitimate issue in a fair manner, they had received no answer. He therefore protested against the insinuations which had been made by the hon. Member.

MR. MELDON merely wished to add one word, which was that this question had been persistently and earnestly raised every year since 1874, when they succeeded, by a majority of two, in establishing the principle that some help ought to be given to the Irish fisheries. This disposed of any charges which might be made against their motives.

COMMITTEE. [Progress 21st May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 6 (Commencement of Act).

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, that they had told the supporters of the Bill that if it should come on at any fair and reasonable hour they would be willing to discuss it, but if not they would not go into it. It was 4 o'clock this morning when they had got to bed, and the Chairman would not therefore be surprised that he begged to move that he (the Chairman) do report Progress and ask leave to sit again. They had a Scotch Bill on Tenant Right being brought on by Scotch Members which had had to give place to the Sunday Closing Bill, although it was of greater importance than the latter, on which Irish Members were so much divided.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. O'Sullivan.)

MR. ONSLOW supported the Motion, thinking it most unreasonable that they should have to go on with that discussion after being so late the night before. The hon. Member for Roscommon put it down night after night, and they had to come down and go into the Amendments. He hoped the Committee would not allow the Bill to be forced down the throats of an unwilling minority—a very strong one. He trusted the hon. Member in charge of the Bill would agree that they should all go home at a reasonable hour, and take it some day next week before 12.30.

THE O'CONOR DON said, that the hon. Member was very fond of telling him to take the Bill on "some" day, without telling him on what day, and knowing full well that he could not command a day. It had been very well understood that the Government had, by the very fact of placing the Bill where they had, announced their intention of giving facilities that evening for proceeding with it. His right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had given him an assurance that evening that at 11 o'clock Supply should be reported, and that they should be able to get into consideration of that Bill in Committee. [Major O'GORMAN: It is half-past 12 now.] The discussion on the Votes had, of course, prevented the Government from doing so; and he did not mean to accuse them of a breach of faith. The result, however, was, that the Government had given him no facilities that evening. But was the hour at which they had arrived an unreasonable hour for taking up a Bill in the hands of a private Member? The course altogether pursued with regard to that Bill from the first moment showed the object which its opponents had — they had always been saying that they were anxious to give it a fair discussion—but the whole course of their conduct showed that they wanted to defeat it that Session, as previously, by dilatory Motions. And he had again to appeal to the Committee to stand by him in resisting them; and to show that the Bill of a private Member was not to be thus placed at a disadvantage. It would be perfectly impossible for him to consent to the proposal made to him.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON could not allow what had been said to pass without comment. He understood the hon. Member to say that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had pledged himself to stop Supply at 11 o'clock.

THE O'CONOR DON said, he had intended to state that he did not in any way blame the Government.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON was very glad indeed that he had misunderstood the hon. Gentleman, because the Committee would be aware that what had happened had not been the fault of the Government.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA hoped that the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Sullivan) would not persist with the Motion to report Progress. They had a great deal to do; and, although they might not have a division on the Amendment, they might clear away some objections and difficulties, and perhaps come to a decision on a future evening.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING thought they might very well have a discussion on that clause—it was not too late.

MAJOR O'GORMAN hoped his hon. Friend (Mr. O'Sullivan) would not allow any discussion whatever. They should accept no terms whatever from those people. The Half-past 12 o'clock Rule was then being violated. They might be told that they were in Committee, and therefore it could not be considered an opposed Bill. Well, they would oppose it.

MR. MURPHY said, that the Amendment was a very important one, and might be fairly debated; it was only reasonable that they should have a discussion upon it. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Roscommon, having had a discussion upon it, would feel it his duty to go further; but, if he persevered, he (Mr. Murphy) should feel it his duty to go into the Lobby against him.

MR. O'SULLIVAN had told the supporters of the Bill, that if it came on at a reasonable hour they would discuss the Amendment, and he intended to keep his word, and did not intend discussing it at that unreasonable hour. If half the trouble taken with that Bill had been taken with the Land Bill, they might have had it passed before that. With regard to the observations of the hon. Member for Roscommon, it was a very remarkable thing that the Bill of the hon. Members for Down and Downpatrick had passed without opposition, although it had been fourth on the Paper, and that before them had been eighth. The present Bill was then second on the Paper. He did not see why it should be forced on any more than any other Bill.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that the reason why the Bill occupied a higher position on the Paper was that the Government had undertaken to afford facilities for its progress. It certainly was perfectly true that, owing to circumstances to which he need not refer, they had reached the Bill at a later hour than had been expected; but the hon. Member for Roscommon had very fairly stated that the Government had not been responsible. The hon. Member for Limerick county (Mr. O'Sullivan) had an Amendment on the Paper which he was anxious to discuss; and the hon. Member for Sligo county (Mr. King-Harman) had one which the hon. Member for Roscommon had admitted to be important. It might be very reasonable that they should discuss the Amendment of the hon. Member for Limerick, because the hour really was not a very late one, and then report Progress, so as to enable the important question raised by the hon. Member for Sligo to be debated.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, that if the hon. Member for Roscommon was satisfied with the suggestion made, he would then give in and withdraw his Amendment.

THE O'CONOR DON said, that it would be simply an absurdity. Anyone who knew the character of the Amendment knew that such a proposal was mere trifling.

MR. O'SULLIVAN could not see that it was trifling. If the hon. Member did not accept the proposal, he must go to a division.

MR. KIRK considered that if the Government had broken faith with the hon. Member for Roscommon, still men had not a right to stop out of their beds till 6 in the morning to watch that Bill; and, therefore, the hon. Member for Limerick county should press the matter to a division.

MR. MACÁRTNEY said, that some hon. Members appeared to forget that the Half-past 12 o'clock Rule applied to Bills in their early stages—not when in Committee.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 23; Noes 95: Majority 72. — (Div. List, No. 150.)

MR. O'SULLIVAN repeated his offer to the hon. Member (the O'Connor Don), that he should agree to report Progress after the next Amendment had been discussed, which was his own. He moved, at page 2, line 34, after "on," to add "the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and eighty," and leave out the date named in the Bill. As the clause stood, the Bill would come into operation very shortly after the close of the present Session of Parliament—namely, on the 1st of October. That would be too sudden for so important a change as that which the measure contemplated. There were many parts of Ireland where the people would know nothing about the alteration in the law, and they would be taken by surprise if the Bill came into operation so soon. There were other reasons for postponing its operation. At present, the people resorted on the Sunday to places of recreation within two or three miles of the towns. These places of recreation would be shut up by this Bill, and the proprietors compelled to make fresh arrangements. He held it to be wrong to close these all at once, and, therefore, it was only fair and reasonable to give them an opportunity of getting rid of their little stock-in-trade, and setting up in some other business. He resisted this piece of class legislation in the interest, not of the wealthier traders, but of the poorer ones, including those who were non-electors. Why, he asked, were hon. Members pressing this Bill forward, night after night, in this way? It was, he believed, because a re-action was setting in against the Bill in the country, and they knew that if they did not push the measure forward in the present Parliament, they would have no chance of success with it in the next. No mention was made by hon. Members from Ireland of this Bill at the last General Election, excepting by two Members for the city of Dublin, both of whom had lost their seats. Only a small portion of the Home Rule Members had voted for this Bill in the course of the year. The greatest support it had received came from the Sabbatarian North of Ireland, where the promoters of the Bill were obliged to get Scotchmen to advocate the measure, because they failed to obtain Irishmen for the purpose. Outside Parliament the Bill had the support of the wealthy classes; but was it supported by the men who made use of public-houses in Ireland on the Sunday? He hoped the Committee would accept the reasonable Amendment he proposed.

The O'Connor Don

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 34, to leave out the words "of October, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight," in order to insert the words "day of January, one thousand eight hundred and eighty."—(Mr. O'Sullivan.)

Question proposed,

"That the words 'of October, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight' stand part of the Clause."

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA suggested that the 1st of January, 1879, should be the date fixed for commencing the operation of the Bill. It would not do to force this measure unduly upon the people, as he feared in that case it might lead to some turmoil. A great majority of the humbler classes had been opposed to the principle of the Bill. It appeared a hardship to those classes that legislation of this kind should be promoted by those who enjoyed all the advantages of well-filled cellars, or of clubs. It was well known that this measure had been promoted by an organized committee, employing salaried persons to travel from place to place; and they had been compelled to engage the services of Scotchmen to advocate a measure for Ireland. Experience did not commend the Forbes-Mackenzie Act to the notice of Parliament, except on Sabbatarian grounds; for, notwithstanding the passing of that Act, the consumption of intoxicating liquors in Scotland had very greatly increased during the last 25 years. If this Bill were passed for Ireland, in all probability it would lead to more drinking in private than prevailed at the present time. He could not support his hon. Friend's Amendment, because it seemed to be trifling with the Committee to propose postponing the operation of the Bill to so distant a day. He, therefore, should be prepared, at the proper time, to move that the date be the 1st of January, 1879.

MR. R. SMYTH, while agreeing that the alteration suggested by the hon. Member who had just sat down was a reasonable one, pointed out a grave objection to it. The whole matter had been considered at great length in the Select Committee last year, and they had, with the entire concurrence of the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), agreed to fix the date as it now appeared in the Bill, for this reason, that it corresponded with the date of the annual licensing sessions. If the date were altered to the 1st of January—two months after the holding of those Sessions—it was obvious that great inconvenience would arise with respect to licences taken out by publicans. As the question had been fully gone into by the Select Committee, he thought it would be much better, and far safer, to adhere to the date they had fixed.

MR. O'SULLIVAN remarked, that when the Licensing Bill of 1872 was passed, 12 months' notice was given to the trade of the contemplated change in the law. However, to show that he was willing to meet his hon. Friend in this matter, he would alter his Amendment, if they agreed to fix the 1st of March, 1879, as the date when the Bill should come into force.

MR. O'CLERY observed, that the interest which one side appeared to have in the operation of this Bill was so obvious, that the only way to meet their opposition as it deserved to be met was by tiring it out.

MR. MURPHY thought the offer of the hon. Member (Mr. O'Sullivan) might very well be considered; because there would be no difficulty in the publican getting a licence next October to last until the 10th of March, 1879, instead of the 10th of October following.

MR. KIRK, referring to the remark of the hon. Member for Wexford county (Mr. O'Clery), that parties who brought forward Amendments, and who were opposing the Bill, did so because they had an interest in the liquor traffic, said, the same observations had been made on more than one occasion, and, amongst others, by an hon. Gentleman opposite. He repudiated all these assertions.

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the hon. Member of the Question before the Committee.

MR. KIRK was sorry to be out of Order, but his feelings had carried him so far as to transgress the Rules of the House. The Amendment before the Committee ought to be adopted. The Bill was a confiscatory and revolutionary measure; and he deprecated its sudden enforcement—for there were many small traders, selling whisky and beer in the country districts, who would require some time to enable them to dispose of their businesses, which this Bill would so seriously disturb. They might be compelled to emigrate to America. Two months' notice was insufficient. For his part, he hoped it would be a long time before the labourer brought home his bottle of whisky on a Saturday night, for consumption on the following day, because he could not get it on Sunday. The Amendment, far from being of a trifling character, was a fair concession.

THE O'CONOR DON had no particular preference for the date named in the Bill, excepting the fact that the annual licensing sessions met in October, and the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) was of opinion that the 1st of October was the time at which the operation of the Bill ought to commence. It would be a disadvantage, and not quite fair, to place upon a publican the necessity of taking out a seven days' licence for a whole year, when, according to this Bill, the licence would operate only for a few months. Unless he heard some strong reasons for the proposed alteration, he would not be justified in consenting to change a date, which had

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA referred to a remark which an hon. Member had made to him, that it would be just as well to pass the Bill and let the people feel it at once. That observation did not altogether commend itself to him, because he would rather that the people should accept the measure, if they really needed it. He urged that the date should be the 10th of March next.

MAJOR O'GORMAN said, he wanted to ask the Committee this question. If a Resolution were proposed, declaring that after a certain day, Messrs. Bass and Allsopp should sell no more of their goods, was there one single Member of that House that would vote for such a measure, and agree to confiscate the property of those gentlemen? And, after all, was this not a confiscatory Bill? Were the poor people who, under the ægis of the law of England, had furnished themselves with a certain quantity of liquor for sale—were they to have their property confiscated, without any trial whatever, and simply because a parcel of Home Rule Coercionists—persons who came there from Ireland as Representatives, but who were never elected in 1874 for the purpose of passing such a Bill as this—and who, if such a measure had been proposed by them in 1874, would have been whipped out by their constituencies? In 1874 there was no such question brought forward as one for the closing of public-houses on Sunday in Ireland; but since that period, these miserable people had come to the House asking for a Bill. ["Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and gallant Gentleman will see that the expression, "those miserable people," is scarcely a proper one to use. I trust he will withdraw it.

MAJOR O'GORMAN said, he would withdraw it. Another adjective had now gone from them, and he did not know where they should get adjectives when they wanted them. He said so the other night, and was misrepresented in every paper in London. He said they should soon find themselves left without any suitable terms for expressing their thoughts on such matters. They prayed every year for freedom of speech, but would soon be without any freedom of speech at all. ["Oh, oh!"] He affirmed it. He repeated it. He said they were approaching a time when they should not be permitted a single adjective at all—substantives perhaps! The House was, in fact, becoming a school for teaching the use of substantives, since they must not express their thoughts with the help of adjectives. He said that these publicans were entitled to toleration. They had furnished themselves with liquors to be dispensed to the people of Ireland, according to Act of Parliament, and he asked this honourable Committee whether it was fair or just that they should be deprived of the benefit of their capital? He reiterated that if this Bill had been one to confiscate the property of Messrs. Bass and Allsopp, there was not a Member of that House that would vote for it, except the Home Rule Coercionists.

MR. COURTNEY said, he thought it would be expedient for the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) to accept the Amendment. ["No, no!"] Well, hon. Members should remember that the Bill was a considerable experiment, in the absence of any certainty as to the feelings that would be excited when it came into operation. The hon. Member for Roscommon said he was comparatively indifferent, but that the 1st of October was preferred on the ground that these annual licences were then granted. Was that a substantial ground? Let them take the case of a man renewing his licence in October, with the knowledge that this Bill would come into operation on the following March. It would be optional for him to take out a seven days' licence, knowing that it would be operative for six days only after the Bill came into operation, or he could take out a six days' licence, and so, as it were, bring the Bill into operation at once. He had that option, and there was, therefore, no hardship; and, as there was no hardship, he wished the hon. Member for Roscommon would accept the Amendment.

MR. A. MOORE hoped the hon. Member for Roscommon would not yield to the suggestion made to him. As to the "poor people" on whose behalf an appeal had been made by the hon. and gallant Member for Waterford (Major O'Gorman), he would observe that this Bill had been before the House these three years, and had only been defeated by the most monstrous opposition. If they did not bring it into operation in October, they would make complete confusion throughout the country. It was true, however, that the traders need not be wronged by taking out a seven days' licence.

MR. O'SULLIVAN observed, that he was unable to see any argument in the remarks made against the Amendment. It was perfectly easy to arrange for the taking out of a six days' licence, to expire on the 10th of March. It had been put forward by one or two Members that the opposition to the Bill came from those engaged some way or other in the trade. He did not consider such remarks any argument in favour of the Bill; but as he was engaged in that trade, he wished to say he was neither ashamed or afraid of his business, no more than he was of his opinion or his politics, and he would add that it would be well for England, and for Ireland, too, if all her sons were engaged in some trade or profession, for then they would not have any idle cads living on the industry of honest men. Why could they not have such a six days' licence? When the Bill was passed in 1872, 12 months' time was given to the English trade, and they were now only asking the Committee to give six. He did not think it would be manly in him to see a branch of industry which had been licensed by the House trampled under foot without making some effort to defend it. There was not the least proof that drunkenness prevailed extensively in Ireland on Sundays, and this was not a temperance movement, but a purely Sabbatarian movement. He must press his Amendment, that the Bill should not come into operation before the 10th of March, 1879.

MR. MURPHY wished the Committee to understand that no practical harm could result from the Amendment. No one could refuse to pay the Excise the amount of the licence, and if the Bill came into operation on the 10th of March, as the hon. Member for Limerick suggested, there would be no contention between the Excise authorities and the publicans. He might take out a licence on the 10th of March, and then could not come up again before the 10th of March following; but if he took out a six days' licence, he would not be able to take advantage of the bonâ fide traveller clause at all. No harm could be done, and he would suggest to the hon. Member for Roscommon that he should accept the hon. Member's Amendment.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA thought that if the hon. Member for Roscommon had given his attention to it, he would accept the Amendment, as it really offered a permission to the trader to bring the Bill into operation in his own case as speedily as possible. If he took out a six day licence, he would be in the position of one placed under the Sunday-closing principle from the first moment of his licence beginning to run. If he did not do that, he would have to take out a full seven day licence, and the Act would come into operation when only half the licence had expired, and he would then be practically under a six day licence. It appeared to him that the hon. Member's Amendment gave the trader alternatives which covered the whole ground of the question. He did not wish to exaggerate appearances, but unfavourable signs had been manifested in Ireland with respect to the Bill, which he should be sorry to see realized; but he would warn the House against adopting this measure too suddenly, lest they should drive those whom it affected to form other organizations.

THE O'CONOR DON said, he should not be unwilling, personally, to accept the Amendment, but he did not know how far the opponents of the Bill would be disposed to appreciate this concession; and, moreover, he did not know whether the Attorney General would be willing to approve it from his own point of view.

MR. J. LOWTHER wished to say he could see no objection to the Amendment. It had, he thought, been satisfactorily explained that no practical inconvenience could arise from it.

MR. SULLIVAN remarked, that his hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Murphy), who now supported the Amendment, voted in the Committee for making the Bill come into operation in October.

MR. MURPHY: Yes; but it was the October at the end of the year, not at the beginning. I so voted, because I thought the Bill should not come into operation before the trader had had a fair opportunity of exercising his business during the time for which he had paid his money.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 59 ; Noes 39 : Majority 20. — (Div. List, No. 151.)

Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Major O'Gorman.)

MR. J. LOWTHER appealed to the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Waterford (Major O'Gorman), to allow the clause to pass, after which Progress might be reported.

MR. A. MOORE observed, that there were only two short clauses more, and that the Committee ought not to be brought down again for further discussions.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA thought the promoters of the Bill were pressing his Friends very hard. The Committee should be anxious to avoid unnecessary inconvenience to the poor trader, which had already been referred to. He said, let this clause pass, and then let Progress be reported.

Question put.

The Committee divided: — Ayes 9 ; Noes 77 : Majority 68.—(Div. List, No. 152.)

Clause agreed to.

Clause 8 (Extension of Act).

MR. R. POWER said, there was no one who was more anxious to proceed with this Bill than he was ; but it was most unreasonable that they should be expected to go on with it at that hour of the morning. This clause would raise a most important discussion, and he could not speak upon it in less than an hour and 20 minutes ; and there were many others who were desirous of speaking upon the question. Hon. Members who had so much philanthropy and generosity, and who wished to see this measure adopted in Ireland, were anxious to see its beneficent effects extended to England, and finally to Japan and other places ; and, therefore, they would like to speak upon this clause. His constituents took great interest in this measure. When he was returned for the city of Waterford, there were 13 candidates seeking for that honour. As the day of the contest drew near, they dropped off one by one, and only five went to the poll. Some hon. Member had said that this was not a test question at the last Election ; but he declared most emphatically that, with him and his hon. and gallant Junior, it was made a test question. The representatives of the Sunday Closing Association waited upon them on that occasion, and they also waited upon three other candidates—one of whom was the present Member for the county of Waterford, another the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, and the other had not yet found his way into that distinguished Assembly. Six of the candidates pledged themselves to support Sunday closing, and two said they would give no pledge, but would exercise their own opinion on the question, and these two candidates were returned. The Home Rule Member for the county of Waterford was a candidate on that occasion ; but he was defeated. What did the Sunday closers do ? They issued the following circular to the people of Waterford—

"We have to inform you that, if elected, the following candidates have agreed to support Sunday Closing:—James Delahunty, R. B. Osborne, and Edward Gibson. The Committee much regret that Mr. Power's and Major O'Gorman's replies are not favourable."

He need not remind the Committee what was the just and happy result of that Election. It would not be fair to go into the main question at that late hour. He thought that even the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) could not comprehend so great and important an issue at that time of the morning. [Mr. SULLIVAN: It is quite early.] It was all very well to say "quite early," but he (Mr. R. Power) was positive the hon. and learned Member did not usually keep such late hours. If they were to be kept up till this time of the morning, night after night, they might as well give up going to bed altogether. This was a most unconstitutional proceeding—at all events, it was not good for the constitution—and, therefore, he must insist upon his right, and move that the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Mr. Richard Power.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 23; Noes 57: Majority 34.—(Div. List, No. 153.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Major O'Gorman.)

MR. ASSHETON CROSS did not want to interfere in this matter, but he could not help remarking that they had arrived at a point at which it was impossible to apply this Bill to England. The Preamble said it should apply to Ireland only, and there could be nothing in Clause 8 that they could object to. He therefore hoped that the Committee would not bring the proceedings of this House into discredit, simply by pursuing this course of dividing upon a matter to which they would eventually agree. The Committee also should have some regard for the comfort of hon. Members, and not go on in that way.

MR. SHAW agreed with the right hon. Gentleman. It had been suggested that the clauses should be gone through and the new clauses left for the next occasion. He was told, however, that that proposition would not be accepted; but it was certainly the right way out of the difficulty.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS did not know that there was a doubt about the matter. He put it to the Committee whether that was not a fair compromise, and he certainly understood it had been accepted.

MR. MURPHY understood that the suggestion that had been made was to be accepted; but now, to his surprise, he found that that was not the case. He should again ask the hon. Member for Roscommon, whether, if the 8th clause were passed, he would report Progress, or whether the promoters of the Bill intended to press the Bill further that night?

MR. SULLIVAN thought that was too much. The offer of the compromise had been distinctly refused by the hon. Member for Cork's (Mr. Murphy's) own Friends.

MR. MURPHY remarked, that there was not the slightest warrant for the statement of the hon. and learned Member for Louth. He stated that he (Mr. Murphy) knew that the offer had been refused. The hon. and learned Member should take care how he charged a Member of that House with such a thing. He (Mr. Murphy) never heard that it was rejected, or did he know that it was rejected now. He was surprised to hear the statement of the hon. and learned Member for Louth.

MR. SULLIVAN retorted that the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Murphy) surely must have heard the stentorian voice of the hon. and gallant Member for Waterford, who rejected the offer of compromise.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS wished to recall the compromise to the recollection of the Committee. It was a fair compromise, and his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary agreed with it. He should propose that the Committee take the division on the 8th clause, and then report Progress.

THE O'CONOR DON said, he must recall to the attention of the Home Secretary that when this compromise was proposed it was refused by the hon. and gallant Member for Waterford. Three divisions had been taken since, and yet in none of those divisions did the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary support the proposal which he himself suggested as a reasonable one. That, in his opinion, was unexampled conduct on the part of an Officer of the Crown. The Government had appealed to the promoters of the Bill to accept a compromise, but the Government did not support the proposal. The promoters were, therefore, not in any way bound by the offer. No one felt more than he did the undesirableness of carrying on discussions of this character; but were they to be brought down every night for such discussions. He would ask the Committee whether it was not much better to sit there until they had got rid of the Bill than be dragged down night after night in this way?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON protested that the Government had done its best to facilitate the progress of the Bill.

THE O'CONOR DON meant the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and not the Government.

MR. COGAN did not make the proposal for compromise in concert with the hon. Member for Roscommon, so he was in no way bound by it. He certainly had observed, with great regret, the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

MR. MARK STEWART suggested that, as the Committee had got into a dilemma, it would be best to pass Clause 8, and put the Bill down as the first Order on Friday. That was a fair suggestion.

THE O'CONOR DON would most gladly accept such a proposal, but he thought it was more than he could ask the Government to give him.

MR. P. J. SMYTH did not understand the reflections that had been made on the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. The offer was accepted; but why should they be driven into the necessity of going so often into the division Lobbies? They were brought there night after night, but every proposal made had been rejected by the hon. Member for Roscommon, who now avowed his intention to force the Bill through that night. He appealed to the hon. Member for Roscommon to let the Committee accept the offer of the Home Secretary and report Progress.

MR. SULLIVAN: The compact was, that if the offer were accepted, the opponents of the Bill would withdraw their opposition; but the offer was rejected, and they had taken three divisions since, so that they could not now accept the proposition.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS insisted that what was a fair compromise an hour ago was fair then, and as sensible men they had better accept it.

MR. MELDON supported the compromise. The Government had acted in a most reasonable manner. It was true that the offer had been rejected and three divisions taken; it was a different thing when the Government, to whom they owed something, made such an appeal. If it were necessary, however, to force this Bill through Committee, he would go with the hon. Member for Roscommon.

MR. COLE was a supporter of the Bill, but he thought the suggestion of the Home Secretary was most reasonable. He did not think the Bill ought to be forced through Committee. He was anxious that the Bill should pass;

but there were hon. Members who felt strongly upon it, and it was unfair to press it too much.

THE O'CONOR DON was sorry that when the offer was first made it was not accepted. He should like to say, with reference to the offer that came from the Government, that he hoped the Committee would on the next occasion discuss the new clauses. There really was only one clause of importance in the Bill and that had been disposed of.

MR. P. J. SMYTH hoped no undertaking would be given by the Government. They all claimed the right of free discussion, and that was not to be infringed. A fair proposition had been made, and the hon. Member ought to accept the proposal and not attempt to impose conditions.

MR. O'SULLIVAN had no objection to discuss the new clauses at any reasonable hour; but it was more than unreasonable to press them at this hour of the morning against the wish of a large minority, who deserved some consideration.

THE O'CONOR DON did not feel justified in opposing the proposal of the Government; but, if he reported Progress after passing the 8th clause, they would have a fair claim on the Government to give them an opportunity of bringing the Bill on again at an early day.

THE EASTERN QUESTION—NEGOTIATIONS FOR A CONGRESS.
QUESTION.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL: My Lords, in the absence of my noble Friend Earl Granville, I rise to ask my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can give the House any information as to the progress of the negotiations which have been going on between this country and Russia, and as to the prospects of a Congress?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I am not, at present, able to enter into details as to those negotiations. I can only say, that, within the last few days, the prospects of a Congress being held have materially improved.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE: Your Lordships will, probably, have seen in the newspapers a statement to the effect that Russia insists most positively on the cession of Bessarabia. Now, it appears to me that this is a matter of such intense importance, not merely in reference to the Treaty of San Stefano, but in regard to International Law, and all former Treaties, and the demand is, in itself, so preposterous, that not this country only, but every civilized country in the world, ought to protest against it.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: I rise to Order. I put it to your Lordships, whether a matter of such great importance should be brought forward without Notice?

COMMITTEE (ON SECOND RE-COMMITMENT).

House in Committee (on Second Re-commitment).

Clause 26 (Privy Council to provide for pleuro-pneumonia and foot and mouth disease during transit, &c.).

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET called attention to sub-section 2, which gives power to the Privy Council, by General Order, to make such provision as they may think necessary or expedient, respecting the case of animals found to be affected with pleuro-pneumonia or foot and mouth disease "while in a foreign animals' wharf or foreign animals' quarantine station." He had on the Notice Paper an Amendment proposing to omit from the 5th schedule all provisions relating to quarantine. This sub-section included quarantine. The evidence of competent authorities went to show that the proposal in the sub-section was not desirable, and that, even if it were, it would be impracticable. The evidence of Professor Simonds and of Professor Brown was against these quarantine stations. "If we wanted to propagate disease, there is," they stated, "no better plan than to establish quarantine stations." Last year the Lord President himself admitted that these quarantine stations were hotbeds of disease, and that quarantine was one of the most difficult things in the world to carry into operation. He (the Duke of Somerset) thought that if they wanted to spread the disease all over England, they could not adopt more effectual means than by this system of quarantine. The healthy animals of one importation would be brought into contact with the diseased animals of another importation, and so the disease would be spread abroad in all directions. On the other hand, he believed it would be safer to admit animals from countries free from disease without any quarantine at all. He moved to omit from the clause the words "or foreign animals' quarantine station."

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that he had not changed his opinion since last year. Last year he thought that quarantine of itself would not prevent the introduction and spread of disease—he continued to think so; and, accordingly, he had introduced in this Bill the principle of a compulsory slaughter, at the port of debarkation, of all fat animals imported from abroad. The provisions as to quarantine, therefore, would have but a limited application, and applied chiefly to store cattle which were necessarily intended for removal into the interior, and to animals imported for breeding, which would be very few in number.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, he could discover no reason why store cattle should be admitted into the country, while fat animals were refused to be slaughtered at the port of debarkation. He should support the Amendment of the noble Duke.

Clauses 27 to 32, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 33 (Prohibition of importation, slaughter, or quarantine of foreign animals).

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, he was as anxious as his noble Friend the Lord President for the adoption of all reasonable measures required for the prevention of cattle diseases; for, undoubtedly, those diseases inflicted great loss on the agricultural interests of this country; but he objected to any restrictions that went further than was demanded by the necessities of the case. He thought that in its present shape the Bill did go too far, and he had therefore given Notice of an Amendment to this clause, giving discretionary powers as to slaughter and quarantine to the Privy Council. It was with satisfaction that he saw that, in consequence of a wise recommendation of the Select Committee to which the Bill had been recently referred, Canada and the United States were no longer included among the countries' fat animals, from which on their arrival in this country must be slaughtered at the port of debarkation. Did the compulsory slaughter extend to animals coming from those countries, an important and rapidly increasing trade would be very considerably injured, if not altogether destroyed. As showing this, he might mention that during the first five months of last year the number of live animals imported from Canada and the United States to the port of Liverpool was 1,360. In a somewhat shorter period of time—from the 1st January to the 20th May—this year the number was 5,880. The principle on which his Amendment to this clause proceeded was that adopted in every other part of the Bill, and his object was to have it applied to cattle imported from European countries; while the 33rd clause, as it stood, and the manner in which by its provisions animals from those countries were to be dealt with, were in opposition to that principle. He regretted to see that the discretion at present confided to the Privy Council in this respect was taken away by the present Bill. The principle of the Bill in respect to the home trade and to the trade from the United States and Canada was that of vesting unlimited discretion in the Privy Council—it was only with regard to cattle coming from European countries that the Bill refused any discretion to the Privy Council. He contended that there was no occasion for that. A state of things might have prevailed in foreign countries which would have rendered the exercise of any discretion on the part of the Privy Council, as regarded the slaughter of animals imported, a very difficult matter. The number of diseased animals might be so equally diffused throughout the European countries as to make it difficult to make any difference between one country and another; but he hoped to show that that was not the case, and that there were countries in Europe, the animals exported from which might safely be introduced here without compulsory slaughter. Under the existing law there were five un-scheduled countries—that was to say, countries from which animals might be admitted into this country without slaughter—namely, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Spain, and Portugal. Their Lordships would remember that, in introducing this Bill, his noble Friend the Lord President stated that during the year 1876 there came into this country 11,662 diseased animals out of a total of 1,416,956; but from the five un-scheduled countries there were only 174 diseased animals out of 164,893, the total imported from those countries. Their Lordships had now before them the figures for 1877, which showed that 3,796 diseased animals came in out of 1,357,856 in all, and from the five un-scheduled countries only 15 diseased animals out of a total number of 143,523; and that disease was foot-and-mouth disease, and no other. During the last eight years 620,190 animals had been imported from the un-scheduled countries, and among these there were only three cases of pleuro-pneumonia, and none at all of cattle plague. But he was content to stand on the case of Denmark alone, and he would confine himself to cattle from thence. There had been imported from that country during the last eight years 252,342 animals, of which only 36 were diseased. They were affected by foot-and-mouth disease, and there was not a single case of pleuro-pneumonia. Last year the imports from it were 50,140, of which only eight were diseased. In 1876 there were 57,966 imported, of which none were diseased. He thought, therefore, he might ask their Lordships whether, in the instance of Denmark, there was not an overwhelming case for exemption from the Schedule of dangerous countries. Discretion having been applied to the United States and Canada by the Select Committee, he wished to know why the same principle was not to be applied to Denmark. Certainly, it appeared to him that in the case of such a foreign country as Denmark, the Privy Council might be entrusted with that discretion which the Bill vested in them as regarded the home trade. On a former occasion his noble Friend the Lord President told their Lordships that the compulsory provision in respect of the foreign trade was necessary for the stamping out of the disease. In reply to that, he (the Marquess of Ripon) endeavoured on the second reading to show that the provisions contained in the Bill would not effect that object. He would not go over the evidence he quoted on that occasion; but he would call their Lordships' attention to some evidence which had been given before the Select Committee of that House to which the Bill had been since referred. Professor Simonds, who was examined before that Committee, was the President of the Royal Veterinary College, and was a veterinary surgeon who for years had been connected with the Veterinary Department of the Privy Council. How did he describe the measures which he thought ought to be adopted? He said—

"I think that the movement of all animals should be stopped in counties where the foot-and-mouth disease exists—that is to say, that they should only move by licence in districts or departments which are free from disease. It would be also necessary to suppress fairs and markets and public sales. These are strong measures, but would be the chief measures that we should find absolutely necessary for the purpose of eradicating contagious diseases."

Then, what was Mr. Booth's opinion on the same subject? When that witness was under examination by Mr. W. E. Forster, these questions and answers occurred—

"2,403.—What would you do with the large markets?—If necessary, I should not hesitate to stop them for the time being. There are always sources of meat supply.

"2,404.—Would not that really imply the stoppage of all the large markets?—It does not follow at all.

"2,405.—Take the market at Norwich Hill; supposing that foot-and-mouth disease was in the county of Norfolk—I do not know whether it is or not—do you still think you would have any chance of stamping out the disease if you allowed any cattle to go to Norwich?—If the foot-and-mouth disease broke out in the district of Norfolk, I should stop the market at once.

"2,406.—My object is to find out what would be the inconvenience to the trade generally of these stamping-out regulations, and therefore I want to know what you consider that it would be necessary to do. Do you think it would be enough merely to stop the market when you knew that foot-and-mouth disease was existing?—I should not allow an animal to be moved outside a district in which foot-and-mouth disease was prevalent. I should take a certain large area and then stop the total movement of cattle in that district, as is done in Germany in case of an outbreak of cattle plague."

Before the Select Committee of 1877 on the Cattle Plague and the Importation of Live Stock, Professor Brown suggested certain measures. He said—

"I should make certain alterations in the present system of dealing with these diseases, or I should make a radical change, abandoning the present system altogether, and adopting an entirely new one in its place. First of all, having regard to the existence of these two diseases in this country, I should feel bound to impose very severe restrictions upon the cattle trade. Both in reference to foot-and-mouth disease and pleuro-pneumonia there can, I think, be no question whatever that the infective matter is chiefly conveyed through the movement of diseased and infected animals. Therefore I should be obliged to adopt such a system as would entirely prevent this movement. In order to do that, I should be compelled to divide the whole country into districts, placing each one in charge of an inspector, who would be in constant communication with the central department. Having found all the centres where either disease exists in the district, it would be absolutely essential to prevent the movement of animals from those centres during the continuance of the disease."

The Marquess of Ripon

And Mr. Wilson recommended the internal restrictions so proposed by Professor Brown. He asserted—and he (the Marquess of Ripon) did not think it was denied—that the provisions of this Bill would not stamp out foot-and-mouth disease. But if this were so, the clause which they were now considering was directly in the teeth of the Report of the Committee of 1877, upon which this Bill professed to be founded. The Select Committee on Cattle Plague and Importation of Live Stock, 1877, in their Report said—

“And your Committee are of opinion that no further restrictions should be placed on the importation of foreign animals in respect of foot-and-mouth disease and pleuro-pneumonia, unless at the same time orders be enforced throughout Great Britain that in every district where either pleuro-pneumonia or foot-and-mouth disease exists, and which has been declared by the Privy Council to be infected, all movement of cattle be prohibited except under licence; that fairs and markets be under similar restrictions, and that absolute prohibition of movement be enforced against infected farms for periods varying from two months in pleuro-pneumonia to 28 days in outbreaks of foot-and-mouth disease.”

It was upon this understanding contained in the conclusion of their Report that this Committee consented to impose this very stringent restriction on the foreign trade; but from that understanding the Bill distinctly went back, and he asserted that these provisions were not founded on the Report of the Committee of 1877. He asserted that it was unjust and unreasonable to impose restrictions on the foreign trade when they were not going to impose restrictions on the home trade. What was good for one was equally good for the other. This brought him to his third objection to this Bill. His noble Friend the Lord President, when he introduced this Bill, gave some statistics with respect to the number of cattle existing in this country and the number of cattle imported from abroad; and he instituted a comparison to show how unimportant was the foreign importation. He (the Marquess of Ripon) thought the figures then given were erroneous for the purpose of comparison. His noble Friend took the whole number of cattle existing in this country. Of course, he ought to have compared the number of cattle in the home market for consumption in any one year with the number of animals imported for consumption from abroad. But, be that as it might, he believed he should not be contradicted when he said that a comparatively small restriction on importation of cattle from abroad might lead to a considerable increase in price. His noble Friend himself, with all his official experience, said to their Lordships last year—

“He could give an illustration of the effect of putting a check on the importation of animals into this country. During the six years ending 1869, the country imported from France 112,618 cattle; but in 1870 France was placed in the scheduled countries, which meant that all animals coming from France had to be slaughtered at the port of debarkation or undergo a quarantine; and those restrictions were so stringent, that in the seven years following 1869, the number imported was only 24,095, showing a very great distinction between the two periods.” — [3 Hansard, ccxxxiii. 101.]

He (the Marquess of Ripon) therefore contended that the first effect of this Bill, at all events, must be to raise the price of meat. With regard to the dead meat trade, it was practically in its infancy—it might increase or it might not—its future was altogether a matter of conjecture and uncertainty. He wished to ask whether this was a proper time to try the experiment proposed by this Bill? Trade was bad, wages were low, trade disputes were rife, peace and war were possibly trembling in the balance; and, in his opinion, it could not be wise at such a time to run the risks that would be incurred if this Bill were to pass in its present shape. Next winter might be a hard one; but, if this Bill passed, the noble Duke would be unable to relax the provisions of this Bill if it once passed into law, however high the price of meat might become. And why was it to be done? Why should the people of this country be deprived of 143,000 animals imported into England last year from these unscheduled countries, only 15 of which were found to be diseased? It was said that the object was to promote the interests of the agricultural classes. Well, he belonged to that class himself, but he failed to see how they would be benefited by the Bill. Than the introduction of such a measure he could not conceive a more short-sighted policy with respect to the interests of the agriculturists. If the price of meat rose from any cause after this Bill passed the rise would be attributed to this measure, an agitation would spring up, and thereupon would be serious danger that in the result not only would the provision to which he objected be repealed, but the Privy Council would be deprived of many powers really required for the prevention of disease. It had been shortly alleged against the Bill that it was framed with the view of renewing agricultural protection. The noble Duke opposite, on his own behalf, had repudiated the correctness of that allegation, and he entirely accepted the noble Duke's statement so far as he was personally concerned; but he was not equally clear with regard to the intentions of those who were pushing the noble Duke forward, because he was convinced that the practical effect of this measure would be to establish commercial protection. He desired, especially, to know how the noble Duke was going to defend the interference with the cattle trade of Denmark under the provisions of this Bill? He could not conceive how there could be any adequate justification. Turning to the exact effect which his Amendment would have on the existing law, he had made a great concession to his noble Friend in his Amendment—as the law now stood, free admission of cattle was the rule and slaughter the exception—if his Amendment were accepted, slaughter would be the rule and free admission the exception. He approved the most stringent regulations being made for the prevention of the importation of diseased cattle into this country, and he would leave the noble Duke full liberty to make such terms with foreign countries as would secure the importation into this country of healthy cattle alone. The Government seemed to act on the maxim—Sic volo, sic jubeo, stet pro ratrone voluntas. He hoped they would recede from this position and permit this alteration to be made. He earnestly begged their Lordships to adopt his Amendment, because it was in entire accordance with the general principle which pervaded every part of the Bill with the exception of this single clause, because it would remove from the measure the aspect of protection which it now possessed, and because it would give the Privy Council the most ample powers to prevent the importation of diseased cattle, while it would secure to the great mass of consumers, and especially to the poorest inhabitants of our large towns, the continued and unfettered enjoyment of those supplies of meat which they now derived from countries in Europe free from disease, which on every principle of Free Trade they had a right to claim, and of which it was neither just, nor expedient, nor reasonable to deprive them.

Amendment moved—

Clause 33, page 17, line 15, at end of clause, add—(" Provided that the Privy Council may from time to time, if they think fit, by order or by licence in relation to foreign animals of all or any kinds brought from all or any countries to all or any ports, modify or suspend, subject to such conditions and restrictions as they think fit, the provisions of the said Schedule, relating to slaughter or to quarantine.")—(The Marquess of Ripon.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that, having had so many opportunities of addressing their Lordships on the subject of this Bill, he would confine his remarks on the present occasion within the briefest possible compass. He must, in the first place, deny that this Bill had been framed in the interests of the agriculturists—a more incorrect statement could not be made. Speaking for his Colleagues, as well as for himself, he could say that their object in framing the Bill had been, not to consult the interests of any one class, but the interests of every class in the country. He also denied that the measure had been framed with the view of reverting to the system of protection—though, indeed, his noble Friend had not insinuated that. He regretted that it was entirely out of his power to accept the Amendment proposed by the noble Marquess—it was opposed to the essential spirit of the Bill. The great object of the Bill was the prevention of the importation of disease into the country from abroad; and another object was to stamp out such disease as might exist or arise, without putting undue restrictions upon the trade of the country. This, of course, could not be effected without putting a restriction, to some extent, upon the home trade; and it would be unfair to take such a step without giving a counterbalancing advantage by enacting that cattle imported from abroad should be slaughtered at the port of debarkation,

and that so the danger of disease being imported should be minimized. The Bill was simply an extension of the present system, and he believed that if it were carried, the trade would soon adapt itself to the altered circumstances. The noble Marquess had laid great stress upon the fact that very little diseased cattle had come from certain countries he had mentioned, which countries would be affected by the Bill. But what had been done in this direction had been done because it was felt to be necessary. Only a spark was needed to kindle a great fire, and if infected animals from abroad were allowed to go over the country, they would inevitably spread disease among their own herds. The Government were not, as had been said, going to exclude thousands of animals which might be used for the food of the people. What the Government said to foreign countries was—"Send us as many as you please. But we must slaughter them at the port of landing to prevent the propagation of disease. We do not object to your cattle coming over here. On the contrary, we shall be delighted to receive them on the terms we state." Denmark had been cited by the noble Marquess as a country where disease was rare. Yet in Denmark, from time to time, there had prevailed a considerable amount of disease. Then, again, it was worthy of notice, that Denmark herself had taken the most stringent precautions for keeping out the disease, and so also had other countries. Was England to be the only country that refused to take the necessary precautions? He held that in the cases of Denmark, Spain, Sweden, and Portugal, it would not be safe to allow cattle to be imported without slaughter. Of all the countries mentioned by the noble Marquess, Norway was the only country that was free of disease; but in 1877 only 110 cattle had been imported thence into England. Well, was it worth while endangering our own flocks and herds for such a small result? He thought not. The object of the Bill was to stamp out disease in this country, with as little restriction on trade as possible. Outside the limits where disease existed, trade would be perfectly free. The noble Marquess opposite had said that the precautions would not stamp out the disease; but that was a matter of opinion; and he was happy to be enabled to state to their Lordships that for a long time past there had not been so little cattle disease in the country as during the past 18 months. The assertion that the passing of the Bill would lead to an increase in the price of meat was a mere conjecture—one which he had no doubt would not be justified by the result. He was compelled, therefore, to meet the Amendment of the noble Marquess with a direct negative.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL said, the noble Duke the Lord President declined to accept the proposal, on the ground that his Department would not be able to carry it into effect. This was to distrust himself too much. Only last year, on the alarm of cattle plague, he exercised those very powers with great success. As the amended Bill now stood, he would have to exercise them for the United States and Canada. Why not also for Spain and Portugal, and such continental countries as might be free from all fear of contagion? He had stated his desire not to deal with the foreign trade in a less favourable manner than he did with the home. If that were so, he might well accept the Amendment of his noble Friend, for it did not tend to diminish the power of the Privy Council to deal with cases where disease existed. If the noble Duke did not wish to deal with this matter in an exceptional manner, why did he not accept the Amendment? It would be impossible otherwise to persuade people that the Government were not adopting a policy of protection.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, there should be no mistake as to the question before the House. The object of the Bill was to increase the quantity of food in this country, and so to cheapen its price. For the purpose of doing that, it was absolutely essential that they should give confidence to the producer of food in this country that the investment of his capital would not be made in vain in consequence of the introduction of foreign disease. It was the producer of food in this country who furnished the consumer with some 16-17ths of all that was consumed, and therefore it was the producer of food whose confidence ought to be encouraged, and whose capital must be protected against losses from contagious disease. To produce that confidence, they must have a fixed policy. They all had confidence in his noble Friend the Lord President of the Council; and if they could pass an Act of Parliament that he should live for ever, and hold the Office for ever, no doubt all would be right — there would be no necessity for enacting a fixed policy; but since they could insert neither of these provisions in a Bill, they must take precautions; and, therefore, the policy by which they wished to increase the protection of food in this country must be placed, not at the caprice of any Executive Government that might be in power, but under the sanction of Parliament itself. That was the issue now before the Committee. They ought not to be misled by references to Canada, America, or Ireland. There was no occasion to take precautions against Ireland, for Ireland was going to be placed under the provisions of the Bill, and there was no occasion to take precautions against Canada or America, for they were at such a distance that the voyage itself was a natural guarantee.

THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY said, he should vote with the Government. There were hot-beds of disease abroad, and it was therefore not unwise to leave it to the administrative Government to decide the course to be taken.

VISCOUNT POWERSCOURT also supported the proposal of the Government. No cordon could be drawn which would not sometimes be broken through, and the slaughter of the animals at the ports was better than any cordon. He would vote against the Amendment of the noble Marquess.

Clause 78 (Powers of Lord Lieutenant and Privy Council).

LORD EMLY moved that the clause should be struck out. The administration of the Bill in Ireland would be placed practically in the hands of the Veterinary Department, and evidence given before the Select Committee showed that almost universal dissatisfaction was felt with that Department. It was of the utmost importance that the Bill should be efficiently administered in Ireland as well as in England and Scotland, for laxity in Ireland might involve much more danger to the other parts of the Kingdom than the importation of cattle from Spain and Portugal. There was more danger from imperfect administration in Ireland than from the importation of foreign cattle. If this danger in Ireland were to be avoided, either the Bill must be administered in Ireland by the Lord President, as was done before 1866 — and he thought that the arm of the Lord President, if long enough to reach Cape Ness, was long enough to reach Kerry and Donegal — or else the Veterinary Department of the Irish Privy Council must be considerably strengthened and made as strong as it was in England. One of the most interesting portions of the Report of the Privy Council in England was the Report of the Veterinary Inspector; but the name of Ireland never occurred in his Report, and it was certainly desirable that corresponding in-

THE EARL OF LONGFORD was understood to express his concurrence in the views of the noble Lord.

EARL SPENCER said, the point was one on which he should be glad to hear the opinion of the Executive Government in Ireland. At first sight, it seemed desirable that the whole administration of this law should be under one head; but the separate administration of Ireland rendered it difficult to carry out this view. At the same time, since he was Lord Lieutenant, a very considerable change had been made by constituting Boards of Guardians local authorities under the Act relating to pleuro-pneumonia, and empowering them to act in precisely the same way as local authorities in England. One advantage, probably, in separate administration would be greater rapidity of action than would be possible if it were necessary to refer to London instead of Dublin. He agreed with the noble Lord (Lord Emly), and hoped the noble Duke would do something to strengthen the hands of the Veterinary Department in Ireland.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON was sorry he could not acquiesce in the proposal of the noble Lord (Lord Emly) to strike out the 78th clause. That clause had been inserted after consultation with the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and those competent to advise him. In their opinion it was necessary to the proper working of the Act. There was no new principle involved in the clause which was not inserted for the first time—it was intended merely to carry out the law as it now existed. The noble Lord suggested that the Lord President of the Privy Council in this country should have the powers necessary for carrying the Bill into effect; but he (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) confessed that he did not see his way to accept the charge of carrying out the details of the Bill in Ireland, on account of the many difficulties that must necessarily arise—for instance, the inconvenience of communicating with the Police for the purpose of carrying out the Act, for under such arrangement they would be serving two masters. With regard to the Veterinary Department in Ireland, it was certainly true that it did not present a Report to Parliament, as the Department in England did, and some of the witnesses from Ireland described the Department as unsatisfactory. He would inquire into the matter, and see whether there was any feasible mode of strengthening the Department, so as to enable it to command as much respect in Ireland as the sister Department certainly did in this country.

QUESTIONS.

PARLIAMENT—MEMBERS FOR THE SCOTTISH UNIVERSITIES—EXPENSES OF ELECTION.—QUESTION.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR asked the Lord Advocate, Whether he proposes to introduce a Bill to carry out the recommendations of the University Commissioners to lessen the present excessive expenditure of electing Members of Parliament for the Scottish Universities?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that he was afraid that at that period of the Session the press of Business would absolutely prevent the Government from taking up the question.

NAVY—H.M.S. "BEAGLE"—EXECUTION OF A NATIVE AT TANNA—JUDICIAL POWERS OF NAVAL COMMANDERS.

QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention has been called to a Despatch addressed to the Commodore on the Australian station by Mr. Consul Layard, dated Noumea, May 14th, 1877, in which the latter states that he recommended, in the case of the alleged murder at Tanna, that the murderer should be required from the tribe and hung at the yard-arm of a British vessel of war; and, under what instructions from the Foreign Office a British Consul is empowered to advise the execution of natives in the Pacific?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, the attention of the Government has been called to the despatch in question. No instructions have been issued from the Foreign Office empowering British Consuls to advise the execution of Natives in the Pacific. We do not understand the passage alluded to by the hon. Baronet to mean that Mr. Consul Layard gave advice to Lieutenant Caffin as to executing a convicted murderer. Mr. Consul Layard certainly did express an opinion to that effect in the despatch alluded to, which was addressed to the Commodore on the Australian Station and not to the Lieutenant, who carried out the orders of the Commodore. Whether the advice was given or not, there is no ground for thinking that if the advice was given it was erroneous in point of law.

POST OFFICE—UNITED STATES TELEGRAPH SYSTEM.—QUESTION.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR asked the Postmaster General, When the Report of the two officers of the Postal Telegraph Service sent to America last year to in-investigate and report upon the Telegraph system of the United States will be printed?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: Sir, the Report in question is of a confidential character, and one which it is not intended to print and circulate. The information contained in it was supplied by private telegraph companies in America with the understanding that it would not be made public.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—PAUPER CHILDREN IN CORK INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS.

QUESTIONS.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a case which came before the magistrates at Cork on the 17th instant as regards the detention of two children, brother and sister, named O'Brien, at present in the Industrial Schools at Cork, at Marble Hill and Union Quay, by which it appears that their mother and step-father, being in a position to support said children, applied to the Right honourable Gentleman for their discharge, pursuant to the 33rd section of the 31 and 32 Vic. c. 25, and were refused; and to ask the grounds of such refusal, and why the ratepayers and Exchequer should be still burthened with their support while their natural and legal guardians are willing to support them?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, my attention has been called to this matter, and I am informed that the applications to which the hon. Gentleman refers were sent, according to the usual practice, to the Inspector of Industrial Schools for his Report. After consultation with the managers of the schools, the Inspector reported that, in his opinion, it would be detrimental to the future welfare of the children if they were to be prematurely discharged. He also said that it was evident that the object of the mother and stepfather in making the application was to escape their payment of a contribution towards the maintenance of the children. Under these circumstances the application was refused.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING: Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he has any objection to furnish a copy of the Report?

MR. J. LOWTHER: If the hon. Gentleman gives Notice of this Question I will consider the matter.

QUESTION.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether Captains in the Army serving in India, who may complete twenty years' service (from the date of attaining twenty years of age), and who consequently become ineligible for promotion under the Royal Warrant of 13th August 1877, will, under the provisions of Clause 92, Army Circular, 1st May 1878, be compelled to defray the cost of their passages to England and that of their successors to India, thereby being deprived of nearly a year's income on retirement, although practically they will be compulsorily retired, inasmuch as they are debarred from further promotion; and, whether, if this be the existing regulation, he will be so good as to give the matter his favourable consideration, with a view to its revision?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, in answer to the hon. and gallant Gentleman I may say that the officers will not be required to make the payments referred to. The regulations at present are not quite clear; but I hope that in a short time they will be amended, so as to make them distinct. It may, perhaps, be necessary to consult the India Office on the subject.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS—POST-MORTEM EXAMINATIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he is aware that some uncertainty and consequent anxiety exists in regard to the Law and practice of holding post mortem examinations upon the bodies of persons dying in lunatic asylums; and, if he would consider the desirability of issuing some authoritative memorandum indicating the conditions on which such examinations are by Law enforced or permitted?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he had been in communication with the Lunacy Commissioners on the subject, and they had informed him that their opinion with respect to it was very strongly expressed in a Report which they had presented in 1870, and also in the evidence given by Lord Shaftesbury before the Select Committee of that House last Session. If, after looking at that Report and the evidence, the hon. Gentleman wished to put any further Questions, he should be happy to make additional inquiries.

SALE OF FOOD AND DRUGS ACT—SALE OF SPIRITS UNDER PROOF.

QUESTION.

SIR FREDERICK PERKINS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been directed to the prosecutions which have been instituted in various parts of the country against licensed victuallers for vending spirits of different degrees of strength under-proof, and the conflicting decisions which have been arrived at by local justices thereon; and, whether, considering the uncertainty which prevails upon the matter, he is prepared to consider the subject with a view to the fixing of a specific standard of under-proof at which spirits, and especially gin, can be retailed without any actual or implied infringement of the Food and Drugs Act?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: Sir, the attention of the Government has from time to time been directed to the prosecutions which have been instituted against licensed victuallers for selling spirits of different degrees of strength under proof. The policy of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act was to leave it to the local tribunals to give decisions in accordance with the evidence in each case; and, in order to provide against the inconvenience which might result from varying views among the locally-appointed analysts, it was provided that the opinion of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue might be taken in disputed cases. I have no reason to doubt that in course of time, by this means, and by the decisions of the High Court of Justice on typical cases brought before them on appeal, greater uniformity of procedure will be arrived at. Meanwhile, I may say that the statements and facts submitted to me tend to show that there is a natural process of deterioration in the strength of spirits by lapse of time, which should caution local authorities against the institution of proceedings in doubtful cases, and that there is a margin between the degree of about 17 per cent under proof, which may be taken to be the figure at which spirits are delivered over to the licensed victuallers, and the point or points at which the Superior Courts have supported convictions within which at present some uncertainty must be admitted to exist. There are difficulties in the way of fixing a specific standard, and Parliament has not thought it proper to insert any such in the Act; but means are provided by which, in doubtful cases, retailers of these articles can protect themselves from prosecution, either by retailing under warranty or by labelling the article sold as of a particular degree of strength below proof.

INDIA—THE RECENT FAMINE.

QUESTION.

MR. B. POTTER asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether his attention has been drawn to a statement in the "Times" of the 15th instant, said to be based mainly on official data, to the effect that the mortality caused by the recent famine in the Madras and Bombay Presidencies and Mysore is not far short of six millions; and, whether the Government is in possession of any information tending to confirm or disprove said statement?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Yes, Sir, my attention has been called to the statement alluded to. The Returns which we have at present received from India are very imperfect, and by quoting them I might run the risk of misleading the House; but as soon as we are in possession of fuller information it shall be laid on the Table of the House. The Returns disclose, I regret to say, a very lamentable loss of life; but, so far as they go, they do not lead us to suppose that the mortality at all approached to that stated by the Correspondent of The Times. I would point out that the diminution of population, whatever it may be, is due not only to mortality, but to a very large emigration of people who have left the distressed districts in search of work or sustenance.

ARMY (INDIA)—THE 31st NATIVE
INFANTRY.—QUESTION.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he is aware that, as stated in the "Calcutta Englishman" of the 25th ult., a body of soldiers of the 31st Native Infantry, stationed at Cawnpore, under orders for Malta, flung aside their accoutrements in the presence of their Commanding Officer, and demanded to be allowed to share the imprisonment of some of their comrades already under arrest; whether the mutineers insisted upon the recall of a Native Subahdar, who had been removed from their command; and, whether it is true that the Native officer in question was immediately restored to the command demanded for him by the insubordinate soldiers, and that the arrested mutineers were released without delay?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, we have received no official information on the subject. There appears to be no reason for attaching any importance whatever to those proceedings.

—THE INDIAN CONTINGENT—EXPENSES.—QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, as the consent of the Council of the Secretary of State for India was not obtained before the expenses of moving the Indian troops to Malta were defrayed out of Indian revenues, he will explain to the House by what authority this expenditure was sanctioned, when it is provided by the 41st section of the Government of India Act of 1858 that the expenditure of the revenues of India, both in India and elsewhere, shall be subject to the control of the Secretary of State in Council, and no grant or appropriation of such revenues, or of any other property coming into the possession of the Secretary of State in Council by virtue of this Act, shall be made without the concurrence of a majority of votes at a meeting of the Council?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, there has been no appropriation of the revenues of India for this purpose, but simply an advance on account for services rendered to the Imperial Government. Consequently, no case has arisen such as is indicated in the Question of the hon. Member.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) BILL.

MR. MARK STEWART asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When the Government propose to take the Education (Scotland) Bill as a first Order of the Day; and, whether, in the event of his being unable to name a day before the Whitsuntide Recess, he can do so after that date?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, it would certainly not be in the power of the Government to fix any day before the Whitsuntide Recess when this Bill could be a first Order, and I am not able to say when we can take it after the Recess. As the Bill has already passed the House of Lords, there will, I think, be ample time to proceed with it before the end of the Session.

INDO-EUROPEAN TROOPS IN MALTA.
QUESTION.

MAJOR NOLAN asked the Under Secretary of State for India, What allowances in quarters, rations, money, or otherwise, are the wives and children of the European soldiers ordered from India to Malta receiving at present?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, while they remain in India they receive free quarters and subsistence allowance; if of European, or, in some cases, of mixed descent, at eight rupees a month; if otherwise, at six and a-half rupees a month; their children, under 16, at two and a-half rupees a month. The wives and children receive, in addition, half and quarter rations, respectively, free.

THE WAGES QUESTION—SHEFFIELD
MAGISTRATES.—QUESTIONS.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been drawn to a paragraph in the "Sheffield Telegraph" of the 23rd instant, relating to the manner in which witnesses were examined before the magistrates; if he has any reason to consider those statements well founded; and, if there is any cause for his interference? Also, Whether the statement in the "Sheffield Telegraph" of the 23rd instant is well founded, that of four magistrates trying cases arising out of disputes between employers and employed, two were cotton manufacturers, and that the two other magistrates were old and infirm; and, if so, whether the court might not be otherwise constituted?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, if I had received the smallest complaint from the district where this is supposed to have occurred, or a request that an inquiry should be made into it, I should have made one at once; but I do not feel called upon, upon complaints made in any article written in any country newspaper, to make inquiries into the conduct of magistrates. However, before coming down to the House I made inquiry at the Home Office, and I find that no complaints whatever had reached me from the district referred to.

TRAMWAYS—USE OF MECHANICAL POWER.—QUESTION.

MR. WHEELHOUSE asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether any facilities, and if so, what, are proposed to be given in those cases where Bills have been dropped in previous Sessions relating to the use of power on tramways other than animal, and whether the matter of such Bills can be dealt with during the present Session of Parliament, either by enlarging the scope of the Committee now sitting on that subject, or by separate Bill, or in some other way?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, in answer to my hon. and learned Friend, I beg to say that there does not appear to me to be any necessity for enlarging the powers of the Committee to whom all Bills of this Session relative to the use of mechanical power upon tramways have been referred, as the Committee have prepared clauses and regulations upon the subject, which they will insert in all the Bills and Provisional Orders, which clauses will afford facilities for the settlement of the question. These clauses and regulations could only be made applicable to Tramway Acts and Orders of previous Sessions by a general measure; and I do not think that in the present state of Public Business it would be possible to legislate—supposing we considered such legislation desirable—in the matter this year.

POSTPONEMENT OF MOTION. QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN asked the hon. Member for Hackney, Whether it was his intention to proceed to-night with the Motion of which he had given Notice in reference to the movement of the Indian troops?

MR. FAWCETT could assure the hon. Member and the House that he was most anxious to call attention to the very important financial question raised; but he understood his hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) intended to proceed with his Motion first. Therefore, he (Mr. Fawcett) would be precluded from going to a division; and as he did not wish simply to move his Resolution, but desired to have the vote of the House upon it, he was compelled to postpone it for the present. If no earlier opportunity presented, he would move it on the Indian Budget.

TURKEY—THE EASTERN QUESTION—THE CONGRESS.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he is yet in a position to give the House any information as to the negotiations which are stated to have been recently in progress and the prospect of an early assembly of the Congress?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am not yet in a position to give any detailed information upon the subject; but I may say, within the last few days, the prospects of a Congress have materially improved.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

COST OF THE INDIAN TROOPS.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL, in moving for a Select Committee to inquire into the cost, direct and indirect, of Her Majesty's Indian Troops serving beyond the old Indian limits east of the Cape of Good Hope, said, he did not design the Motion to be one hostile to the Government at the present stage of events. Though no one felt more deeply than he the wound that had been inflicted upon the Constitution by bringing over those troops without the consent of Parliament, yet he considered that the case might be made the best of, and that a sort of ex post facto sanction might be obtained for it in the shape of a Vote in Supply for 7,000 men. He had declined to give way to the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), because he could not concur in his Motion, the direct effect of which would be to raise an Indian financial debate at an inopportune moment. Also, as regarded the strength of the Indian Army, he differed from the hon. Member for Hackney. The hon. Member's Motion was not logical, for it did not follow, because 7,000 troops had been moved from India to Malta, that the Army of India was too large. They must always have a Force ready for an emergency, and when that emergency arose they might well receive some aid from the Indian troops, just as India, in an emergency, had the aid of British troops. His objection went more to the manner in which they had been used. He thought that the result of a further inquiry on this subject would be more favourable to the use of these Indian troops than was the Report of Colonel Anson's Committee which sat upon the question in 1867. That Committee was presided over by no less a person than the present Marquess of Salisbury; and its Members reported that, in regard to the military and political aspect of the matter, the highest authorities were very much—it might be said hopelessly—divided, but that with reference to the financial aspect of the question authorities were agreed that there would be no saving by the employment of Indian troops in garrisons other than in India. At that time the Mutiny of 1857 was fresh in men's memories, and there was much prejudice against Sepoys. Major-General Hodson, for instance, could imagine nothing more "suicidal," because the presence of Sepoy troops anywhere must lead to murder and bloodshed. He believed, however, that the result of a further inquiry at the present time would be more favourable to the character of Native troops. He was convinced that a great change in the Native Army had occurred since the Report of that Committee was made, and his object in proposing the present Motion was that the Report itself should be supplemented, modernized, and brought down to the present day. He believed that the days of the Indian Mutiny had gone by; that their Native Indian troops had very much improved; and that they were good and faithful subjects of Her Majesty. Since 1867 the short-service system and the Army Reserve had been introduced. A great difficulty of short service was the large amount of foreign service which their troops were compelled to undergo; and therefore he thought the Government would welcome any measure which would relieve them of a considerable amount of such service with safety and advantage to the State. As to the financial view of the question, if the objections which were found to exist in 1867 to the employment of these troops should now be found not to be insuperable he should be very favourably inclined to the experiment of trying, to a certain extent, the use of Indian troops in order to relieve some of their British soldiers at certain stations. His impression was that a measure of that kind would be good both for their Indian troops and for their own troops; and that the employment of a limited number of the former in the way he had indicated would improve their discipline and render them more available in case a great emergency should arise—which God forbid!—when Her Majesty's Government would have to draw upon Indian soldiers to a larger extent than they had done at present. In connection with the question of finance, he had said that Indian troops serving out of India received larger pay and allowances than British soldiers, and the discrepancy was still greater in the pay of the officers. On that point it would be desirable to have some inquiry. He was inclined to think that at present the officers of Her Majesty's Indian Army were somewhat overpaid, and if they would avoid extravagance some alteration in the rate of pay must be made. The practice of giving civil employment to officers in India tended very much to detract from the efficiency of the Staff Corps in that country, and led also to the high pay which the officers received. The remuneration in civil employment was so great that it was found necessary to raise the pay of the officers of the Native Army, that they might not be tempted away. It was impossible to increase the number of those officers as

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, if I had received the smallest complaint from the district where this is supposed to have occurred, or a request that an inquiry should be made into it, I should have made one at once; but I do not feel called upon, upon complaints made in any article written in any country newspaper, to make inquiries into the conduct of magistrates. ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL, in moving for a Select Committee to inquire into the cost, direct and indirect, of Her Majesty's Indian Troops serving beyond the old Indian limits east of the Cape of Good Hope, said, he did not design the Motion to be one hostile to the Government at the present stage of events. Though no one felt more deeply than he the wound that had less, was one rather of a speculative character, and pointing rather to what might be done under certain circumstances than dealing with the actual facts. Now, accepting the facts as they now stood, it seemed to have become very expedient to inquire most carefully into that matter, to see where faults might have occurred, and what remedies could be proposed, and, above all, to weigh very carefully the financial effect of the measure and its indirect effects on the other Estimates of the year. The Committee, which was moved for by his late lamented Friend (Colonel Anson), examined into that subject very generally. It was appointed, if he recollected rightly owing to a Report that was made by a Committee which sat in a previous year, and which dealt with the case of China, in which a very remarkable mortality of European troops had occurred. That brought the matter prominently before the notice of the House; and, taking advantage of it, his late hon. and gallant Friend thought the time had come for endeavouring to obtain from this country the assent to a more general employment of Native troops out of India. Well, that Committee examined the question of employing those troops rather as a matter of every-day necessity than in the mode at present proposed to the House; and it undoubtedly intended that they should, in the first instance, be employed mainly in climates where it was not desirable to employ Europeans. That might have given the Report of the Committee a bias in a particular direction, and the circumstances were now so far different that there might be points upon which further inquiry had become necessary, and where a Committee, carefully selected, might present a Report that would prove of value to the country. He had, indeed, so far anticipated the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), that he had intended, as soon as the fact had been ascertained of all those troops having arrived at Malta, and the arrangements had been fully carried out, that a Departmental Committee should be appointed to examine very much the same question, and to see where shortcomings and defects had arisen, whether the arrangements as to employing European and Native troops, or as to employing both together, required modification, and, in fact, to bring all the knowledge that was required on the subject up to the present day. He thought that matters of detail could be more properly dealt with later in the evening; but while he conveyed, on the part of the Government, their assent to the appointment of that Committee, it became his duty to say that he did so mainly in the direction indicated by the hon. Member's proposal as it stood on the Notice Paper—namely—

The hon. Gentleman had argued some of the questions of which he spoke with reference to a very much wider range of subjects, and appeared to consider many matters that were not strictly included in the terms of his Resolution. As to the whole organization of the Native Indian Army, that was a question which itself would occupy a Committee for a considerable time, and it was hardly one which could be tacked on to an inquiry which, in the first instance, was evidently directed to another point. In the same way, the operation of the Staff Corps rules, he submitted, were rather subjects for an inquiry apart from the question of the employment of those troops at home, and still more would the question of the civil employment of officers in India form no proper part of the inquiry before that Committee. It was not only undesirable that the scope of that inquiry should be made too wide, but he would point out that if the field were made so diverse, it would be impossible to present the recommendations in such time that practical effect could be given to them. One lived long enough to be surprised at nothing; but, considering what had recently occurred, he confessed his surprise at hearing the hon. Member absolutely propose that the Indian troops should serve not only at Malta and Gibraltar, but that they should actually be brought nearer home. However desirable that might be from the hon. Gentleman's point of view, that was a hypothetical question which he preferred to put aside for the present; and all he would do was to join him in saying that it could only be done with the distinct assent of Parliament. Though it was his duty to demur to the form of the Amendment, the Government were willing, in substance, to agree to the Motion for a Select Committee.

long as their pay was so abnormally high, though, for his part, he believed the number of officers was already large enough. He wished that they should ascertain from the proposed inquiry whether for normal purposes, and as a rule, they could employ some of those Indian troops in their foreign stations; whether such employment was so successful as to justify a farther use of such troops; and, thirdly, if in time of great need they were driven to resort to India for an increase of their military strength, they could do so with advantage? He admitted, without putting faith in the gushing accounts they had seen, that so far the experiment had been successful. The troops had come forward willingly, without difficulty or demur, no doubt influenced by the high pay and allowances. As regarded the character of the troops, some people appeared inclined to talk of them as if they were extremely wild and savage men, whom it would be difficult to keep in order. He had no fears on that score. Their present Indian soldiers were taken from the plough, and, as far as regarded order, might be trusted to serve in any part of Her Majesty's Dominions. He was no military man, but he had an intimate knowledge of the Indian troops; and he asserted, without fear of contradiction, that they were quiet, orderly, and easily managed. He thought something might be done for the relief of British soldiers by employing Indian troops in unhealthy stations; but, if they were so employed, it would not be fair to give them all the bad and none of the good. He would suggest that they might bring a few of the Native Indian troops home, in order that we might see them and that they might see us. He believed that contact with those troops would remove many of the prejudices entertained in this country; that when they knew them better they would find that they were not semi-savages, as some had supposed, but orderly, pleasant, and good-natured people, and that we should like them pretty well, while they in turn would like us. He would not employ them for real duty in this country; but if an honorary detachment of those troops were brought to do duty at Aldershot and to attend Her Majesty, the Constitutional difficulty might be overcome provided only the Government would condescend to get the authority of Parliament for a measure of that kind. When they became better acquainted with those troops he thought they would take a more favourable view of them. In regard to the financial aspect of the question—how it was proposed to raise the money by which the Vote was to be met—he was afraid, from the statements which had dropped from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that it was not proposed to raise it, but to borrow it. The present Estimate amounted to £750,000; but he did not doubt that the other charges not yet brought into the account would bring the amount up to £1,000,000, or more; and he thought the right hon. Gentleman would do well to recast his Budget, and raise more money by taxation.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the cost, direct and indirect, of Her Majesty's Indian Troops serving beyond the old Indian limits east of the Cape of Good Hope,"—

COLONEL STANLEY said, it was unnecessary for him to trespass long on the time of the House, for on an examination of the Resolution which the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy had moved, it seemed to him that there was very much to which the Government could agree. And although, in point of form, it might be necessary to demur to and to negative that Resolution as an Amendment on going into Supply, he was prepared, subject to certain reservations, to grant the greater portion of what the hon. Member proposed. The hon. Gentleman had pointed out, with great truth, that, as the Report of the Committee of that House, which sat about 11 years ago, under the Presidency of his noble Friend then Viscount Cranborne, referred to a date now considerably remote, some revision might now have become requisite in the terms under which those troops might be employed. Moreover, however carefully that Committee might have examined that question, and whatever might have been the value of the evidence it took, its Report, nevertheless, was one rather of a speculative character, and pointing rather to what might be done under certain circumstances than dealing with the actual facts. Now, accepting the facts as they now stood, it seemed to have become very expedient to inquire most carefully into that matter, to see where faults might have occurred, and what remedies could be proposed, and, above all, to weigh very carefully the financial effect of the measure and its indirect effects on the other Estimates of the year. The Committee, which was moved for by his late lamented Friend (Colonel Anson), examined into that subject very generally. It was appointed, if he recollected rightly owing to a Report that was made by a Committee which sat in a previous year, and which dealt with the case of China, in which a very remarkable mortality of European troops had occurred. That brought the matter prominently before the notice of the House; and, taking advantage of it, his late hon. and gallant Friend thought the time had come for endeavouring to obtain from this country the assent to a more general employment of Native troops out of India. Well, that Committee examined the question of employing those troops rather as a matter of every-day necessity than in the mode at present proposed to the House; and it undoubtedly intended that they should, in the first instance, be employed mainly in climates where it was not desirable to employ Europeans. That might have given the Report of the Committee a bias in a particular direction, and the circumstances were now so far different that there might be points upon which further inquiry had become necessary, and where a Committee, carefully selected, might present a Report that would prove of value to the country. He had, indeed, so far anticipated the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), that he had intended, as soon as the fact had been ascertained of all those troops having arrived at Malta, and the arrangements had been fully carried out, that a Departmental Committee should be appointed to examine very much the same question, and to see where shortcomings and defects had arisen, whether the arrangements as to employing European and Native troops, or as to employing both together, required modification, and, in fact, to bring all the knowledge that was required on the subject up to the present day. He thought that matters of detail could be more properly dealt with later in the evening; but while he conveyed, on the part of the Government, their assent to the appointment of that Committee, it became his duty to say that he did so mainly in the direction indicated by the hon. Member's proposal as it stood on the Notice Paper—namely—

The hon. Gentleman had argued some of the questions of which he spoke with reference to a very much wider range of subjects, and appeared to consider many matters that were not strictly included in the terms of his Resolution. As to the whole organization of the Native Indian Army, that was a question which itself would occupy a Committee for a considerable time, and it was hardly one which could be tacked on to an inquiry which, in the first instance, was evidently directed to another point. In the same way, the operation of the Staff Corps rules, he submitted, were rather subjects for an inquiry apart from the question of the employment of those troops at home, and still more would the question of the civil employment of officers in India form no proper part of the inquiry before that Committee. It was not only undesirable that the scope of that inquiry should be made too wide, but he would point out that if the field were made so diverse, it would be impossible to present the recommendations in such time that practical effect could be given to them. One lived long enough to be surprised at nothing; but, considering what had recently occurred, he confessed his surprise at hearing the hon. Member absolutely propose that the Indian troops should serve not only at Malta and Gibraltar, but that they should actually be brought nearer home. However desirable that might be from the hon. Gentleman's point of view, that was a hypothetical question which he preferred to put aside for the present; and all he would do was to join him in saying that it could only be done with the distinct assent of Parliament. Though it was his duty to demur to the form of the Amendment, the Government were willing, in substance, to agree to the Motion for a Select Committee.

He thought it necessary to point out that the Committee could not be appointed for some little time, as most of the information already received as to the financial and commissariat arrangements had come by telegraph. No doubt, when the troops had arrived at Malta, there would be numerous small questions to be adjusted which were not as yet before the House; and, after their arrival, it would be necessary for them to settle down before an inquiry could be conducted satisfactorily. He would not refuse an inquiry, though he was obliged to oppose an Amendment to the Motion for going into Supply.

MR. C. BECKETT-DENISON said, he was glad that the Government had thought fit to accept the proposal for the appointment of a Committee, because he believed that the ground of investigation was of great importance to the future military power of this country. He was one of those who hoped to see Parliament elaborate a system by which the Indian Army might become for Imperial purposes more generally useful than it was now; but it was impossible that this could be brought about so long as the enormous discrepancies now existing between the pay of the Indian Army and that of the British Army were allowed to continue. They had always adopted the principle of paying European officers highly—he would not say too highly—for service in India, and they had also admitted the principle that when the Indian regiments were expatriated they also should receive extra pay. He believed a great deal of the enthusiasm recently shown by the regiments for foreign service was intimately connected with the extra pay which they would receive; but what could not be permitted to endure was their employment, with great variations of pay, in the various ranks of the Service. Possibly the Committee that was about to be appointed would be able to devise some remedy. He trusted the proposed Committee might be able to propose such a scheme as would make general service on the part of the Indian troops out of India not the exception, but the rule, and that in these days of speedy communications India would be reckoned, not as bounded by its own narrow limits, but as an integral part of Her Majesty's Dominions, sharing the joys, sorrows, and glories of the Empire.

He believed that the recent discussion on this subject would help to clear away many prejudices against the employment of Native troops.

MR. HAYTER said, that as a Member of Colonel Anson's Committee, he wished to remind the House of the terms of Reference to that Committee. He confessed he had heard with considerable surprise the announcement of the Secretary for War that within 10 years he had thought it necessary to appoint another Committee on this subject. It was the intention of Colonel Anson, in moving for this Committee, to inquire into the duties performed by the British Army in India and the Colonies, with the view of ascertaining how far it was desirable to employ certain portions of Her Majesty's Indian Army in Colonial service, or to organize a Force of Native troops for general service in European climates. Colonel Anson himself thought the first question indicated by the terms of Reference was too large for the Committee to enter upon; and the first paragraph of the Report, written by its Chairman, Lord Salisbury, showed the necessity for limiting the terms of Reference. That paragraph was to the effect, that the Committee had thought it best to limit their inquiry to the consideration of the duties of the British Army in India, so far only as they affected the Native troops; and their inquiry had no reference, as the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) had said, to the employment of these troops in unhealthy places. Much of the evidence also taken by the Committee related to the transport of Indian troops to Malta and Gibraltar; and one of the principal questions was, both how they were likely to be received in those fortresses, and what would be the expense to this country of garrisoning them with Indian troops. The main objection to the proposal was the great expense which would be involved in their transport and pay; that was the point at issue now, and the House would have to decide whether the objects proposed by the Government could not have been effected at a less cost by the employment of White regiments taken from the Mediterranean garrisons. As for the proposal to bring any of the Natives to this country, there were many objections to that course, specially the fear of blood feuds, the Properly officered, they might be fairly matched against any troops that were likely to be brought against them. He dissented, however, from the views of those who wished to see any portion of those troops as an organized body introduced into this country. If any advantages were to be derived from the movement they were political, and he would not say one word to diminish their effect. As Malta was an island, and England was an island, the Native officers might form their opinion of England from Malta alone; and he thought, therefore, that the suggestion of his hon. Friend behind him, that some of those troops—selected officers only—before their return to India—which he hoped would be in a few months—should be brought over here, so that they might carry away with them a proper idea of the power of this country. That idea might, if acted upon in a judicious way, be productive of advantage.

MR. A. MILLS said, he believed the result of any inquiry would be to show that the employment of Indian troops might be carried out with advantage to this country. Under the present system, anomalies and inequalities existed between officers of the Indian Army and those who commanded regiments not serving in India, which gave rise to much dissatisfaction; and he hoped that any official investigation would have the effect of putting an end to them. He trusted, also, that the inquiry would result in giving direct encouragement to a policy which, if not financially objectionable, was, in his opinion, politically most desirable—that which would draw, in case of need, upon our Indian troops for Imperial purposes, thus reminding them that they were part of one great Imperial Army, and members of one nation.

MR. CHILDERS said, he did not clearly apprehend how much of the question it was proposed to refer to the Committee. The Committee of 1867 had dealt with the whole subject both in its political and financial bearings, and their inquiry, which had lasted over a whole Session, had been of a most exhaustive character. No point was left untouched in the inquiry, as far as the employment of the Indian troops out of India was concerned. The Committee dealt with the subject under several heads—first, the question of pay; second, the difficulty of using Indian troops side by side with British; third, the cost of providing the kind of food to which they were accustomed; and, fourth, the comparative value of the British soldier and the Sepoy; and the conclusion they arrived at was that it would be “unwise to make any considerable change in the direction proposed;” but that in certain Colonies where sanitary conditions were unfavourable to Englishmen, Indian troops might be used by way of experiment. He fully admitted that since 1867 circumstances had greatly changed—the Suez Canal, for instance, had been opened, and the telegraphic system had been extended; but he confessed he had great difficulty indeed in seeing the precise points which the Secretary for War considered as requiring fresh elucidation. However, if undertaken, it ought to be conducted in the most thorough manner, and the terms of Reference ought to be stated with extreme precision, that no room might be left for doubt as to the duties of the Committee.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that after the concession which had been made by the Secretary of State for War, he should wish to withdraw his Amendment. [“No, no!”]

THE EASTERN QUESTION—POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT—THE INDIAN CONTINGENT.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. RYLANDS: I am pleased to find the discussion on the Amendment has come to an end. When I was called to Order I was speaking of the fact of the important intelligence that the meeting of Congress is more probable than it was a few weeks ago, and that there are expectations that the peace of Europe will not be further disturbed. I am bound to say I do not think the fact that so far the Government have been successful in preserving peace is any reason why we should not be in a position to discuss with perfect freedom the question before us. The Government have been playing a game of great risk and for very high stakes; and, unfortunately, whatever the result may be, the interests of this country must be damaged and we must suffer considerable loss. I will not anticipate war; but if that had been the result, who can doubt the untold calamity and suffering which would have fallen upon the country? However popular such a war might have been among the "Jingo" party, if we had been brought into war by the course pursued by the Government, the pages of history would have condemned that course as discreditable, and the war as infamous. But I hope there will be peace, and that the expectations expressed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be justified. If there is peace, no doubt we shall be told by the Government, and by those who give the Government their support, that this follows as the result of the Government policy. But we hold a directly contrary opinion. We believe that this policy of demonstration and menace, so far from tending to bring about a peaceful solution of the difficulties, was a dangerous policy, and might have led to the worst results. Is it not possible for you to see that in negotiations carried on between nations or between Governments there must be something of human nature, and that you must treat Governments as individuals?—and is it not possible to see that if you treat a great people with distrust and menace, you will excite on their part the same feelings of mistrust, and a suspicion that you are actuated by other motives, and have other objects in view than those you avow? From information received from Russia, I know there was no confidence amongst the Russian people in the declarations of Her Majesty's Government, and the idea got abroad that they were determined on war, and that no concessions would prevent a war. In this state of feeling a very little would have led to war. This is our contention—that the Government, by a temperate, firm course, without these warlike demonstrations, would have secured all that they have secured, supposing the Congress meets. We do not believe it was necessary to bring these troops from India, or to make military demonstrations to secure that the voice of England should be heard. It is difficult to meet the proposal of the Government. They not only refuse to give us information, but they do this—they give us, in reference to their measures, certain information, and in a short time this information is found to be incorrect; so that they either tell us nothing, or they tell something not correct. I am sorry to observe the Home

Secretary is not in his place; but I suppose the Chancellor of the Exchequer can give us information on an important point, to which I must direct attention. I have said the Government do not give us any information, or they give us information which is incorrect. They have gone further. They acknowledge that in a very important decision they have taken in regard to Government policy, they were influenced by information afterwards proved to be false. That is a statement to which I would call the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Home Secretary gave us this information in distinct terms; and in regard to this movement of Indian troops to Malta, and to our complaint of their taking that decided step in secrecy, the Home Secretary said—

"We had received certain information from a high authority, which has since, happily, turned out untrue. No one was more glad of that than myself; but there were rumours, which came from such an authority, that we were bound to pay respect to them."—[See ante, 501.]

He rests the case upon these rumours, which happily turned out untrue. I suppose at some future time, when we have the "Blue Book" history of these proceedings before us, we shall have some information as to who this high authority is from whom proceeded these rumours which had such an effect upon Her Majesty's Government. Then, perhaps, we can have the right hon. Gentleman in the witness-box and ask him to tell us what were those rumours, upon whose authority they reached the Cabinet, what effect they had upon the Cabinet when received, and again what followed when they were found to be incorrect? It may have been that in consequence of these rumours the Indian troops were ordered to Malta, and then, when these rumours were found to be false, it was too late for the Government to change their policy. So far as we know, that may be the information gathered from the speech of the Home Secretary. Now, I presume, sooner or later we shall get full particulars of the high authority upon which Government depended; but, in the meantime, I think we need have no difficulty in tracing whence these rumours came. They probably came from Constantinople. We have heard of such rumours before, and we know the effect they have had on the Government—they came from Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople. Perhaps, at some future time, we shall know whether the high authority is, or is not, the same right hon. Gentleman who is in the habit of conveying alarming rumours to Her Majesty's Government to influence their decisions. It is a most unfortunate circumstance, that during the whole of these transactions there has been a Party with great influence whose aim and interest it was to secure a declaration of war from England against Russia with Turkey for an Ally. That Party has made use of the telegraph and the newspapers, and they have had the entrées into the saloons of Ambassadors, and by every instrumentality have endeavoured to make such an impression upon the Government as to induce them to make war in the interest of Turkey. I venture to say that when this now secret history comes to be inquired into, and the policy of the Government brought to the test, it will be found that most important decisions of the Government were taken in consequence of the influence of that Party whose interest it was to drag the Government into an alliance with Turkey against Russia. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Hayter) has pointed out so distinctly that the employment of the Indian troops, in consequence of the very extravagant expenditure, is one entirely without justification; and it will not be necessary for me to enlarge on that branch of the subject. Even allowing that this policy on the part of the Government was necessary for the promotion of British interests—a proposition which I entirely dispute—we cannot be asked to vote this enormous sum of money without taking into our account the fact that the House of Commons has already placed at the disposal of the Government a very large sum of money. Let me remind the House that on the Army and Navy Estimates and the Vote of Credit we are already committed to an expenditure of something like £32,000,000. Is not that sufficient for an armed demonstration? That is not all. Does any hon. Member suppose that this £750,000 is the last of the bill? We shall have a very considerable sum of money to pay beyond this amount. I believe that it is an altogether extravagant expenditure; and are we to be told that the time has passed when we can object to that expenditure? That time has not gone by, and we are not in any way now precluded from objecting to the policy which has been pursued. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has admitted, that while it would be a very great inconvenience if the House rejected these Supplementary Estimates, yet in that case the expense would not be thrown upon India. Therefore, it must be understood that if we vote against this expenditure for Indian troops, what we are doing is not throwing that charge upon India, but calling upon the Government so to avoid expenditure in other services, that they may provide out of such savings the fresh expenditure incurred. It will be far better to reject the Vote than to throw this additional burden upon the backs of the people of this country, who are suffering at the present time from great distress—from financial difficulties and privations of the most dreadful character. Is this the time, when for years past we have been passing through a state of commercial depression which has affected almost every capitalist in the Kingdom, when the people have a difficulty in finding employment, and, in some cases, even the common necessities of life, to adopt such a Vote blindfold? The expenditure has been entirely unnecessary, and the object aimed at might have been secured by greater economy. Altogether the Government is left without a single excuse for the proposals they have laid before the House of Commons.

MR. E. JENKINS said, that even at the risk of being accused of factious opposition, and of taking a course which was useless, and which could lead to no practical result, he thought it right to enter his protest against the course taken by the Government. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had assured the House that the prospects of the meeting of the Conference had materially increased; but the satisfaction with which that assurance was received was greatly lessened by the recollection of the number of satisfactory assurances which had come from the same quarter, but afterwards turned out to have been without any solid foundation. He was of opinion that there had been a dexterous manipulation of public information. For a long time past delicate and momentous questions had been under the consideration of the Government, large sums of money had been voted, the Reserves had been called out, and the Indian troops moved, and up to this moment no one knew what the object was at which the Government aimed. He contended that this was not a proper position for the House to be placed in; and he protested against the absolute and irresponsible right of a small clique, in concert with the Crown, to settle great questions of foreign policy, and to make war or peace without reference to Parliament. He protested against the House of Commons being made merely the holder of the purse-strings of the nation, and having the power only to say—"We will not pay." The conduct of the Government was, he held, wholly unconstitutional, and might have the effect of rousing a most unfavourable feeling out-of-doors. Not only were the Government pursuing a policy of secrecy, but in their diplomatic negotiations with Russia they had imposed silence on Russia herself. He believed the Government would not deny that they had imposed silence upon Count Schouvaloff in regard to the objects of his mission; and he asked if it were not true that they were contemplating, in reference to the negotiations, certain conditions which went far beyond anything that had yet been made known? He saw an article in The Times of that day which stated, in effect, that no influence could ensure good government in Turkey but that of a Power whose authority in the East was generally recognized, and that England was that Power. Such a policy might lead to the most serious consequences, and the sooner it was disavowed by the Government the better. He regarded the employment of these Indian troops as impolitic and inexpedient. It was calculated to excite the jealousy of European Powers, to create a reactionary and dangerous effect in India, and to blunt the moral sense of the English people. It would be a dangerous and unhealthy principle if they were to lay it down that in future wars England would find the money and India would find the men.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the House need not be afraid that I am going to abuse its patience by entering at length upon the wide subjects which are affected by this Vote. It has afforded me already its attention with great liberality and kindness, and therefore I shall show my gratitude by moderation upon the present occasion. I have not heard that it is intended to divide the House at the present stage of these proceedings; and I do not think that it would be very desirable that a division should be taken without Notice upon a subject of so much importance, when a division would give no fair test of the opinion of the House. I wish to express my own disapproval, and protest against this proceeding on two grounds—the one that I think it is impolitic, and the other that it is illegal. The impolicy of the use of Indian troops is a matter upon which I entertain a strong opinion; but, at the same time, I do not hold it as an ultimate and unchangeable opinion. It is a large question, involving a great number of considerations perfectly distinct from one another. We have had no argument from Her Majesty's Government upon the subject; and I feel that it is a question so novel, so extensive, and so complicated, that no prudent person, whatever his first impressions may be, would wish to give them vent as absolutely irrevocable. My own present opinion is, that it is a most impolitic and most dangerous measure; but, at the same time, that opinion itself would not have led me, before you, Sir, quit the Chair, to express my verbal protest against the proceeding. I feel, and those who think with me, that the vote which we are about to be invited to give is an illegal vote, a vote for a distinctly illegal purpose; in my opinion, we are taking the most consistent course in stating that opinion before we go into Committee. I am of opinion, not only that this measure is illegal, but that it is illegal under a number of distinct and separate heads, any one of which, so far as argument has yet gone, is quite sufficient to convict it of illegality. The first and most important of these is the question of Common Law. It is, I believe, in violation of the Common Law that we are called upon, without any attempt to rectify the previous proceedings, to give a vote for the purpose of supporting an addition to the Standing Army, which had been made by the Executive Government, upon its own responsibility, in violation, I will not say of the Bill of Rights, but of the Common Law, of which the Bill of Rights was a declaration and expression. There were several matters of fact alleged for the purpose of showing that the proceeding was not under that head illegal, and I would wish briefly to point to the signal and unexampled manner in which the allegations of facts that were made, with perfect truth and sincerity, by Members of the Government have, one after another, broken down. The first allegation was, that when the late Government, in the year 1870, proposed an addition of 20,000 men to the Army, they had no legislative sanction for the numbers so added to the Army; but the researches of the Government were not, unfortunately, extended to Schedule B of the Act—because in the Schedule will be found the number of 20,000 men recorded in the usual manner, with all the sanction that the Legislature can give to it. Another allegation was, that in the case of New Zealand a Force was sent from the Indian Establishment without authority, and that such sending of the Forces by a former Liberal Government constituted a precedent for what has now been done. If that had been done so, it would have been little material to the case, because in New Zealand war had actually broken out, and the question was one of establishing peace in the country. It appears, however, that such Forces were never sent at all, and that the Forces which were sent were English Forces not upon the Indian Establishment. Important as these errors are, the plea that was raised upon them was nothing like the importance of one which was made explicitly by the Attorney General in this House, and which appears to have been advanced still more boldly in “another place”—an allegation which, if substantiated in point of fact, would have gone some way to establish the doctrine set up on the part of the Government, that it is the Prerogative of the Crown to raise and maintain Armies generally—that the Prerogative was limited by the Bill of Rights as to the United Kingdom, but that beyond the United Kingdom no such limitations exist. If that proposition can be established, it would, no doubt, be most material for the support of the proceedings of Her Majesty's Government. There was only a single case alleged which went directly to establish that proposition, but it was an important case.

I refer to the case of Ireland, and if the allegation breaks down there, the failure is still more conspicuous and egregious than in the other cases. It was alleged that for a length of time after the Revolution—and by a still higher authority than the Attorney General—that during the whole of the last century a standing Army was kept in Ireland without the authority of Parliament. What is the fact? The fact is that from the first Mutiny Act after the Revolution the authority of Parliament was given explicitly and expressly for the maintenance of Forces, with a view to the reduction and subjugation of Ireland. That process was repeated in the very next year—the year 1690. To the first two Acts I have referred, and I take the others down to 1698 on the authority of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James), in all of which years the Mutiny Acts provide and renew the authority for the maintenance of Forces in Ireland. In the year 1698 an Act was passed, constituting a regular Establishment of Forces for Ireland, which was fixed at 12,000 men. In the year 1767 that Act was repealed, and another substituted, which recited that it had become necessary to employ a certain portion of the Force kept on the Irish Establishment out of the country, and that, for the purpose of putting the Government in a condition so to employ a portion of the Indian Establishment, it was needful to enlarge the Irish Establishment; and, consequently, by the authority of Parliament, the Establishment was increased from 12,000 to 15,200 men. So stood the Act until the time of the Union. This is the only precedent as far my information goes, and the facts show that the standing Army of Ireland was maintained for 70 or 80 years after the Revolution, and down to the time of the Act of Union, under the express authority of Parliament. If that be so, and no one has contravened the allegation of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Taunton, Ireland at that time stood in exactly the same Constitutional position as that which Malta now holds. So much for breach of the common law. Besides that, we have the Indian Government Act, and so far as I am able to understand, there are three distinct allegations that that Act has been broken, to no one of which has any tolerable semblance of an answer been given. The 41st section of the Indian Government Act requires the consent of the majority of the Council to any charge upon the Revenues of India. There has been no such assent by the majority of the Council, and that, according to us, is a distinct breach of the law. "No," as I understand the Government say, "there is no breach of the law, because there has been no charge upon the Revenues of India." The money has been paid out of the Revenues of India; there is no doubt at all about that; and there are no legal means for its repayment. I apprehend that when money has been paid out of the Revenues of India, and there are no legal means for its repayment, a charge has been imposed upon the Indian Revenue. If that be not so, you lose all power of defining what is the meaning of the phrase—"charge upon the Revenues of India." Well, Sir, this matter is tolerably simple, and may be said to rest thus—the East India Company in former times had not power for the general employment of Forces all over the world, but only within certain limits, which were defined by Charter and Acts of Parliament. The Charter limited their employment by a geographical definition, and that definition was the Cape of Good Hope on the one side and the Straits of Magellan on the other side. Within the region so limited the Forces of the East India Company might be employed, but beyond those limits they could not. In 1858, Parliament constituted the Military and Naval Forces of the East India Company into the Indian Naval and Military Forces of Her Majesty; and, in so doing, defined in the strictest manner that they should be Military and Naval Forces only upon the same terms as they had been for the East India Company. The care, the precision, and the minuteness of detail, with which this limitation is contained in the Indian Government Act is most remarkable; because it is not merely said that they shall be Her Majesty's Indian Military and Naval Forces on the same terms as they would have been had they continued to be the Forces of the East India Company, but it is said that they shall be under the same obligations to serve Her Majesty as they would have been under to serve the Company, and shall be liable to serve within the same territorial limits only, for the same terms only, and be entitled to the like pay, allowances, and so forth. It is perfectly true that that refers to the Forces that were then actually in the service of the Crown, and that a subsequent reference is made with regard to persons thereafter rendering that service; but, although that reference is made, there is no enlargement whatever of the terms contained in the Act of Parliament. There is a reference to other Acts of Parliament, but that reference only makes the case and the arguments all the more stringent, for we find in those Acts the geographical limits within which the East India Company's Forces might be employed distinctly recognized and affirmed. Then comes the 57th section of the East India Company's Act, which gives the Queen power, by order in Council, to alter or enlarge these terms; and it is not for me to dispute that, supposing contracts with individuals maintained, the Queen has Parliamentary power—a peculiar Parliamentary power—to enlarge the terms. But Her Majesty can only do so by Order in Council. There is no such power by oath of enlistment, by the Articles of War, or by anything else. Not only so, but care has been taken that Parliament shall be made part and parcel of the proceedings; because the provision is, that such Order shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament "within 14 days of the meeting thereof." Well, we have had it from the highest authority, from the Solicitor General, that it was the duty of the Opposition to find out whether there was any Order in Council or not. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Barnstaple (Mr. Waddy) took the best way of finding out whether there was such an Order in Council. He inquired of the Government, and from the mouth of the Government we now know that such an Order in Council does not exist. This is the third breach of the law. The first is the breach of the common law; the second is with regard to the assent of the majority of the Indian Council; and the third is that which refers to the local limits within which the Forces are to act. Well, Sir, this a matter of great interest; because, hon. Gentlemen looking back over what has occurred in former years, cannot fail to be struck with the fact that in every one of the cases in which Indian Forces have been hitherto employed beyond the frontiers of India they have been employed in such a way as to come completely within the definition of the territories of the East India Company's Charter. The Solicitor General has said that this was an affair connected with the conditions of the contract between the Government and persons who were then serving in Her Majesty's Forces. If that had been all, it would have been perfectly easy to save their rights. It would have been totally unnecessary to put in these elaborate provisions about Orders in Council. It would have been a very simple matter to have introduced a saving clause or proviso on this point. The only reading of the Act, to any man who looks at it with an impartial eye, and endeavours to learn what was the animus of the Parliament which passed it, is obviously this—that the intention of Parliament was that the East India Army, in its Native Forces, should continue to be, as it had been, a local Army. The opposite contention would make out that Parliament was outside one of the very largest questions it was possible for it to decide—namely, that the Indian Army, which had up to that time been a local Army, should from that time become only a portion, separated by geographical boundaries only, of Her Majesty's Army. Instead of that, I think a wise course was taken. Power was left to the Crown to act by passing Orders in Council, and then by making those Orders known to Parliament, in order that Parliament might have the opportunity of pronouncing its opinion thereupon. Well, then, there comes the other clause—Section 55; and here it is very difficult to make out what is the exact contention of the Government. In fact, the Attorney General in this House stands in one sense altogether alone, for he is the only man who has made a distinct contention of any kind. We know at least what we are dealing with when we have to do with him; but from the other Members of the Government I defy any hon. Member to extract one particle of doctrine. They speak of alarming intelligence which proves to be untrue. Sometimes it is a telegram from Constantinople, sometimes it is something else; but, invariably, it causes some step of immense importance to be taken, and then the intelligence turns out not to be true. We were told that this power would be gently used, that it would be exercised with the utmost care and discrimination; but what the Constitutional principle is on which the Government mean to take their stand we know not. We only know that the doctrine of the Attorney General has been declared in terms perfectly clear and unequivocal, and that those terms have not been disavowed by any Member of Her Majesty's Government. Well, then comes, I was going on to say, the section with regard to the use of the Forces beyond the frontiers of the Indian Possessions; and here my contention is very simple. It is that the clause has been broken—flatly, plainly, and egregiously broken—by the doing of this act without the consent of Parliament. "Consent of Parliament" here means the previous consent of Parliament; but if that is contested I should like to have some case quoted, either from Statute or Parliamentary usage, according to which the "consent of Parliament" means some act done by Parliament after the fact. In its various Parliamentary applications the term has not one meaning. In the case of Bills affecting the proprietary rights of the Crown, the consent of the Crown has to be signified before the Bill quits the House.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER made a remark, which was inaudible.

MR. GLADSTONE: My right hon. Friend really ought to have some compassion upon inferior intellects. He says that the consent of the Crown was to be given previously to the employment.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: At the expense of the Revenue of India.

MR. GLADSTONE: Then the consent of Parliament did mean previous consent? Although I believe the law has been broken in three respects, the two points on which we are mainly at variance are as to the territorial limits within which the troops may be legally employed, and, secondly, as to whether any charge has been actually made on the Revenues of India? Well, Sir, having made these remarks, it is not my intention to divide the House. On the contrary, I think I have given good reasons why it seems to me better that we should not divide at the present stage. But, inasmuch as we are called upon, in my opinion, to sanction an act contrary to the law, I wished to register my dissent against such a proceeding. I may be told that this, after all, is to meet a charge which has been already incurred. Well, of course, that is true as to a portion of the charge. I apprehend, however, that this will be both a prospective and a retrospective Vote; but looking at it as it is proposed in principle, and as implying a recognition of the propriety and legality of what has been done, I have ventured to state these objections to the House.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, the right hon. Gentleman had alluded to the 55th Section of the Government of India Act, which he considered had been infringed by the action of the Government; but the argument founded on that section had already, he thought, been sufficiently disposed of by the remarks which had been made by his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The fact was, they were not applying the Revenues of India to this purpose at all. They were being, as a matter of account, advanced, but they would be repaid; but no charge would be put in any form upon the Revenues of India. Then, the right hon. Gentleman said that an Order in Council was necessary to enable the Government to act as they had done, and that that Order in Council ought to have been laid before Parliament. The Section of the Act had two objects—the first being, that if it were desired to alter the conditions and terms of service, it should be done by Order in Council; and the second object was to enable the Governor General in Council, from time to time, to alter the forms of attestation, and the oath to be taken on enlistment, without the necessity of coming to Parliament at all. There had never been any necessity to issue an Order in Council, but the Governor General in Council had issued an Order altering the form of attestation; and, under the Act, read by any man in the light of common sense, it showed that it was impossible, looking to the words of the clause, to consider that any Order in Council was necessary.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, the hon. Gentleman had inadvertently fallen into an error. The alteration in the oath and form of attestation was made in 1856, in order to render the troops liable to serve beyond the seas—in the Mauritius, China, &c.—from which, until that alteration, they had been exempt, as their former oath only bound them to "march" wherever ordered. If there were any doubt as to the intentions of the Government of 1858, it could be solved by reference to the Report of the Commissioners of 1858-9 with regard to the amalgamation of the Indian and Imperial Armies. From that Report, it was clear that there was no idea that the local Army of India could by any possibility be employed in Europe.

MR. MUNTZ said, if the House were to be asked to go to a division on this question, he could not give a silent vote. He was convinced at the time the £6,000,000 Vote was agreed to, that the majority of the House was unquestionably determined to support the Government in its course of foreign policy. He should have been content to let this matter pass but for the extraordinary statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, that Her Majesty had the undoubted right in time of peace to move Her troops from one part of Her Dominions to another; and of the Attorney General, that the Mutiny Act did not extend further than the British Islands. When he heard those statements, he thought they had receded 200 years, and that he was reading the accounts of the old Star Chamber. If Her Majesty's Government had come down and said that this was a matter of emergency—that they were not at liberty to give their reasons, but must trust to the good sense of the House to leave any discussion to the future—he, for one, would have given a very different vote. But when the Government affirmed it as an absolute right, it became a Constitutional question of importance. If the Mutiny Act did not extend beyond the British Islands, under what authority were the troops tried by court martial, as he had seen done in Canada and Nova Scotia, and elsewhere? He regretted to be compelled to vote against the Speaker leaving the Chair; but he thought this was no question of giving encouragement to Russia, but one of whether they should give up those liberties which their forefathers prized.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER was totally unable to see that any question of Constitutional law had been raised by the removal of these troops from India to Malta. The question turned on the meaning of the word "Kingdom" in the Bill of Rights; and, as in common law, the "Kingdom" was defined to be "where the King's writ ran," it followed that Malta did not come within the Bill of Rights, as the noble Marquess the Leader of the Opposition had contended. The Bill of Rights was a declaratory Act asserting the rights and liberties of the English people. When even foreign troops were brought into this Kingdom Parliament was informed by Message after they were so brought in; and if Indian troops—British subjects—had been brought in, it was not necessary to obtain the previous sanction of Parliament under the Bill of Rights. Nor was there anything in the Mutiny Act to limit the Prerogative of the Crown to move a portion of the troops serving from one part to another. The talk about the danger of the movement was a mere bugbear. No man in his senses could seriously contend that the removal of Indian troops to Malta could in any way endanger the liberties of the people of this country. Troops could not be moved without money, and as Parliament had to be asked to pay the cost, Parliament had a check over the movement of troops. The late movement of Indian troops to Malta was no violation of the Constitution, for by the Constitution the Government and the disposition of the Forces were vested in the Crown. If the movement of Indian troops from India to Malta were against the Constitution, why was not a Resolution moved to impeach the Ministry? Instead of that, an ingenious Resolution was brought forward mis-reciting and mis-stating the law. That Resolution was supported by statements which, if true, would have justified an impeachment of the Ministry. In 1858 the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) moved a Resolution, declaring that except for the repelling of actual invasion, the Government should not be allowed to employ Indian troops beyond the boundaries of India without the consent of Parliament. That Resolution was not worth the paper on which it was written, if such employment of Indian troops were a violation of the Constitution. Lord Palmerston said that such an attempt to restrict the Prerogative of the Crown was unconstitutional. In the other House the subject was more maturely considered, and that Resolution was rejected.

Therefore, there was a Parliamentary decision against the present contention of the right hon. Gentleman. He (Sir George Bowyer) did not know why the noble Lord moved a Resolution. If let alone, he did not believe the noble Lord would have moved a Resolution. Everyone present at the debate on that Resolution saw that the noble Lord, to use a law phrase, did not like his case, and had an up-hill game to make. The objection which had been made to the act of the Government in moving the Indian troops was not only a Party move, but it was one which was most ill-timed and most inopportune, inasmuch as it tended to weaken the influence of the British Government abroad.

MR. HOPWOOD said, they were getting familiar with assertions of Prerogative, and with arguments that were enough to make them afraid for the future; not that the National Party would not be victorious, but because a disruption of the even balance at present existing in the country would certainly come about if the course now in favour were persevered in by its injudicious advocates. The argument with respect to Ireland, which had been relied on by the Government in the late debates in both Houses, had been based upon a mistake, the fact telling exactly the other way. The policy of the Government in regard to the movement of Indian troops to Malta was simply to create a sensation in Europe. The movement of these troops to Malta was not justified by any emergency. The Government themselves had said that they did not now believe that there was an emergency, but that, in the first instance, they acted on information received from a high authority. Who was that authority? If it were their Ambassador at Constantinople, that accounted, perhaps, for the fact that the information was at once alarming and unreliable. If there were a real emergency, was India the place from which 7,000 men could be obtained the most quickly? Now, what effect would the introduction of Indian troops have on the Government of Russia? Why, they would form the opinion that that was the largest number we could spare from India. The Government were now going forth as a great military nation, and were assuming that bluster and swagger which brought the Second Empire to its fall. What had been the character for which England had been distinguished for many years? Why, if she had been distinguished for anything, it had been moderation. But that character had recently been greatly changed. The policy of the Government had been a boastful, bragging policy, and quite foreign to the nature of Englishmen. He warned the House against supporting such a policy at the present time.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, there was a greater than the merely local question before the House. He considered it most unwise, ungenerous, and unpatriotic on the part of hon. Gentlemen opposite, in a great crisis like the present, to raise such an issue, more especially after the Chancellor of the Exchequer had assured them that there was a hope of a Congress assembling. Other countries could not imagine or realize that any body of men, least of all could they imagine Members of the British House of Commons, raising such a discussion, unless, indeed, they objected not merely to the movement of the Native Indian troops in a legal point of view, but altogether to the foreign policy of Her Majesty's Government. A wrong issue was, therefore, placed before the House. Did any hon. Member, he asked, believe for one moment that by the movement of these troops the liberties of this country were endangered? There were dangers to the liberties of the country, on the other hand, arising from the action taken by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and dangers to Europe as representing the faith of Treaties. The majority the other night showed the feeling of the House with reference to this subject, and, more than that, he thought it showed the feeling of the country. For his part, he believed that the step taken by the Government had done more than anything which had occurred in this generation to strengthen the union of India to Great Britain. He did not think that military men were jealous of the Indian troops. In fact, if these troops could be brought to England and reviewed by the Queen, he was certain they would be received with enthusiasm by the whole country. The course now taken was calculated to damage the action of the Government, for it was not understood in its true light abroad. He believed the Government, by the action they had taken in ordering these troops from India, had done the best thing they could to maintain their Indian Empire and the greatness of the country, and, above all, to maintain the rights of Treaties and the liberties of Europe.

DR. LUSH said, he did not understand that the duties of the Opposition ceased after once taking a division upon a question. That was not the way he understood that the liberties of this country had been built up. No doubt, they were in a minority in the House at that moment; but he was not convinced that the Government possessed the confidence of the country. The question was one which the mere money evil did not properly appraise. The assumption of the Royal Prerogative was something infinitely greater than the mere money payment. The act of bringing over Indian troops had drawn upon the Government grave reprobation, and it was the duty of the Opposition so to oppose it that posterity might fully appreciate the position it had taken up. He should consider it his duty to vote against the Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had left his place, as he wished to take that opportunity to make an explanation with regard to some observations which fell from the right hon. Gentleman in reply to him (Mr. Newdegate) during the debate on Thursday last. The right hon. Gentleman then said that he (Mr. Newdegate) had contended that the previous consent of Parliament to the movement of Indian Native troops out of Her Majesty's Indian Possessions was necessary. He (Mr. Newdegate) then rose to explain that that was, in his opinion, the purport of the expressions used by the late Lord Derby in moving the 55th clause of the India Act, and that he (Mr. Newdegate) had not merely given his own opinion, but he had quoted the late Earl of Derby. The fact was, that this question, which the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) seemed to think so trifling, and complained of its being interposed at what he described a great emergency, was a very grave Constitutional question. The question was this—and it was clear from the exposition of the hon. and learned Member for Durham (Mr. Herschell), and from that of the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James), clear also from what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) that evening, that it was not the exercise of the Prerogative in declaring war that was questioned—there was no question about that, but the real question was this—whether, by moving the local Native troops from India, without the concurrence of Parliament, Her Majesty's Government had not used the Prerogative in this sense—the sense of having converted the Native Indian Army from a local Force into being a part of the general and Regular Forces of the standing Army of this Kingdom and Empire? Now, that was not a little question. The question was no less than this—whether by some operation, confined to Her Majesty's Ministers, without the previous knowledge or consent of Parliament, they had not so interpreted the India Act of 1858, that the Forces, which, by the 54th, 55th, and 56th clauses of that Act, were clearly described as a local Indian Army, not under the command of the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief of the acknowledged standing Army, but who were under the command of the Governor General of India, and that only for local and Indian purposes—whether, he repeated, by this undescribed process, Her Majesty's Ministers had not, in time of peace, managed to convert part of the Indian local Army into being part of the general Forces of the Kingdom; whether, by the use of the power, as it was alleged, contained in the 57th clause of the Act, by which Her Majesty had power, by Order in Council, to decide the terms of enlistment of this local Indian Army, the Government had not, as stated by the Under Secretary of State for India (Mr. E. Stanhope), so used and interpreted that clause, as to supersede the whole meaning of the three preceding clauses; and, strange to say, they had failed to produce any Order in Council which could satisfy the requirements of the 57th clause itself? Now, that, he repeated was not a small question; and, in saying this, he went upon what had been stated that evening as, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, the justification of their course, stated by the Under Secretary of State for India. If the question rested only upon the 55th clause of the Act alone, he could understand there being some doubt, though it was a doubt in which he could not share; for it was a doubt that did not seem to have entered into the mind of the late Earl of Derby when he framed that clause. But he would read the clause to the House. The 54th clause was to this effect—that when an order to commence actual hostilities was sent to India, the facts should be communicated to Parliament. Now, that clearly related to war carried on upon the frontiers of or within the Indian Territories of Her Majesty; he did not think any lawyer could read the clause, and dispute that conclusion. The next clause, the 55th, said—

“the expenses of any Military operation carried on beyond the external frontiers of such Possession by Her Majesty's Forces charged upon such Revenues.”

Therefore, the terms of the clause conveyed—and this was irrespective of a declaration of war in India—that without the consent of Parliament to repel invasion, or some such urgent necessity, neither the Revenues nor the Forces of India should be used for any military operation beyond the frontiers of India. In proposing this clause, the late Earl of Derby said—

“If the troops were employed out of India, it would be for Parliament to decide whether they were employed upon Indian or Imperial objects;”—[3 Hansard, cli. 1697.]

because, according to the universal practice of the Government of India, equally while it was in the hands of the East India Company as since, these local Forces were used for Indian purposes outside of India, and to Indian purposes three of these four clauses clearly related. But surely the late Earl of Derby, with those three clauses before him, when he introduced the 55th clause, must have known what was the purport of the clause which he so introduced. He (Mr. Newdegate) had quoted it before, but he would quote two sentences of the Earl of Derby's speech again. The Earl of Derby's first words were—

“The object of the clause was to impose a certain restriction upon the Prerogative of the Crown through the intervention of Parliament.”—[Ibid.]

Those were his first words. His last words, when introducing the 55th clause, were these—

“If the clause were not agreed to, it would be perfectly competent for any unconstitutional Sovereign to employ the whole of the Revenues and Troops of India, for any purpose which the Crown might direct, without the necessity of going to Parliament for the advance of a single shilling.”—[Ibid.]

Let the House observe that these words point to an advance of money. He (Mr. Newdegate) could not believe that it was seriously argued by the Government that the Indian Treasury had not advanced a single shilling, and it had not been pretended that the Treasury of this country had done so. Clearly, then, if the Indian Treasury had advanced a single shilling, there was no pretence for saying that in this case the consent of Parliament had been obtained to the expenditure of that shilling. Clearly, according to the understanding of the late Earl of Derby—who substituted this clause for another, in order to place, as he said in his first words, a limitation or restriction upon the use of the Prerogative—the sense and meaning of the terms of this clause, taken in connection with the 54th, 56th, and 57th clauses of the India Act, had been broken and violated by what had been done. But did the proof of this stop here? This very question was raised in the year 1867, with respect to the Abyssinian War; and he had the words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer then before him, spoken on the 26th of November, 1867, during the debate on the Abyssinian War. In July of that year, and previous to the Prorogation of Parliament, the present Earl of Derby, then Lord Stanley, had announced that it was in the contemplation of the Government to use the Indian troops for the Abyssinian Expedition; and while the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was speaking in this House in the following November, he said that no objection had been taken in this House by any Member of this House before the Recess, whereupon Mr. Bernal Osborne got up and said—“Yes, one did,” and then asserted that Colonel Sykes had objected. Could there be any clearer proof that at the end of the previous Session, which closed in the month of August, 1867, this House had been informed that it was the intention of the Government to use the Indian Forces? But he would go further yet. When, in 1858, this 55th clause had been inserted in the India Act in Committee in the House of Lords, this occurred—he quoted from Hansard, vol. cli. 2008—“Third reading, Clause 55, enacting that, except for preventing or repelling actual invasion, the revenues of India shall not, ‘without the consent of Parliament,’ be applicable to defray the expenses of any military operation carried on beyond the frontiers.

“GOVERNMENT OF INDIA BILL.

“Lord CRANWORTH wished to remind the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) that the ‘consent of Parliament’ meant an Act of Parliament; while the consent of ‘both Houses of Parliament’ would be inferred by Addresses to the Crown.

“Earl GRANVILLE had asked more than once what was meant by the words ‘consent of Parliament,’ but he never received an answer. He should like to hear from the noble Earl opposite what was meant by the term.

“The Earl of DERBY said, the consent of Parliament might mean either an Act of Parliament or a Resolution passed by both Houses.”

And what did the late Earl of Derby do in 1867? The Indian troops left Bombay on the 7th of September in that year. That was when they moved. Simultaneously, the Earl of Derby issued Notices for convening Parliament, which assembled on the 19th of November; and, in seconding the Address in the House of Lords, the late Lord Hylton plainly stated, and purposely stated, that Parliament had been convened, as soon as circumstances admitted, because it was felt that the Constitution required the consent of Parliament to the use of these troops for Imperial purposes out of India. What was the next proceeding at the commencement of the Session, which began on that 19th of November, 1867? Why, the proposal of a Vote of Credit, which was granted by Resolution of this House, which thus assented to, and identified itself with, the action of the Government. Let the House now compare the proceedings in 1867 with the proceedings in this Session, when Parliament separated for the Easter Recess without having received the slightest intimation that this exceptional use was to be made of the Indian local troops, and had remained until this very day, after a division had been taken in the House on this subject, without the means of giving its consent to the action of the Government by passing any Resolution in Supply. He held, then, not only that the Constitutional practice had been broken, but that a most vicious and dangerous precedent was being set. That opinion he held distinctly, not upon his own authority only, but on that of accomplished lawyers, who had kindly assisted him by examining this Statute, and who had told him that that which had now been done by Her Majesty's Government was, in their opinion, illegal, and, even if it were not technically illegal, that it was wholly unconstitutional. He also contended that the action of the Government, in changing the terms of the enlistment of the Native Indian Army without an Order in Council, with a view to changing the character of that local Army of India, and to make that Army a part of the Regular Forces of this country, was a stretch of the Prerogative that was unjustifiable, and that would hereafter, if not now, be reprobated by Parliament. No one could be surprised that, entertaining these opinions, he (Mr. Newdegate) had voted for the Resolution of the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition. He was no less anxious than Her Majesty's Ministers that this country should be prepared to exhibit her strength if necessary. He had voted against the Government on this Constitutional question. But he was the survivor of two non-official Members of that House, who, at the commencement of the Crimean War, doubted whether the Government of the day had made adequate provision of small arms for the Army. In conjunction with the late Mr. Muntz, then Member for Birmingham, he (Mr. Newdegate) ventured on the great responsibility of persuading the House to appoint a Select Committee on the Supply of Arms, thus superseding the action of the then Administration. This was in the year 1854. The Select Committee on the Supply of Arms then appointed, after a careful inquiry, took the same view as the late Mr. Muntz and himself—that the War Office and the Ordnance authorities had erred in trusting to their own then imperfect manufacturing establishment and to foreign supply, instead of entrusting large orders for rifles to the English arms trade. The Ordnance Authorities asserted that the English arms trade could not be trusted to supply more than 30,000 rifles a-year. The House of Commons compelled the Government, nevertheless, to send large orders to the English trade. The answer of the trade was the supply of 272,000

rifles in two years and three months. The result justified the conduct of the late Mr. Muntz and himself; but he (Mr. Newdegate) felt at the outset that they incurred a grave responsibility. He (Mr. Newdegate) was prepared now to incur as grave a responsibility, if necessary, as he did in 1854, for the sake of upholding the strength and greatness of this country; and yet, because he differed from Her Majesty's Ministers on this Constitutional question, it was pretended that he lacked patriotism and courage; because he had voted for the noble Lord's Motion, was he to be told that he was changed from what he was in the year 1854, and that he would hesitate to maintain the honour of the country? The hon. and learned Member for Wexford (Sir George Bowyer) said that the division on that Motion was a Party division. Well, the hon. and learned Member said that he had registered himself in the Parliamentary Companion as a Home Ruler, and in favour of a national Parliament in Ireland, whilst he (Mr. Newdegate) had for years registered himself as a supporter of the great principles of the Act of Settlement. The hon. and learned Member for Wexford (Sir George Bowyer) voted with Her Majesty's Ministers, and he (Mr. Newdegate) voted against Her Majesty's Ministers, in the division of Thursday last, and the hon. and learned Baronet declared that to have been a strictly Party division. If the hon. and learned Baronet were right, this gave a rather curious view of Party connection in the House. He (Mr. Newdegate) had voted with the Leader of the Opposition, because the noble Lord had most dutifully and properly raised a great Constitutional question, upon which he (Mr. Newdegate) agreed with the noble Lord; he voted, not with the view of impeding or delaying the action of the Government, but to preserve a great principle of the Constitution, which, when observed, let all foreigners know that there could be no doubt if Her Majesty were compelled to declare war—which God forbid!—that, although Her Majesty did this on Her own authority, Her Majesty had, in so doing, the advice, the consent, and the support of the Commons of England.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT said, the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) was, no doubt, regarded by the Party opposite as one of the most unpatriotic men of the country. The Tory Party seemed to think that true patriotism consisted in following a Leader and stifling one's conscientious convictions, even upon the most important questions. They were asked that night to go into Committee of Supply, in order to vote money for an Indian Army which the Government had brought into Europe, in his opinion, contrary to law; but whether this transaction had been legal or illegal, before voting money for it, he should have required to be convinced of its necessity. It had been admitted by the Government that in bringing these troops the law had been set aside, and the entire step had been defended upon the plea of an emergency. If, when the law had been violated, it was enough for a Minister to rise in his place and state that there was an emergency, it would be easy at any time to defy the law. Surely it was the duty of the Minister to describe the emergency, to define it, to show its dimensions, to make it clear to the average intellect of the nation. Nothing of the kind had been done. No Minister had shown, or even attempted to show what this emergency was. He denied that there was an emergency. He was aware that if he stood alone in this denial, it might have little weight; but he denied it in company with a large portion of his fellow-countrymen and many Members of that House, who represented the largest constituencies. In that denial he was supported by men of the foremost intellect of the nation, as witness the declarations which they had publicly signed, and by the awakening voice of the constituencies as evidenced at Reading, at Tamworth, and at Northumberland. Nor did he fear to refer to the Election at County Down; for, when the Prime Minister rushed in hot haste to the nearest telegraph station to thank the electors of that county for the support given to his foreign policy, the Irish Members of that House, knowing that the Eastern Question was never referred to during that contest, had the strongest evidence of the growing sensitiveness of the Government to the opinion of the country. When he denied that there was an emergency, he meant, of course, an emergency which, were it not removed, would justify a great war. Where were we to find the emergency?—he supposed, if anywhere, in the Treaty of San Stefano. But, according to that Treaty, Constantinople remained in the same hands, the water-way to the Black Sea was undisturbed; and would any Minister tell the country that some 50,000 British lives, and, perhaps, £150,000,000 sterling, were to be sacrificed to make Bulgaria greater or less, or to prevent Russia getting a town more or less in Asia? The emergency was a sham and not a real emergency. If any of them should ever live to see a real emergency, when the vital interests of the Empire were attacked, the Minister of England, if he be fit to be Minister, would not send to a distant country in Asia for costly and inefficient troops, but would appeal to his own countrymen, and that appeal would be abundantly responded to. But, if there were no emergency, then the Government had committed a grave offence. Surely, it was a criminal thing for the Government, without reason and recklessly, to disturb every feeling of security in a country where millions of men have to live by exchanging the produce of their industry with other nations? He (Mr. Bright) represented a great commercial constituency; there were thousands of men in that constituency who at that moment were under the greatest pressure, and for whom the struggle to live became daily more difficult. The Members of the Government had no direct knowledge of these things. With, perhaps, only one exception, the Cabinet was taken from the county families and the landed gentry. They had both their private and official incomes, and, whatever happened, they lived in luxury and ease. It might be very pleasant for the Government, and especially for the Prime Minister, to be acting the part of disturbers of Europe; but what was pleasure to them was death to the country. The Prime Minister had had a great career at home—his ambition had been satiated, and he now sought a wider arena, and was satisfied with nothing less than to compete with European Potentates. What were the results? Two years of surprises and alarms had largely tended to paralyze the commerce of the world, and starving families, and violence and riot were the natural outcome of the Beaconsfield policy. With one hand the Government shook the confidence, and, therefore, injured the industry of the country; with the other it imposed fresh burdens upon that industry, so that taxes grew with the inability to pay them. The last Government was charged with harassing every interest in the country; this Government took a bolder course, it not only harassed every interest in the country, it harassed the world. If a real national emergency had existed, an English Minister would have acted with English candour, and would have come down to the House with a clear statement to ask for the support which would have been freely given by a united Parliament and country. But the Government, conscious that no emergency existed, except one of their own making, shrank from a searching discussion, and, therefore, determined to act without the co-operation of Parliament. When questioned as to why the House of Commons had been kept in ignorance of the movement of Indian troops, the Chancellor of the Exchequer informed the House that the Government had not thought it necessary to make any statement on the subject. When, however, it was discovered that even the present House of Commons resented this disrespectful treatment, the Government began to find reasons for its extraordinary conduct; and when those reasons were not vague and mysterious, when they were such as were capable of examination, they proved utterly worthless. The Leader of the House told them that it was important to keep the expedition secret, in order to obtain the transference of the Indian Army at a cheaper rate. It was at once shown him that publicity, by increasing the competition among shipowners, would have reduced freights. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was never again heard to refer to this subject. Then the Government told them that it would have been most unwise to divulge the secret, because practical difficulties might have prevented the realization of the object, and then they would have looked foolish in the eyes of Europe. It was impossible to conjecture what were the practical difficulties which could prevent England from moving 7,000 or 70,000 troops from one part of the world to another. It seemed to be only a matter of expense. The Home Secretary, however, threw some light upon this question. He said the practical difficulties had reference to the monsoon; but the

hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) with Indian experience, told the Home Secretary that the monsoon did not occur before the month of June, and with this explanation no more was heard of the practical difficulties. He would not, after so much debate, discuss whether the conduct of the Government, with regard to the Indian troops, had been unconstitutional or not, whether it had been illegal or not; but he must say that this disrespectful treatment of the House of Commons, this insult to Parliament had tended to intensify suspicions of an unpleasant kind. He found suspicions of a novel nature growing in the minds of some of the most sagacious politicians amongst them. When he asked for the grounds of these suspicions, he was referred to the remarkable disclosures in the life of the Prince Consort, to the ideas on Constitutional questions advocated in the great Tory Review, to the character of the Prime Minister, and to the conduct of the Government. How far the fear of an approach to personal Government extended in this country, was shown by the avidity with which the letters of "Verax" had been received. The sale of that pamphlet had been great throughout the country. He had reason to believe that it had been read by most Members of both Houses of Parliament, and to his knowledge it had found its way to many foreign countries. No wonder that Englishmen dreaded personal rule. It had brought unexampled calamity and humiliation upon the finest country in Europe. With a wise Sovereign and a prudent Minister, a country might have no immediate suffering from personal rule; but the day might come when we might have an unwise Sovereign and a reckless Minister, and then who should foresee the disasters that might befall them. Much had been said of the influences for good or evil upon India of the proposed employment of Indian troops in European warfare. Everyone admitted that they governed India mainly by the sword. India remained subject to this country, because of the 60,000 British troops they had there, and from the belief that in case of need, they could indefinitely increase that number. What, therefore, must be the surprise of that people to learn that they were unable to fight their own battles in Europe, but had to appeal to India for aid. For a period of more than 60 years, they had only once, and for a short time, had the strain of a European war. During the whole of that period they had been increasing in numbers and adding to our vast resources, and now, when there was a chance of our being at war with only a single Power, not in the stress of conflict, but before even a blow had been struck, they sent to India for help. Could any course have been taken more likely to impress Eastern nations with a mean conception of our military resources? In the farewell order to the troops embarking at Bombay the Viceroy spoke as follows:—

"Soldiers! you have been selected for the first Expedition that has ever left India to strengthen the British Forces in the Mediterranean. Whether your duties be those of peace or war, I am confident that in the faithful and devoted performance of them, you will safely uphold the honour of the Empire which is now confided to your hands."

India was here told that her own soldiers were needed to strengthen the British Forces in Europe, and the Viceroy declared that the honour of the Empire was confided to mercenary troops, not one of whom would shed a tear if these Islands were sunk in the ocean to-morrow. If these views obtained sympathy with the people of the United Kingdom, he should regard that as the beginning of the end of a great Empire. He could not consent to increase the burdens of the people without just cause. He did not accept the rule which appeared to be adopted by the Party opposite—our country, right or wrong. He must exercise his own individual judgment upon matters coming before that House, more especially when they were of the gravest importance; and he would give no sanction to a war which was not in the broadest sense necessary, and the demand for which was not founded on the clearest views of justice.

MR. HARDCASTLE denied that any hon. Member on that side of the House wished to charge the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) with unpatriotic motives. On that side the right of private judgment was recognized, and the hon. Member might speak and vote against the Government upon this matter without fear of being dispossessed even of his accustomed seat. Although they might differ from the hon. Member, no man on that side of the House would dream of showing him personal disrespect. The hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright) thought that there had been no emergency, and that the interests of this country had been in no degree menaced. He took exactly the opposite view. The circumstances of the past two years had been among the most momentous in their history. Had the country acted unanimously, and had the Opposition shown more consideration towards the Government, the points now in dispute might have been settled some time ago. Only the other day, a Liberal of influence, referring to the situation, said—"The Liberals are in a hole. If we have war it will be a bad thing. If we have peace it will be a Tory triumph, and I do not know which is worst." He was afraid that this was a fair specimen of the spirit which animated much of the opposition to the Government policy. The £6,000,000 already voted would perhaps have to be supplemented by £6,000,000 more; but, in his opinion, the money would be better spent than the £12,000,000 which the late Government devoted to the abolition of Purchase in the Army. This money had been spent in showing what they never believed in before—their own strength. The movement of these Indian troops was of great political importance. It had been said that 7,000 Englishmen might have been placed in Malta at less cost than these 7,000 Indian troops. But that was not the question. The question was, whether, in addition to their English Forces, they had anything else to fall back upon? India had been represented as a place where we might possibly be attacked. But this movement showed that India, instead of being a source of weakness, was a source of strength to England, which stood at present in a position of more acknowledged power than she had occupied at any time during the last 30 years. The policy of Her Majesty's Government, to unite the strength of the Empire, was the right policy, and he trusted that the Vote would be supported as one of the wisest that had ever been passed by the House.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, it seemed almost time for the House to consider what the question was they were now discussing. That Question he took to be whether the Speaker was to leave the Chair in order that the Estimates which had been laid on the Table might be considered. He would not have troubled the House during this debate had it not been stated that it was the intention of some of his hon. Friends to divide against the Motion. He wished, therefore, to explain why it was impossible that he should take any part in a division of that kind. So far as he knew, the course it was proposed to take was without precedent, and certainly, whether with or without precedent, it was one which, so far as he could perceive, carried no meaning with it whatever. He knew it was a very usual course, when it was proposed that the Speaker should leave the Chair for the purpose of going into Committee of Supply, to intercept that Motion with a view to ascertain a definite proposition. But he was perfectly at a loss to perceive what they were now to ascertain, what protest they were to make, or what they were to gain by a division which might be taken on the Question, and the sole Question, before the House. The effect of negating the Motion would simply be that the discussion of the Estimates would be postponed, he supposed, to next Thursday; and it was a matter of the most perfect indifference to him whether these Estimates were considered to-night or next Thursday. But he might as well state now, what he had intended to state in Committee, why he was not disposed to offer, at this stage, any further opposition to the Vote which the Government had asked. He was unable to understand why the Government proposed that these Estimates should be considered at this particular moment. The House was perfectly unable to discuss them with full information. The moment which had been selected was too late to preserve the authority of Parliament; the affair was almost completed, and, as had been pointed out over and over again last week, there was little option left to the House except to vote the money rendered necessary by the measure taken by the Government. But if it was too late for the proper and legitimate authority of Parliament to be preserved, it was too soon for any complete or thorough discussion of the policy of the measure. The House had been told last week by several Members of the Government that they were not in a position to lay their full justification before Parliament. Now, if the Government proposed to take a decision upon these Estimates as an approval by the House of the policy of moving the Indian troops, they were scarcely dealing fairly by the House. How was it possible for the House to discuss fully or to assent to the policy of the Government when they themselves told the House that they were not in a position to place their full justification before it? There was some mystery, some conflict of evidence, about all this, which was perfectly bewildering; and he, for one, until the time arrived—as he hoped it would arrive some day or other—for its being made perfectly clear, despaired of solving it. The House was told immediately before the Easter Holidays that there was nothing whatever which gave occasion for increased anxiety; but in the course of the debate last week they were informed that this measure had at that time been resolved upon, and that information had been received from “a high authority,” which had since been found to be untrue, but which, in the opinion of the Government, rendered this step necessary, and, at the same time, that for military reasons the preservation of absolute secrecy was absolutely necessary. How these statements were to be reconciled he really was unable to understand; and until the Government could lay their full justification and all the reasons for their policy before the House, it seemed to him that it was not dealing fairly by the House to ask it to assent to the Vote, if that assent was to be supposed to convey an entire approval of their policy. In any division which he might challenge he was bound to vote on the supposition that he should be successful, and he was also bound to look at the consequences in that light. Now, what would be the meaning of the rejection of these Estimates? It would either be that the expense of the movement of these troops would be thrown illegally upon the revenues of India—and that was what no one wished to do—or, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer told them the other night, funds might be found to meet the expense, but only at the cost of the total disorganization of the Naval and Military Services of the year. In the present state of Europe he was not disposed to give a vote which would have the effect of entirely disorganizing the Naval and Military Services of the country. What would be a further meaning of the rejection of this Vote? It might mean, that though Parliament would, no doubt, find the means for recouping the expenditure which had been incurred, it had decided that these troops should be sent back from Malta to India with the least possible delay. That, again, was a course which he would not be prepared to support by his vote. It was one question whether it was wise in the first instance to order this expedition, and a very different one whether, having been ordered, it should be immediately ordered to return. He, certainly, was not disposed by any vote of his to be a party to presenting in the face of Europe a spectacle of such irresolution as conduct of that sort would imply. Now, being unwilling to vote for a course which would result in any of these alternatives, and the House not being in a position to discuss fully the policy of the measure, they had no alternative, it appeared to him, but, under protest it might be, to pass these Estimates. They had made—and were entitled to make—their protest against the unconstitutional manner in which this thing had been done. Their objections had not been removed by what they had been told, nor swept away by the great majority against them. They were told that full information could not yet be laid before them. But their protest was directed not only against the conduct of the Government, of which a full explanation might yet be forthcoming, but also against the claims which the Government put forth when their defence was rested, not upon the plea of emergency, but upon the ground that it was unnecessary for Parliament to be consulted at all. Their objections had not been removed, but they had fully discussed the matter, and their opinions had been overruled. If the reserve was still maintained by the Government, as to the necessity for secrecy, they must apply it still further to the policy of this measure. It was quite clear that there were many and very serious objections that might be made to the policy of employing Indian troops in Europe. Many of these were stated by his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), and others. For the reasons he had stated, he did not intend going into them now; but still there were many great and important questions of Indian and European policy involved. He might mention one, which had not hitherto been referred to, which was the effect of this policy on the future administration of the Suez Canal. The present arrangement by which the Suez Canal was utilized was well known; it was free for the passage of their troops to and from India. That arrangement was perfectly assented to by the other Great Powers of Europe; but that position of affairs might be very seriously and materially altered, if it were understood that the British Government were going to adopt the policy of bringing Indian troops to be made use of in a European war. The Russian, the German, the French, and any other Government would look at the Suez Canal in a very different light if that policy were to be adopted by the British Government. There were other points raised by this policy, but how could they discuss them now? Everything depended on the emergency, the necessity under which the Government acted, which they had informed them they could not yet lay before the House. Therefore, any discussion must in the meantime be imperfect and inconclusive. Many might vote against the Speaker leaving the Chair as a protest not only against this particular measure, but also against the whole policy of which it was a part. They would be perfectly justified in doing so, because they had from the very first, throughout these transactions, protested against the whole policy the Government had adopted of military preparation. He and many others had not been altogether able to agree in that view. They had admitted that circumstances might arise which would justify the use by this country of its naval and military power to protect the interests of the country, and assist in securing a permanent and enduring peace; and, holding these views, they had not offered that opposition which had been offered by others to a policy of preparation. But this Vote might, perhaps, be interpreted by Government as an expression of confidence in their whole policy. He wanted to point out the limits within which that assertion might be said to be true. He had said their full case was not before them; therefore, it was impossible for Parliament to approve a policy which had not been fully explained; but, so far as it had been fully explained, it had been a policy of preparation, and nothing more—a policy of preparation, no doubt, contemplating the possibility of war, but directed, in the first place, to the maintenance and security of peace. For that policy the Government might claim justly that they had received the sanction of Parliament; but they had received nothing more. The sanction they had received was a sanction to military preparations; but they had not received, as yet, any sanction of Parliament to an active or actual use of those military preparations. If they called on Parliament for such a sanction, the decision of Parliament must depend on considerations of which as yet they knew nothing. In his opinion, the failure of the negotiations a few weeks ago for the meeting of the Congress afforded no justification for a recourse to hostilities. Of what had occurred since they were absolutely ignorant. They did not know what had been the nature of the negotiations between the Courts of London and St. Petersburg. They did not know the differences, if any, which still existed between the two Governments; but it was difficult to think that they were such as to justify a recourse to warlike measures. He did not think it necessary to detain the House longer on this occasion; but he would express his strong conviction that if the Government presumed on the support they had hitherto received to their policy of military preparations as a support of their whole policy, they would incur a most heavy responsibility if—resting on that support—they committed the country, without a clear and unmistakeable warning, to any active hostile measures. Believing, then, that a discussion of the policy of the Government was for the present impolitic, and presuming the Government had reasons for wishing to obtain the sanction of the House to this Estimate this evening, he did not now wish to interpose any preliminary discussion. If at all advisable, that discussion might be better taken in Committee; but, even in Committee, unless the Government were prepared to make further disclosures of their views and intentions, he saw no alternative but to vote, without serious discussion, the expenses of the Expedition which had been incurred, and which it was impossible for Parliament to refuse.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER need hardly say that with the larger part of the observations of the noble Lord opposite he entirely concurred. He gathered from what he had said that, while he entirely and most justly held himself and those with whom he acted clear to pronounce his opinion when he thought proper upon the whole course and policy of the Government, he did not think the present moment one when it was desirable to embarrass the Government by making a difficulty with regard to the particular proposals they now made. The question of bringing Indian troops to the Mediterranean was one which had two branches—first, whether it was Constitutional to adopt that measure; and next whether it was politic and expedient. Upon the Constitutional and legal character of the step they had a debate of great importance, which lasted during the whole of last week; and, upon the whole, the decision of the House was very unmistakably pronounced. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had again to-night raised some of the points which the Government thought had been sufficiently disposed of, and he hoped it would not be necessary for him to enter again into that controversy. With regard to the question of policy and expediency, no doubt it was difficult to argue fully at the present moment, for the Government was not in a position to put forth all the considerations which led them to advise Her Majesty to take that step, nor was the House in a position fully to discuss them. Of course, it was open to hon. Gentlemen to challenge the whole policy of the Government, to say their policy had been wrong ab initio; but it was a policy which they had consistently taken and pursued, and they believed it had not only been supported by a majority of the House, but by the general feeling of the majority out of the House. In taking that particular line, which they believed to be the right one, it had not been their desire or intention to plunge the country into war. On the contrary, they had pursued it as a means of precaution—as the wisest and best method of avoiding a very serious and disastrous conflict—for, no doubt, such a conflict would have been disastrous to the whole human race. Her Majesty's Government were as desirous to avoid that calamity as any hon. Gentleman in any part of the House. They believed they had taken a right course, others might think differently. The Government would be prepared at the proper time to defend the course which they had adopted. There had been, no doubt, several steps which the Government had thought it their duty to advise during the different stages of the negotiations that had been going on. Some of those steps had been represented as steps tending to, and intended to, plunge the country into war. They had been told that the sending of a Fleet to the Sea of Marmora, the calling out of the Reserves, the frank and bold, and he hoped temperate, statement of their objections to the Treaty of San Stefano, and other steps which they had taken, among which the bringing of these troops from India to Malta had been one, were of that character; but all those steps had not only not brought the country into war, but had been, he believed, the cause of measures best calculated to avert war, and to bring about a peaceable and desirable settlement of the difficulties with which they had had to contend. Their policy, in the estimation of some hon. Gentlemen, might not have been the wisest or the best policy; but he could truly say that it had been a sincere policy; and that they would be perfectly prepared when the proper time arrived to discuss it, and to defend it. With regard to the special measure which was now under consideration, the noble Lord, in the course of what he must own as his exceedingly fair observations to-night, had asked the Government why, after what had passed, they thought it necessary to bring forward the Vote at the present moment. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) would give an answer at once. They proposed to ask Parliament to give this Vote, and to authorize by it the expenditure which had been incurred for bringing those troops to Malta, in order to avoid that which they were charged, and erroneously charged, with wishing to do—namely, the throwing of the expense on the Indian Revenue. They had felt from the first that if this measure was one that ought to be taken—as they thought it was—it was one that ought not to be made a charge upon India; and they therefore announced, at the earliest period they could do so, that as soon as they had taken an Estimate of this particular operation they would submit it to the House, in order that Parliament might place them in the position of being able to repay not only this not very large advance, but also all prospective expenditure which might be incurred by this operation, and in order to make it clear to all the world that the Indian Revenue would not be charged with the amount. Even if the Vote were refused, the Government would still hold the Revenue of India harmless; but, as had been pointed out, the refusal of it would put their Estimates into some confusion, because it would be necessary to make a change in their expenditure in order that what had been spent in this particular operation might be met out of other portions of their revenue. But he apprehended there was no question about that. The House knew perfectly well what was spent in that respect. The Government had incurred this expenditure upon their own responsibility, because they believed it was a right step to take, and that it was one which the country and the House, upon full consideration, would hold to be right. But, at a future time, it would be for Parliament, upon reviewing the matter, to censure the Government if they thought the Government had acted wrongly. With regard to the particular question which was now before the House, he held with the noble Lord that that was not a moment at which it was particularly convenient to call for a division, because he really did not see what was the issue upon which they were going to divide. The question was, whether the House should go into Committee in order to hear the statements of his right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for War and the First Lord of the Admiralty, and, after hearing those statements to consider whether it would give the Vote? He did not think the principles which the hon. Members had at heart would gain anything by further prolonging this discussion, and he could scarcely imagine that the House would be inclined, without good reason shown, to stultify or set aside the decision to which it came last week.

MR. O'DONNELL observed, that many of the officers of the troops that had been moved from India to Malta were employed in the Civil Service in India, and that thus civilians in India were deprived of the promotion they would otherwise have obtained. Another consideration to be borne in mind was that the removal of any considerable portion of their Indian troops from India would have to be followed by a corresponding reduction in the Armies of the Native States—a course which would be certain to create dissatisfaction with their rule.

MR. FAWCETT wished to explain why he could not adopt the course suggested by the Leader of the Opposition, and abstain from voting against the Motion for going into Committee. The noble Lord had said that to vote against that Motion would be unusual and unprecedented; but the course of conduct on the part of Her Majesty's Government had been unusual and unprecedented. Any doubts which he (Mr. Fawcett) might have had as to the propriety of taking a division had been completely removed by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), who had shown that the action of the Government was unconstitutional, illegal, improper, and impolitic, and also by that of the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington), though for a different reason. The noble Lord had urged that, if taken at all, the division ought to be upon the Vote of this money in Committee. But he differed from the noble Lord in that respect, because, if they divided on the Vote in Committee, it might be supposed that they wished the expenses of moving these troops to fall upon the people of India. The most straightforward course would be to divide on the Motion for going into Committee. Their object in wishing to postpone the Vote was to obtain the requisite information from the Government to enable the House to judge whether it was just to grant the money for the purpose of moving the Indian troops.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put.

SUPPLY — ARMY SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATE FOR NATIVE INDIAN TROOPS.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(1.) £350,000, Native Indian Troops.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that after the lengthened debate that had already taken place upon the subject of these Indian troops, in which the general opinion of the House had been equally pronounced upon both sides, it would not be for the public advantage, or for the convenience of the Committee, that he should enter into the question of the policy that had led to the despatch of those troops. That was, no doubt, an important question, and the Government would be perfectly ready to meet it when the proper time arrived for its discussion. If he were to enter into that question then, it would probably raise a debate which might be prejudicial to the negotiations now pending; and, therefore, he should confine his remarks to a brief explanation of the Estimate he had to submit. The despatch of the Native Indian troops, as the Committee were aware, was decided upon by the Government upon the 27th of March last. On the 12th of April following a commission was given to the Indian Government to make arrangements for the embarkation of the troops; and owing to the fear which was entertained by the Indian Government of the probability of bad weather, and with a view of avoiding the monsoon, the departure of the troops was hastened as much as possible. The general question as to the employment of Native Indian troops out of India had been discussed that evening in another form, and the Committee, to the appointment of which the Government had assented, would examine into that question, and when it had reported the matter could be discussed much more conveniently than it could be now, and he should therefore not touch upon it. The troops sent to Malta consisted of six regiments of Native Infantry, four companies of Native Sappers and Miners, two regiments of Native Cavalry, and two Field Batteries of the Royal Artillery. The Estimate he now presented to the Committee was, of course, only an approximate one. They asked for a Vote of not exceeding 7,000 men, although the number would not actually much exceed 6,000 men. The large proportion of these charges were of a nature that would arise whether the time the troops remained out of India was long or short, and it had been thought right by the Government to take the pay up to the 31st March next, that being the end of the present financial year. The Force consisted of 112 British officers, 122 Native officers, 6,040 men, 1,500 followers, and 1,373 horses. The principal items connected with the pay and allowances of the troops, which they had taken, in round numbers, at £180,000, were—provisions, about £40,000; forage, £55,000; miscellaneous supplies, £30,000; and for general purposes connected with the movement, £50,000, bringing the total up to £350,000. He was obliged to guard himself by saying that he did not know the actual details of the expenditure which would be caused by camp arrangements in connection with the troops and camp followers; but he had no reason to apprehend that the sum he had mentioned would be exceeded. It was proposed to camp the Infantry regiments at the glacis on the fort, the Cavalry and Artillery would be camped on the road leading to St. Antonio and Aquila, and from the accounts he had received he understood that all the sanitary arrangements would be satisfactorily concluded before the troops had arrived at their destination. He did not know that at that late hour the Committee would wish him to go into further detail. He trusted that on the understanding that the whole question of the policy of the Government might be hereafter discussed the Committee would agree to the Vote to which he had alluded, and which he now placed in the Chairman's hands.

MR. DILLWYN did not intend to discuss the general policy of this Vote, and he did not wish to see the opposition to it carried any further; but he should like to know whether in this Vote the ordinary method would be followed of first voting the men and then the money? He had not clearly understood the statement of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, as there had been so much confusion while he was speaking. If the usual course were not taken, he should like to hear what was the reason for such a departure from the ordinary rule.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that he had upon a previous occasion taken the opportunity to express his opinion on the policy of this step, and he had not altered his opinion that the measure was not justified.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is not in Order in dealing with the general question, but must confine his remarks to this Vote.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL would confine himself to the Vote. He was not adverse to the experiment of employing Native Indian troops; but his objection to this Vote was, that the occasion was inopportune, that the number of troops brought to Malta was just enough to irritate the Russians and cause suspicion among the other European Powers, and not enough to be of much practical use. The Estimate before the Committee bore out his opinion, that those troops would cost a great deal more than European troops. Having said that, he should not vote against the grant, because they had already taken the money from the Indian Treasury, and he was anxious to repay that money as soon as possible. He differed from the noble Lord who so ably led Her Majesty's Opposition, and did not think it would be well to postpone this matter. The Government had now put this measure before Parliament, and were asking for a Vote for 7,000 men. As to that, it was "better late than never," and a salve to their consciences might now perhaps be found in the ex post facto assent of Parliament to the moving of those Indian troops. In pursuance with his view, he hoped the House, now that the step had been taken, would make the best of it. It was an interesting and important experiment, which, he hoped, would be made the most of. He suggested that some of those troops should be brought into this country, and he did not see why "Probyn's Horse" should not be employed as sentries at the Horse Guards. Such a step would, at least, afford great satisfaction to the juvenile population of London, and then the Horse Guards might be sent to India, where, no doubt, they would do good service.

MR. DILLWYN, since he spoke last, saw that the men and money were to be taken together in one lump. That was unconstitutional, or, at least, exceptional. It was desirable that the House should legalize the moving of those troops as far as possible; and, therefore, he should prefer to have the men and money voted separately. He certainly expected to have some further explanation.

MR. C. S. PARKER said, if the hon. Member wanted a precedent, he ought not to look at the general Estimate, but any Naval or Military Supplementary Estimates.

COLONEL STANLEY said, it had all along been intended that the number of men should be stated to the Committee, and the Vote had been put in the most convenient form for that purpose, and, he believed, according to precedent.

NAVY SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATE.

(2.) £398,000, Transport of Native Indian troops.

MR. PARNELL asked the Government for detailed information respecting the transports, particularly as regarded the terms which had been made with the owners. It was necessary the Committee should have these details, in order that they might see what kind of bargains the Government had made.

MR. W. H. SMITH admitted that a great difference of opinion existed as to whether the Government might not have obtained the transports at a cheaper rate. His own impression was, that if they had announced to the world that it was their intention to bring several thousand troops from India, and that they would require about 50,000 tons of shipping, the expense would have been considerably more than what they had arranged for. In this matter the Indian Government had acted on behalf of the Imperial Government, and there was every reason to believe that they had done their best, that they had exercised every possible care as regarded economy. The exact amount of tonnage taken up was 46,000 tons, and that was a very large drain to make upon the resources of one port, or one district, in any part of Her Majesty's Dominions. Although the Vote was founded upon information received by telegraph from the Indian Government, to the best of his belief, it was a full and complete representation of the liability which had been incurred; and the first item included the Suez Canal dues, and other charges of that character.

MR. C. BECKETT-DENISON was one of those who served on the Committee which sat after the Abyssinian Campaign, and a very large portion of the enormous expense which was incurred, in reference to the 14,000 men engaged in that war, was for transports. He was quite sure the Government were perfectly alert in this matter, and that they did not need to be cautioned. At the same time, he begged to point out that if these vessels were to be retained any length of time, it was quite certain the Vote they were called upon to pass would be inadequate. He should like to know for what term the ships had been engaged, and whether they had a running contract at so much per ton per month?

MR. MUNDELLA also served on the Abyssinian Committee, and, anything more extravagant than it was proved the charges for transports had been, could not be imagined. But that Committee could do nothing. It was too late. The money had been spent, and although a great portion of it had been utterly wasted, yet the bills had to be paid. Some of the things which had been done were both foolish and ludicrous. A number of ships were paid for several times over in point of value, owing to the wasteful contracts which were entered into. It was said that in this instance the reason why the Government did not make known their intention to Parliament was, that they were afraid if they did so the rates of freight would be greatly increased. Now, on that point there was a great difference of opinion, and many men of business, out-of-doors, were of opinion if the Government had come forward with a frank statement, and had invited competition, there would have been no difficulty in obtaining much more favourable terms than those they had done. He scarcely liked to state all that was said on the subject out-of-doors; but a great many people believed as many rupees per ton per month had been paid as shillings ought to have been. Many owners would have been glad to have accepted shillings where they had now got rupees. One very serious item in the Abyssinian Account was the charge for demurrage, and he should like to know what arrangement the Government had made as to that matter in the present Expedition? He regretted that the First Lord of the Admiralty had not placed full particulars of the contracts before the Committee, instead of contenting himself with saying that he had nothing but telegraphic information. If any ordinary house of business had entered into contracts of this nature, they would have had the full particulars in their hands before this time, and he was at a loss to know why the Government could not do what an ordinary house of business would have done. The Government had full command of the telegraph, and the right hon. Gentleman might, and ought to, have come down to the Committee, and laid before them a full account of the terms upon which these contracts had been entered into. The Conservative Party were in power during the Abyssinian Expedition, and they came down to the House and stated, over and over again, that from £2,000,000 to £2,500,000, would be the entire cost, yet they all knew that finally the account amounted to £9,000,000. Now, what he wished to guard against was the repetition of anything of the kind in this case, in order that the interests of the taxpayers might be protected. He made no objection to the Vote, because it was for the Indian troops; but he desired more information regarding it, solely in the interest of the taxpayers. He knew economy was out of fashion in this House, and people who advocated it were almost ashamed to use the word. It was looked upon as everything which was disagreeable; but, when they had trade decreasing and pauperism increasing, it was time they turned their thoughts in the direction of economy, because this was a very large sum for such a small blaze of fireworks from the Prime Minister. If it should happen that the Government had to change sides, do not let them hereafter come down and complain of heavy taxation. In his opinion, the expenditure which had already been incurred was most lavish, and they were apparently about to do the same as they did in the Abyssinian War, where the interests of the many were sacrificed to the interests of the few. Fixing the sum at £398,000 seemed very much like the 1s. 11½d. which they were in the habit of seeing in the windows of drapers' shops. The First Lord of the Admiralty was a thorough man of business, and let him check the Indian Government, and get from them the full particulars of what they had done, in order that it might be seen whether they had gone about their work in a business-like manner.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, as far as he could learn from the Indian prints, these vessels had been taken up on monthly pay for four months from the 17th of April; but the pay of troops was taken for 12 months, and that would seem to imply that they were to be kept from India for that time. If, on the other hand, they were only to be kept four months, then they would be in the middle of the monsoon, when it would be impossible for these ships to make the passage.

MR. D. JENKINS considered these ships had been taken at 50 per cent more than they might have been obtained for. Some of the sailing ships were to receive 10 to 11 rupees per ton per month, and the steamers from 20 to 22 rupees. Why had sailing ships been engaged at all? The work on board of them was performed slowly, and it could be done in half the time on board the steamers. At the present moment there was a large amount of unemployed steam tonnage in India, and, if this had been taken up, the troops could have been landed in Malta within 14 days, instead of the voyage occupying three weeks as it did with the sailing vessels. He maintained that the manner in which these transports had been engaged showed an utter absence of business knowledge.

MR. MAC IVER thought there would not be the least difficulty in showing that the Government had made the best bargain they could. While it was perfectly true that there was a great deal of unemployed tonnage in India, it was not true that tonnage was in excess at Bombay. No doubt, the Government could have got vessels in Calcutta and Madras from 10 to 11 rupees per ton per month, but that would have involved great delay; and, in order to carry out their project, the Government were compelled to accept the freights they could get in Bombay. The whole success of the thing depended upon its being done there and then, and he did not consider the

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that the remarks which had been made as to the extent of the profits reaped by Indian shipowners were well illustrated by a telegram which was sent from Bombay to Calcutta during the Abyssinian War—"Great panic here upon a false report of peace." He believed that there was a great deal of unemployed tonnage in India. If the Government had waited and had sent to Calcutta for steamers, they would have obtained transport for half the price. Instead of that, the Government had gone to a large expense in order to enable the Prime Minister to do the thing in a fireworky, brilliant manner.

LORD ELCHO observed, that there was one point to which he wished to call attention, as it did not appear to have been noticed before. He should like to know whether, when the occasion presented itself, the ships of the Royal Navy might not be utilized for the purposes of transport? In the Crimean War, the French Navy had the duty of conveying the French troops. He heard also, from General Baker, that one of the Turkish frigates had been used as a transport. It conveyed 5,000 men from one place to another, a journey occupying one day and a-half. Perhaps, in the present case, the Navy might be more utilized.

MR. NORWOOD observed, that it was, no doubt, perfectly legitimate, under certain circumstances, to send Indian troops to Malta; but the question was, whether the Government had not in this instance paid too much for their transport? That was an important point in its bearing on the future employment of these troops. If the transport had been arranged by gentlemen accustomed to the tonnage market, probably 30 per cent, or, perhaps, one-half of the expense, might have been saved. As the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver) had said, although there might not have been many ships in Bombay harbour, there was a large excess in Calcutta. Between the two places was only a few days' voyage; and if the Government had inquired in the Calcutta market, they might have procured three times the quantity of shipping obtainable in Bombay, and at about half the rates they had given. The House needed such information as no Minister at present seemed able to give on these points. Although the employment of the Indian troops was, in his opinion, not only legitimate but salutary, yet he thought the arrangements for transporting them might have been effected at half the sums expended in the present case. As the House was now asked to vote so large an amount for the transport, it might give an impression, not only in the House but in the country, that the cost of conveying the Indian troops was so heavy as to make their employment in large numbers practically impossible, which, in his opinion, was erroneous.

MR. W. H. SMITH expressed his willingness to receive suggestions on Votes of this character from hon. Members on both sides of the House. He was ready to admit that the expenditure of the Indian Government in these matters had suggested to Her Majesty's Government the necessity of watching their proceedings. All he could say was that, so far as he was concerned, he would take care to watch its expenditure most narrowly in order to avoid, if possible, the extravagance that marked the Abyssinian Expedition. He was, however, bound to point out that, although the demand to get ships from Calcutta might possibly have been made, the amount of saving would be much less than that suggested by the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood). The actual charge for freight was £200,000, but the rest of the charge was made up of various items; £55,000 alone out of £256,000 was for pilotage, toll dues, including the Suez Canal charges, and other matters. It was true there was not at present before the House information on which they could rely; but he might say that 22 rupees had been paid for one ship. Until he knew the amount accurately, he must decline to give further information, though there were cases in which steamers and sailing vessels had been taken at 9 or 10 rupees per ton per month. The period which the charge of £200,000 represented was one of three or four months; in some cases it was for a slightly less in others for a slightly longer, period. Before that period had expired, there would be time to consider whether the ships should continue to be employed or be discharged. His noble Friend the Member for Haddington (Lord Elcho) had spoke of the expediency of employing the ships of the Royal Navy for the purposes of transport. He would undertake to say that every economy would be practised; but if his noble Friend were as well acquainted as he was with the present condition of Her Majesty's Navy, he would know well that a ship of war as now constructed was hardly capable of taking on board any addition to its proper complement of men. No doubt, it was possible on an emergency for a ship belonging to the Turkish Navy to take on board 3,000 to 5,000 men for a day and a night. They might be taken on board in that way for a short time; but when the period was extended to three weeks, it would be necessary to make proper provision for the men, and he was afraid that the class of ships of which Her Majesty's Navy now consisted could not be largely used for the purposes of transport. When he was in a position to do so, he would lay before the House all information with regard to the liability which the Indian Government had incurred with reference to the movement of the Indian troops and to the contracts which had been entered into with ship-owners for their conveyance.

MR. MUNDELLA would be perfectly willing to accept the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman that full information should be given on condition that at as early a period as possible the particulars of all contracts should be laid before the House. A case had been brought to his notice in which its Bombay agent telegraphed to an English house that the Government wanted transport. They wrote him to accept 18s. per month, but shortly afterwards he telegraphed back that he had got 20 rupees per month, or about double the amount he was instructed to take. If such things took place—and he had the information on the best authority—it was right that full particulars of the contracts should be laid on the Table of the House. He did not accuse the right hon. Gentleman of any extravagance; but they knew what took place in India—and especially in Bombay—at the time of the Abyssinian War. The evil traditions with reference to expenditure that hung about Bombay made it more than ever necessary to watch the expenditure.

MR. GOSCHEN wished to express his belief, that if the Government showed no reticence with regard to the contracts, there would be no disposition to oppose the Vote.

MR. J. W. BAROLAY said, that before the Committee passed this Vote, he wished to call attention to the Lunacy Board. A good many years ago an inquiry was held, which recommended that the Lunacy Commission should be amalgamated with the Board of Supervision in Scotland. Paupers in Scotland were under a divided authority, the Board of Supervision had the control of the sane paupers, while the lunatics in the same poorhouse were in the charge of the Lunacy Commission. In consequence of that divided control, pauper lunatics were kept in a much more expensive way than the ordinary paupers. The Lunacy Inspectors had, for example, in one case with which he was acquainted, ordered that large mirrors should be placed in the common rooms of the lunatics. Altogether their interference had caused a largely increased expenditure in the maintenance of pauper lunatics in Scotland. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty had said that the matter was under the consideration of the Government; and he wished to ask whether the Government had yet come to a conclusion, and determined, with the view to economy, to transfer the duties of the Lunacy Commission to the Board of Supervision?

MR. RAMSAY observed, with reference to the statement that the paupers in the poorhouses were under the control of the Board of Supervision, while the lunatics were looked after by the Lunacy Commissioners, that the fact was that the Commissioners in Lunacy had charge of the whole of the lunatics in Scotland, whether paupers or non-paupers. The distinction between the Scottish system and that existing in this country was, that in England wealthy lunatics were under the care of Chancery, and pauper lunatics were either under the care of Boards of Guardians or of the Commissioners of Lunacy. There were thus two classes of lunatics—those in workhouses and those in asylums. In workhouses, the lunatics were under no special authority but that of the Boards of Guardians; while the Asylums were managed by the Lunacy Commissioners. The hon. Gentleman who had brought forward this subject was less perfectly acquainted with it than he usually was with matters which he brought before the House. The truth was that no two public Departments could work together more harmoniously than the Board of Supervision and the Lunacy Commission had done for many years past. No change that could be made would effect any saving to the public in the administration of Lunacy in Scotland. In 1870, there was a discussion in the House with regard to these questions, and some of the evidence given before the Commission appointed was, as he had reason to believe, afterwards withdrawn by the parties who made the statements with regard to the excessive expenditure. The explanations given showed that the statements were made under a misapprehension of the facts.
